Mr. Kreisler arrived in New York a fortnight ago and will sail for home in the latter part of this month. Here he will play the Beethoven concerto in the interpretation of which he has, by general consent, no rival. He played this masterpiece with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of last month, and at both the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening he received ovations of a character which are usually reserved for prima donnas. The orchestra was as loud in its praises as the audience itself.

Dr. Muck has placed only two really orchestral works on the program, the first being Brahms' lovely symphony in D major, No. 2, and the second, Schumann's overture "Genoveva." The order of the program is as follows:

Brahms...... Symphony in D-Major, No. 2.
Beethoven.... Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.
Schumann............ Overture, "Genoveva."

Esta... 1884

©1912 BY AMIE DUPONT, N.Y.

FRITZ KREISLER
To play with the Boston Orchestra.

...ablished and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC [illegible]

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged an unusually attractive program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. It comprises Sibelius' Symphony in E minor, No. 1, the Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin and Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle," the soloist being Fritz Kreisler.

Es... 884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

MUSICAL ATTRACTIONS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged an unusually attractive program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. It comprises Sibelius' Symphony in E minor No. 1, the Brahms "Academic Festival" overture, the Mendelssohn concerto for violin, and Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle," the soloist being Fritz Kreisler. This will be Kreisler's only appearance in Washington this season. This incomparable artist arrived in New York a fortnight ago, and will be in this country only until the end of this month.

Esta... 84

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

rk, 1884

The program for the second concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Muck, presents a number of interesting features. It will begin, quite properly, with the symphony, which will be the No. 8 of Beethoven, the one that is known as "The Little Symphony." But as it always seems to be quite impossible for everyone to get there on time, there will doubtless be countless persons who will miss the first movement. After the intermission the little-known Schumann "Genoveva" overture will be played and Fritz Kreisler will then make his only appearance in Baltimore this season, playing the Brahms violin concerto, the same one, by the way, in which Elman was heard here last Monday. It is an interesting work to have heard once, but once in a season is quite enough. It is a pity that we have to have it again, although Kreisler, who is one of the greatest violinists now in the public eye, an experienced and fiery player, will doubtless add new charm to it. The concert will close with the eternal Beethoven No. 3, "Lenore" overture. It will probably be beautifully played, but it would be a pleasure to hear something else once in a while.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will play the Beethoven concerto for violin and orchestra at the first, and the Brahms concerto at the second. The chief symphonic numbers will be the First Symphony of Sibelius and the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music will be given next Friday evening, Dec. 6, and the interest of the occasion will be heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Brooklyn this will be. He will play Bruch's concerto in G minor.

The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius, which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The other numbers will be Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle."

***

Es 1884

Fritz Kreisler

the first reserve of the Austrian army and had been summoned to his regiment on account of the Balkan war when he sailed for this country last week, but was able to make arrangements to keep his American engagements on condition that he hold himself in readiness to return at instant notice if his regiment was needed. His Providence appearance will be the first of his American tour.

Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D-major is one of the notable precious legacies of his great genius. The literature of the violin is, curiously enough, none too rich and no concertos written before this or since quite reach the exalted heights attained by Beethoven.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Est 1884

AIME' DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER
LYRIC, WEDNESDAY, DEC

From
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date

Estab 1884

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE HEARD WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, gains unusual importance from the presence as soloist of the incomparable Austrian violinist, Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this will be.

Mr. Kreisler reached New York a fortnight ago and will sail for home before Christmas. He was brought to this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under exclusive contract, and will play with that organization in a series of its concerts in cities of the east.

Other Appearances

In addition to these orchestral appearances he is to play with the Cincinnati Orchestra in Cleveland, with the St. Louis Orchestra in St. Louis and will give three concerts of his own, one in Boston, one at Smith College and the other in Buffalo.

Mr. Kreisler will play here the Beethoven concerto. It is generally conceded that in the interpretation of this masterwork he is without a rival. His art is perfection itself. When he played the concerto with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of this month, both on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, he received ovations the like of which have never been seen in Symphony Hall, the orchestra joining enthusiastically with the audience in paying tribute to his remarkable performance.

Two Other Numbers

There will be but two orchestral numbers on the program. The first is Brahms' ever lovely symphony in D major No. 2, and the other Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The order of the program is as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 2..........Brahms
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61....Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva" ....Schumann

FRITZ KREISLER

Vill Play Brahms Concerto.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.

DEC 3 - 1912

E 1884

[SPECIAL TO THE EVENING TELEGRAM.]

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Tuesday.—At the Garrick Theatre last night Franz Lehar's music drama, "Eva," with Miss Sallie Fisher in the title role, made a hit before a discriminating audience. John Drew is popular as ever in "The Perplexed Husband," by Alfred Sutro, at the Broad Street Theatre. "The Pink Lady," with the company which appeared in London and New York, entered upon its final week here last night. Miss Gaby Deslys and "Al" Jolson, in "The Whirl of Society," remain this week at the Lyric and then go to Boston. At the Adelphi Theatre "Bunty Pulls the Strings" for the last eight times here this week. "Ransomed," a play of to-day by Theodore Burt Sayre and Cleveland Rodgers, is at the Walnut Street Theatre. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were at the Academy of Music last night, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

From
Address
Date

rk, 1884

THE season's second Boston Symphony concert, with Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, as soloist, will be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Beethoen; concerto for violin in D, opus 61, Beethoven; symphony No. 1 in E-minor, Sibelius.

Jan Sibelius, composer of the symphony, who is now in the full maturity of manhood, is regarded by many as quite the greatest musical talent that northern Europe has produced. He is a Finn by birth and his home to-day is in Helsingfors, but for many years he was compelled to live in Germany, owing to the fact that his patriotism had found expression in some of his music and also politically, and placed him under the ban of the Russian Government. He has written four symphonies in addition to many smaller works for the orchestra. Of the four, the first and second have had great success wherever played. The third and fourth, his last works, seem not to have been so fortunate. The place that Sibelius will ultimately hold in the contemporary of music is hard to say, but the fact is unquestioned that he is a man of extraordinary individuality, of great talent and is a master of the mechanics of his art.

The "Leonora" Overture, of the four written by Beethoven to go with his opera, "Fidelio," is the only one that is really alive to-day, a century and more after its composition.

The presence of Kreisler as soloist gives especial interest to the concert. It is several years since he was last heard here and he has never played the Beethoven Concerto in this city. He is perhaps the greatest violinist of the younger school. He is, incidentally, an officer in

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 6 - 1912

E, 1884

RIVAL VIOLINISTS ARE HEARD HERE SAME DAY.

Ysaye and Fritz Kreisler Play in Same Hall, but Not at the Same Time.

Two concerts and one opera comprised the music of yesterday available to New York's public. In the afternoon Eugene Ysaye gave a recital in Carnegie Hall to a comparatively small audience, while the evening provided a Boston Symphony Orchestra programme in the same auditorium, and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The interesting feature of the day, without doubt, was the opportunity to compare methods and achievements of two such great artists as Ysaye and Fritz Kreisler, the latter making his first return here with the orchestra from Boston after a two years' absence. So far as this occasion is concerned the honors belonged to Kreisler.

As for the orchestra and Conductor Karl Muck, they gave Sibelius's first symphony and the Brahms festival overture with sonority of tone, admirably balanced contrasts and technical precision and accuracy.

[redacted] Segurola, with [redacted] were the [redacted] operatic presentation, which had a large attendance.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Estal 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SECOND CONCERT

Orchestra Heard at Academy, With Fritz Kreisler, Superb Violinist, as Assisting Artist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck before a crowded and brilliant house. A particularly valuable and inviting program had been prepared for the occasion. It included Brahms' second symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and it presented as its central feature Beethoven's Concerto for the Violin in D major, Op. 61. This will be recognized by the appreciative amateur as an exceptionally attractive arrangement.

Brahms' second symphony is a masterpiece which compels a constantly increasing admiration. It seems to gain in beauty and in charm with each fresh hearing, and those who know it best love it most. It is not gay; it is not grave; it is not glad. Its accents are not those of sadness, nor are they the accents of happiness and joy. The quality which chiefly distinguishes it is a calm and tranquil serenity, the serenity of a lovely sunset in summer after the storm has passed.

It communicates the suggestion of a sorrow which has been outlived, of a destiny which has been accepted. Its beauty is of a kind which can only be described as heavenly. It tells us of that peace which is said to pass understanding, and it rises to heights of emotional intensity and spiritual exaltation which only the greatest ever scale. It is as perfect in form as it is inspired in substance. The symmetry of its proportions is as absolute as the ideas which it embodies are spontaneous and inspired, and so it is, in every way, a consummate work of art. It was admirably played under Dr. Muck's sympathetic and illuminative direction, with the greatest eloquence of expression, lucidity of exposition and nicety of discernment, and the enjoyment which it afforded was very great. So hearty was the applause that the conductor motioned the muiscians to rise to bow their acknowledgments.

The assistant artist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, is easily one of the best of living violinists. The writer has before him a program which shows that on Thursday afternoon, November 22, 1888, "Master" Fritz Kreisler appeared in a concert at the Chestnut Street Opera House under the direction of Mr. Edmond C. Stanton in association with Moritz Rosenthal, Alma Fohstroem and Albert Mittelhauser, and that he played a Fantasie Caprice by Vieuxtemps, Chopin's Nocturns in E flat, as arranged by Sarasate, and the Moto Perpetuo of Paganini. Those who heard him then recognized his signal ability and foresaw what has since befallen. "Master" Fritz Kreisler has attained to the highest rank as a virtuoso, and he plays his instrument with a purity of tone, a brilliancy of execution, a grandeur of style, a breadth of method and a masterly authority which are hardly equaled and are quite unsurpassed.

As Beethoven's concerto is one of the things for which he has a special love, and of which he has made a special study, the splendor of its interpretation last night can readily be understood. Alike in its technical finish, in its intellectual dignity and in its emotional fervor, it was superb. Better violin playing than that is unimaginable. The next of these concerts is announced for Monday evening January 6, when Mme. Metzenauer will be the soloist.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Established: 1884

FRITZ KREISLER RECEIVES WELCOME

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First Concert of the Season in Capital.

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater was one of unusual interest, not only because of the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, but also because of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 and the Brahms Academic Festival Overture.

The orchestral works of Sibelius are rarely heard in America, and it was due to Dr. Muck's appreciation of Finland's greatest composer that this work was first heard in America five years ago. The piano pieces and some of his songs have in recent years gained some notice here, still Sibelius is scarcely known in America.

This Symphony No. 1 is full of an austere beauty, sturdy and rugged originality, plenty of dissonances, rich in themes, no soft platitudes of the clever craftsman, but harmonies of a heroic human quality. The whole work is of great breadth and vitality, abounding in sharp contrasts and phraseology, and, at times, startling to the ear. There is great wealth of high color—a rarity of intermediate shadings. The minors are leaden gray; the major harmonies warm primal tones.

In interesting contrast with Sibelius' symphony was the Brahms Festival Overture, a genial bright tone piece into which he has woven four German student songs: "Wir hatten gebauet ein Stattliches Haus," "Landesvater," "Was Kommt dort von der Hoh?" and the "Gaudeamus." This latter is given with great breadth and fullness of orchestral color. This overture delights the heart of every German who knows his Kammers-Buch.

No one would suspect, to see the stout, compact figure and the rather inert countenance of Fritz Kreisler, that here was a magician who could "pluck the heart out of the mystery music." There are many secrets to account for the magic of his art. Foremost is the wonderful variety and ineffable sweetness of tone. No living violinist surpasses—it is questionable if any equals—him in the delicacy and ethereal loveliness of tone that he brings from his violin. To sheer loveliness of tone production Mr. Kreisler adds virility, an ardent temperament, a healthy but vivid imagination, and unbounded technique, which he uses not for display, but as a means to an end.

Mr. Kreisler played Mendelssohn's E minor concerto for violin. It is one of the few works the critics have not torn to pieces in their conflict over Mendelssohn. This concerto is full of pleasing lyric subjects, the second movement especially being a slow, serene melody of great beauty.

Whether Mendelssohn "began as a genius and ended as a talent," whether he is banal or superficial, fussy or endlessly fluent, but hopelessly empty, didn't concern anybody yesterday. The subtle spell of the highest art to which the violin can be carried, supported and admirably balanced by a perfectly trained orchestra, was enough to persuade any audience into forgetfulness of critics. The programme closed with Glazounoff's Overture Solennelle, op. 73.

It was a rare afternoon for Washington music lovers.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

E 1884

A most distinguished audience filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony concert. Mrs. Taft entertained Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, and Mrs. Buckner Randolph in her box. Among the boxholders were the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Louden, Miss May Williams, and Mrs. Calderon Carlisle.

Others present were Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Meyer, Mrs. John Hay and Mrs. James Wadsworth, jr., Mrs. Edson Bradley, Mrs. Alfred Bates, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. B. H. Buckingham and Miss Freeman, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Fremont, Mrs. Wood, Miss Jessie Fremont, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and Miss Wilmer, Mrs. Pinchot and Miss Marjorie Colton, Mrs. Henry Corbin, Mrs. George Deering, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Rear Admiral Richardson Clover, U. S. N., retired; Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Nathaniel Wilson and Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Francisco Yanes, the Misses Sheridan, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. J Mandeville Carlisle, Mrs Hunting Jackson, Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. Robert Ralston, Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, Mrs. John Biddle, and Mrs. James Harlan and Miss Harlan.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Esta

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler the Solist in Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

1. Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major.
2. Beethoven........Concerto in D major For violin and orchestra.
3. Schumann...... Overture 80, "Genoveva"

In an often-quoted passage, Browning makes the extemporizing organist, Abt Vogler, speak of "the great C major of this life." The first two works of the Boston Orchestra's programme at the Academy last evening, gave the intent and crowded auditorium to feel that D major is the key for the eternal verities. It was strange how the work of Brahms and the work of Beethoven seemed linked not merely in key, but in temper and concept, for it was the peculiar genius of Doctor Muck's interpretation, abetted by the extraordinary facile and urbane performance of the instrumentalists, that the essential thought of the symphony was so clearly projected, in such salient outlines, that it seemed as simple as though it were the work of one of the elder masters and not the composition of the greatest of the modern writers. It had a positively patriarchal dignity and nobility, knowing how to unbend (like Bach at play with his children) in the delightful filigreed mischief of the "allegretto grazioso" that relieves the severer mood. What is the use of multiplying words about the way the men from Boston played? One actually forgot the means in the glorious and beautiful end. The message was made almost to obliterate the messengers. Perhaps that is the highest trimumph of music to lead one to oblivion of the musicians in the unalloyed consciousness of the loveliness of their handiwork.

Nothing could have been finer than the way in which the choir of first violins and Mr. Kreisler, as soloist "talked back" to each other in the first movement of the concerto; it was not merely accompanying, but answering. When the great violinist last played here, he labored under the grievous anxiety of the acute illness of his wife in New York. Yesterday evening it was a comparatively blithe and buoyant performer, who sent the celestial tones of his violin, with no parade or vanity, to the thoughtful hearing of those who came to listen to one of the sincerest and worthiest of artists. Kreisler; the man is hardly to be seperated from Kreisler, the virtuoso. His verile scholarship rejects the showy devices of the superficial trickster. The foundation of his art is solid, and its cornerstone is hard work that has not placed its trust in long hair and eccentricity.

The cadenzas (of his own making, of course) could only have been written by one who had thoroughly steeped himself in the tradition of Bethoven. A cadenza is really the soloist's opportunity to express the feeling with which the composer has inspired him. If his reflection is vain and empty, it will instantly show. At no point was ths most honest and faithful exponent of his text exhibiting himself. He was painstakingly setting forth the meaning of the master. He did this so unassumingly that one forgot that there was anything hard in the doing. The tone was never tremendous. But it was pure and sweet as the honey of Hybla. Always unforced and effortless, it carried beyond the rasping frenzies of many inferior players. In the Larghetto it was a lyric miracle of sound. What an inestimable advantage it is to any player to have such an accompaniment as that which surrounded—without enveloping—Mr. Kreisler last evening!

The Schumann overture fittinguy concluded a programme whose elements were so perfectly blended that even thirteen recalls and a display of boorishness on the part of certain persons in the gallery who should have been ejected could not disrupt the continuity of mood. During the scattering fire of applause that so unreasonably prolonged this demonstration Doctor Muck stood in complete insouciance conversing with the violas and 'cellos and did not return to the dais till the illbred outbreaks were over. So long an interval had elapsed that the A was sounded by the oboe and the players tuned their instruments again ere they were led by Doctor Muck, with unruffled dignity, to their final sonorous destination. Needless to remark, Doctor Muck was entirely in the right in his enforcement of the law and order of a symphony programme.

[102]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 3 - 1912
Est 1884

KREISTER TRIUMPHS

Great Violinist Arouses to Enthusiasm Boston Symphony Audience.

The second visit of the Boston Orchestra to this city since the transforming genius of Dr. Kore Muck has resumed full sway, attracted a capacity audience to the Academy of Music last night. The presence of Fritz Kreisler, one of the world's great violinists, as soloist, was a factor that sent many away disappointed at being unable to obtain seats.

A more attractive program would have been an impossibility. Although there were only three numbers, two of them the Brahms' Symphony in D major, and the Beethoven Concerto in D major, are both so lengthy that the concert was unusually prolonged. The rarely-heard and beautiful Schumann Overture to "Genovera" completed the list.

Dr. Muck has accomplished the seemingly impossible. He has transformed the Boston Orchestra from a state of mechanical perfection into an instrument so mobile and responsive that it is a thing o fwondrous power and beauty. Such sublety, life and expression as this great conductor is master of is witnessed only once in a decade. His reading of the Brahms' Symphony transcended anything heard from the Boston Orchestra since he left its conductorship. The close of the work found the audience in such a state of surcharged feeling that the Academy witnessed a scene seldom accorded a conductor. The musicians were obliged to acknowledge their part in the wonderful performance and no doubt they feel an exhileration equal to that manifest in the audience. The ease of Dr. Muck's conducting and the continuous dignity and poise of his demeanor are potent factors in his success. With the slightest motions, sometimes barely perceptible, he secures the responsiveness of the musicians and produces effects at once so fine and powerful that only astonishment and delight are left the auditor.

It is seldom that music lovers are privileged to hear two great musicians, so perfectly in accord, on one occasion. Such, however, was the treat afforded in the appearance of Fritz Kreisler with Dr. Muck last night. The Beethoven Concerto in D major belongs to a master of Kreisler's stature. It should never be essayed by one of less endowment. He played last night with all the technical skill, poetry and lofty interpretation at his command. Despite the nervous strain necessarily attendant on the long introductory orchestra passages, Kreisler showed with his first tone that he was master of himself and in his best form. If Dr. Muck received an ovation for his interpretation of the Brahms work Kreisler aroused a pandemonium that refused to be quelled. Again and again he was obliged to appear, but in accord with the rule of the organization no encore was permitted. This is a golden law on most occasions, but the brevity of Kreisler's present visit to America and the fact that his engagement binds him to appear only with the Boston Orchestra caused much disappointment at the enforcement of the rule. However, the evening was one of such exhilarating enjoyment that no comment should be passed on failure to provide more than was promised.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Esta 384

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Season's Second Concert Features Noted Violinist on Interesting Program.

Many who attended last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were evidently moved by a desire to hear Fritz Kreisler, the soloist. Many others doubtless were attracted by the announcement that Brahms' Second Symphony would be played. Whatever the motive may have been, it would be difficult for the most ardent of the violinist's worshippers or the most persistent stickler for a formal and purely orchestral program to have gone away dissatisfied with the evening's program. Mr. Muck's arrangement of the program was in itself admirable. Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major, was followed by Beethoven's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, and the program closed with the overture to "Genoveva," Schumann's forgotten opera. Taken as a whole, it might almost be regarded as a massive sonata.

The Bohemian violinist in no way disappointed his admirers. The admirable technique which he has hitherto shown is in no way impaired. The force and originality of his interpretation, coupled with the delicacy and gracile skill with which he interpreted the larghetto, the brilliancy of his free cadenzas and the generous comprehension of the concerto as a whole which he showed, were enthusiastically appreciated by his audience. Prolonged, sincere and deserved applause followed him, though it is a matter of little credit to our concert audiences that it should have degenerated into an apparently facetious, or at least capricious, attempt to see how many encore bows he might be made to take.

Atmospheric conditions were distinctly unfavorable to smoothness and integrity in orchestral playing, and the brilliancy and unity shown by the orchestra are therefore all the more remarkable. The symphony was rendered with admirable precision and fidelity to the composer's ideals. In itself an essentially joyous work, though of mannered and orderly sprightliness, Dr. Muck's interpretation faithfully preserved its spirit while not failing in original treatment of the first two movements. The "Genoveva" overture furnished a fitting close to a masterly concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 1 - 1
Estal 84

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia at the second Boston Symphony Concert, in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening. Kreisler, who has not been in America in three years, had no intention of coming to America this year, but last spring, when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Berlin, he persuaded the virtuoso to come for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony to play a series of concerts with that organization in Eastern cities, and, incidentally, two or three concerts of his own and two appearances with Western orchestras. Kreisler arrived in New York a fortnight ago and will sail for home the latter part of this month. Here he will play the Beethoven Concerto, in the interpretation of which he has, by general consent, no rival. He played this masterpiece with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of last month, and at both the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening he received ovations.

—Copyright by duPont.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Dr. Muck has placed only two really orchestral works on the program, the first being Brahms' symphony in D Major, No. 2, and the second Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The order of the program is as follows:

Brahms ....Symphony in D Major, No. 2
Beethoven ....Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 61
Schumann ....Overture, "Genoveva"

* * *

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
Es k, 1884

—✣—

The National Theater was filled with a large audience yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box, and was accompanied by Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, and Mrs. Randolph. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained a party in their box, including Congressman and Mrs. Longworth and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend. Mrs. Slocum and Mrs. Preston Gibson were among Mrs. McMillan's guests. Miss Mae Williams had a party in her box, as did Mrs. Leiter. With Mrs. Lisner was Mrs. Rudolph, Mrs. Ralph Barnard, Mr. Woodruff, and Miss Hartmann.

Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Meyer, Mrs. Wickersham, the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, Countess de Chambrun, Mrs. Bowen, Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, the Second German Secretary and Mme. Kienlin, the Spanish Minister and Senora de Riano, Miss Hildegarde Nagel, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Christian Hauge, Henri Martin, charge d'affaires for Switzerland; Lieutenant Commander Maximilian Burstyn, Austrian naval attache; Mr. and Mrs. Hemmick, the Rev. Ward Denys and the Misses Denys, Mrs. Deering, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Alfred Horstmann, Mrs. Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Miss Ruggles, Miss Marie Stevens, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Chatard, Mr. and Mrs. Livingston Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Thomas F. Bayard, Mrs. Biddle, Mrs. Marshal Field, Mrs. Carlisle, Mrs. John C. Fremont, Miss Fremont, William Bowie Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis, and Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Johnston.

—✣—

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 3 - 1912
E 1884

KREISLER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Famous Virtuoso Receives an Ovation After Playing a Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAM.

Brahms..Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Beethoven..Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, Op. 61.
Schumann..Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Conductor ...... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

It is doubtful whether the present generation of Philadelphia audiences has ever heard better violin playing than that of Fritz Kreisler, soloist last night at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. Generally acknowledged as the greatest living violinist, Mr. Kreisler was heard at his finest in the Beethoven Concerto, "D Major, Op. 61," which gave ample scope not only for a display of his technical mastery—as it does, indeed, to a very high degree—but equally afforded an opportunity for interpretation of the profoundly intelligent, one may even say of the profoundly inspired sort.

The authentic poetry of his playing was perhaps most evident in the conclusion of the first movement, where, after a long and complex working out, a cadenza leads up to the final statement of the theme, which concludes in a melodious and brilliant coda. A climax such as Mr. Kreisler achieved here is a thing to be remembered for a lifetime. The Larghetto movement he played with surpassing delicacy and charm; lyrically, as it must be played, and yet with the finest shadings, the clearest sense of small but important values.

The final Rondo, linked to this movement without a break, led up to a free cadenza, which Mr. Kreisler played with a brilliance that was astonishing. The applause following his performance lasted for seven minutes. It was undoubtedly sincere, but toward the end evidenced either unthinking bad taste or a mistaken sense of humor in its capricious demand for repeated acknowledgements from the artist. There was no encore.

Brahms Second Symphony.

The symphony of the evening was Brahms' "No. 2 D Major, Op. 73." Always a favorite with audiences, perhaps on account of the melodiousness of its themes and the lack of obscuring contrapuntal network, too often characteristic of the composer, it pleased doubly last night, thanks to Dr. Muck's eminently sympathetic rendering. His interpretation was in the classical, elegaic spirit of the work entirely; and he made of it (at least in the two opening movements) a continuously flowing stream of melody. This elegaic interpretation was perhaps a trifle overdone in the Adagio, the hardest to grasp of all four movements. Too much cannot be said for the rendering of the last movement, into which he infused dramatic vigor without departing from the essential mood of the work.

The program was concluded with Schumann's overture to his now forgotten opera, "Genoveva." It is rich in melodic material, but ill arranged for orchestra. Schumann was not an orchestral composer, and his deficiencies in this style are amply apparent in the overture. It was, of course, played with characteristic understanding and finish.

CAT'S FAR

Bureau in the World

From

Symphony Concert Sale.

The sale of seats for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, November 19th, opens at Steinert's Saturday morning. This will be one of the most important concerts of the year, for the orchestra will present as soloist that extraordinary master of the violin, Fritz Kreisler, who has not been heard here with the orchestra since the spring of 1901. Kreisler arrives in New York Saturday under exclusive and limited contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his first appearance in America will be in Providence.

Here he will play the Beethoven Concerto, the greatest of all works of its kind, demanding not merely a supreme knowledge of the technique of the instrument, but musicianship far beyond the requirements of any other concerto. The symphony will be the brilliant first of Sibelius, which was heard here during Dr. Muck's former engagement, and at that time made a profound impression, and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

stabl 84

BIG AUDIENCE IS ENTHRALLED BY FRITZ KREISLER

Noted Violinist Heard in Brahms Concerto With Boston Symphony.

Washingon paid tribute to the power of music as expressed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, and the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, by its attendance at the second matinee of the season, for which a distinguished audience assembled in the National Theater. Spontaneous applause greeted Mr. Muck, an applause particularly appropriate at the moment, for it is through him that the number that was about to be played was adapted into this country from Finland, its native place.

Sibelius, its composer, is a modern writer, and this is the first of his four symphonies.

The first Andante of Symphony No. 1 contains a hunting theme by the full orchestra. In the second, wood-winds are conspicuous in the plaintive airs ornamented by trills. The Allegro is grotesque, setting forth the rather heavy frolicksomeness of the north. The Fantasia is the gem of the series. Beginning with a melody treated in broad chords, the movement soon develops a tragic quality, which prevails throughout leading to a restless and passionate climax. There is much true music in this symphony, but the themes are brief. Restlessness is a characteristic, and oddities performed by groups of instruments connect very beautiful portions.

Finland is little more than a name to us, but the musical exponent, Sibelius, proves his kinship with the remainder of the musical world.

Kreisler Gets Ovation.

With Mendelssohn's Concerto came the great master of the violin to claim his own in welcome accorded a favorite. As the years pass, the occasional performances of the Concerto in E minor make it familiar, and familiarity is a potent factor in good music. So what happier combination could there have been than the facile violinist accompanied by an orchestra that played as one man in the music, tested by time, of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy?

Ample opportunity was offered for the most brilliant execution and for the softest legato strains. Thus Kreisler, whom many of the leading critics hold to be the greatest violinist in the world was at his wondrous best, and the orchestra, in following his pianissimo, seemed but a harmonious breath of wind. A mighty climax is a good thing; a fitting end.

But a delicate pianissimo is like a "still small voice." Great bursts of applause arose at the end of each movement, making each seem a finish.

Brahm's Concerto Heard.

The Brahme overture is related to an event in the life of the author. It is a thank offering to the university that conferred upon him a degree. He wove together the college songs, two German and one Latin. They are "We Have Built a Stately House," "Who Comes From Above," and "Gaudeamus Igitur." Each has a musical setting from which one may extract it, if possessed of a skillful ear, and a little college jollity is introduced.

The Russian overture by Glazounoff, with which the delightful concert closed, was an expression of happiness in 4-4 time. Broad harmonies moved up and down as they do in martial music. It was a suitable finish to a program of unusual excellence.

J. M.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Es 1884

FRITZ KREISLER AT LYRIC ON WEDNESDAY

Is Violinist Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the great Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the soloist, the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Wednesday night. This will be Kreisler's only appearance in Baltimore this season. He is in this country only a few weeks to play a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Those concerts in which he has appeared so far have been a series of ovations the like of which are seldom given to violinists.

Kreisler will play one of the greatest concertos in musical literature — the Brahms' Concerto in D major. Dr. Muck, conductor of the orchestra, has arranged a classical program for the concert. In its order, the program is as follows:

Symphony No. 8, in F major..Beethoven
Overture, Genoveva...........Schumann
Concerto in D, for violin and orchestra..........................Brahms Overture, Leonora, No. 3......Beethoven

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date [illegible]

Establ 84

Mr. Kreisler Is Still Master of the Violin

Even Impending War Doesn't Affect Austrian's Playing with Boston Symphony—Must Hurry Home.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler appeared last night in Carnegie Hall as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the present series. He has been absent two seasons, and as he is a reservist of the Austrian army he was near going to war instead of going to concerts. As it is, his stay in this country is limited, as he is to appear here only as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is then to go back to Europe as fast as possible. So his appearance in New York are but two in number, last night and to-morrow afternoon.

He is so well known here and so highly esteemed as a serious artist of the highest order that the audience rose to him when he appeared on the platform. The ovation was mild, however, compared to the enthusiasm which followed his playing of the Beethoven concerto. Then audience, orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, began applauding, and they kept Mr. Kreisler trotting back and forth and bowing fully five minutes. Considering the fact that Boston Symphony audiences are unusually reserved the ovation was more than an ordinary display of enthusiasm.

As for Mr. Kreisler's playing, it was an exalted, satisfying performance. Never indulging in mere virtuosity, Mr. Kreisler entered into the spirit of the great work and revealed the dramatic bigness of the first movement, the poetry of the second and the rugged playfulness of the third.

And there was such perfect harmony between soloist, conductor and orchestra that the whole performance was ideal in detail and magnificent in its sweep. Mr. Kreisler's tone was melting in quality in the tender parts of the work, while in the dramatic episodes it was virile. His intonation was good, his technique amazing, particularly in the first movement cadenza. But what was finer than all was the reading which he accorded to the famous concerto.

Dr. Muck conducted the orchestra in Mr. Jan Sibelius' "First Symphony," a work replete with tragedy and in which even the scherzo is grim in its humor. It is an interesting work, even though the gloom of some portions remind the hearer of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony. Most fascinating is the scherzo, a writing of great difficulty, which the orchestra played with ease.

The concluding number was Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," a work teeming with student songs, which was played brilliantly. It was a great concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date [illegible]

Estab 384

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN A WORK BY SIBELIUS

Finnish Composer's First Symphony Played With Superb Effect.

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

Plays Beethoven Violin Concerto With Truly Dazzling Brilliance.

The principal number on the programme of the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Carnegie Hall last night, was the first symphony of Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer. The work was performed for the first time in New York by the same orchestra on February 21, 1907, and it had not been heard again till last night. This symphony was created in 1899, and it is not saying a great deal for the enterprise or discernment of local conductors that it has received only two hearings in this city.

The first movement is built in a shape adopted by several modern wr iters. The themes are succinctly set forth and there is no repetition of the propositional part. The development begins immediately after the announcement. But once begun, it proceeds along lines perfectly orderly and it is clearly carried out. So much for the pattern of the first movement, upon which hang the law and the prophets in regard to form.

Sibelius has thematic ideas worth expanding and he treats them with splendid freedom and vigor. He does not write like a student bent on a musical demonstration, nor, as this writer said when the symphony was heard five years ago, does he seem to hold to that mighty edict of contemporary composers that all chords which are ugly are good [illegible] the [illegible] to the American public.

The melodies are born of the soil and nurtured among the people. They have frank beauty, they are clean and wholesome and they sing all through the orchestra. They are harmonized richly and attractively and the instrumental color scheme is delightful.

The slow movement is elegiac in character and has a fine open air, breadth of conception, while the scherzo has all the native vigor and penetrative style of music which has breathed its inspiration among the peasantry of beautiful Finland.

Doubtless one obstacle in the way of frequent repetition of this composition is its immense difficulty. Badly or even ordinarily performed it would surely lose much of its importance in the esteem of the hearer. It is just the kind of music in which the Boston orchestra revels. It calls for a band of virtuosi, from violins to tympani, not to mention the wood winds, which have to achieve marvels.

The symphony was played superbly last evening. The opulence of the general tone of the orchestra was matched by the splendor of the tints produced by the choirs when heard separately and by the exquisite finish of the utterances of the solo instruments. Dr. Muck brought to the music not only understanding and his unfailing mastery of the matter in hand but also manifest affection. His reading was a masterpiece. The other orchestral number was the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms, and between the two orchestral compositions stood the Beethoven violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo player.

Mr. Kreisler has come to America this season to play only a few concerts with the Bostonians. His appearance last evening and that of to-morrow afternoon provide the only opportunities for New Yorkers to hear him. The audience was most demonstrative in its expression of an approval which was evoked by a remarkable performance.

It would perhaps not be difficult to raise questions about the reading of the first movement, in which the impetuous temperament of this fiery player led him to rob Beethoven's music of some of its lofty dignity. On the other hand it cannot be denied that in tonal splendor and in technical brilliancy the movement offered much to excite listeners. Particularly dazzling was the stupendously difficult and effective cadenza, doubtless Mr. Kreisler's own, which was played with such certainty of finger and such boldness of bowing that it fairly took one's breath away.

In the slow movement the violinist was calmer and more self-contained, and here he rose close to the level of Beethoven. Indeed in the final pages he was worthy of every measure of the immortal song. The finale of the concerto was gloriously played, with incisive rhythm, splendid tone, an infinite variety of exquisite nuance, and again a glittering cadenza technically appalling and musically artistic.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

ork, 1884

KREISLER BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Violinist and Orchestra Share Honors in a Brilliant Concert.

Fritz Kreisler returned to New York last night as soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall. That meant, of course, a packed house. For the famous Viennese violinist has a host of admirers in this city, all hungry for delights they have had to forego for several years. Besides, to-morrow's matinee of Dr. Muck and his band will furnish their only other opportunity of hearing Kreisler this season, as he will limit his activities in his brief visit in America to appearances with the great orchestra from the Hub.

That Kreisler made a profound impression in Beethoven's violin concerto, even if one discounts some of the applause he evoked as amicable tributes of welcome to a returning artist, cannot be questioned. His playing had all its old-time vigor, energy and rhythmical zest; his performance of his own cadenzas, so crowded with difficulties, had all the technical brilliancy and assurance, if not all the impeccable accuracy of finger, which had amazed and delighted his hearers in the past.

Yet it must be confessed that Kreisler's interpretation of the concerto suffered from a certain shortness of breath. Evidently the violinist was keyed at too high nervous tension, and so the majestic pages of Beethoven's music, pierced by the silvery and penetrating tone he drew from his instrument, lost something of their intrinsic grandeur and breadth. They tingled and throbbed with vitality; but they lacked the repose, dignity and emotional sweep of an interpretative mind free of all technical shackles, absolutely and solely absorbed in the message of the master.

Too much, however, cannot be said in praise of the wonderful assistance the Boston Orchestra gave under Dr. Muck's alert and vigilant direction. That incomparable organization, as a matter of fact, and its great conductor, too carried off the honors of the evening in the superb performance of the first number on the programme, Sibelius's stupendously difficult and original Symphony No. 1 in E minor. It was Dr. Muck who first produced that masterful work five years ago in New York, and he succeeded again last night in impressing connoisseurs [illegible]

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York. DEC 6
Date
Establish

Boſtoner Symphonie-Concert.

Eines der ſchönſten und wonnereichſten Concerte war es, das die Boſtoner uns bisher geboten haben, das geſtrige in Carnegie Hall, das Sibelius Erſte Symphonie, Brahms' „Akademiſche Feſtouverture“ und das Beethoven'ſche Violin-Concert, geſpielt von Fritz Kreisler, brachte. Das anregende Programm, die bewunderungswürdige Kunſt Dr. Mucks, der virtuoſe Glanz ſeines Orcheſters, der bei jedesmaligem Anhören wieder entzückt und fortreißt, und die reife und blendende Virtuoſität Kreisler's ſchloſſen ſich geſtern zu einem Vollakkord des Erfolgs zuſammen, wie er nicht allzuhäufig erzielt wird.

Sibelius' Orcheſtermuſik gehört im Gegenſatz zu ſeinem friſchen und kräftigen Muſiziren in ſeinen Liedern noch immer etwas zum Nebuloſen und Widerhaarigen. Es iſt eben reine Heimathskunſt, Aeußerung einer Volkskultur, die uns recht ferne liegt. In Melodie und Rhythmus waltet da eine Volksſeele in ihrer träumeriſchen Sehnſucht, ſüßen Melancholie, ihrem tiefem Schmerz, ihrer Reſignation und ihrem verhaltenen Trotz. Tiefernſt, düſter, grau in grau iſt dieſe Muſik, der man gelegentlich gar zu gerne einen belebenden Sonnenſtrahl wünſchen würde.

Namentlich des Meiſters Erſte Symphonie iſt tönendes Finnland, in der Form ſehr frei, in der Thematik bald kräftig und derb, bald ſentimental und pathetiſch; vornehm in der Harmonik, aber recht borſtig und ungelenk in der Orcheſtrirung. Es war bewunderungswürdig, wie Muck das Ungelenke und Ungefügte dieſer Tonmalerei virtuos behandelte, der Monotonie durch kräftige Farbengebung ſteuerte und das Fremdartige intereſſant erſcheinen ließ. Und das Orcheſter hat ſelten glänzender und hingebender geſpielt, ſo daß es mit Recht einen Theil des reichen Beifalls auf ſich nehmen konnte. Die Aufnahme des Werkes war geſtern eine ſehr warme, denn nach allen Sätzen zollte man ſtarken Beifall und zum Schluß mußte Dr. Muck wiederholt erſcheinen und danken.

Fritz Kreisler mit Beethoven's Konzert. Es iſt ein Werk des Optimiſmus, wie ihn der ſchwergeprüfte und grillengeplagte Meiſter nicht häufig ſo ſchrankenlos in tönendes Gold niedergelegt hat. Und das iſt ja ſo recht eine Sache für Kreisler, den Künſtler lebensbejahenden Kraftgefühls.

Er ſpielt das Werk als Künſtler größten Stiles und perſönlichen Temperaments mit ſonnigem Glanz, Leichtigkeit und Abgeklärtheit einfach wundervoll. Den erſten Satz groß und hinreißend und die freie Phantaſie der Kadenz mit blühendſter Phantaſie. Welche Sangesfreudigkeit im Mittelſatz, welche Nachtigallentöne ſeiner Violine, welch' herrlicher, aus Kraft und Anmuth geborener Ton. Sprudelnde Friſche, fortreißender Rhythmus und die Ausſchöpfung aller humoriſtiſchen Möglichkeiten zeichneten das Rondo aus. Kreisler, ſchon mit einer Ovation empfangen, wurde geradezu begeiſtert gefeiert.

Die weihevollen Töne der muſikaliſchen Doktor-Diſſertation Brahms', — ſo kann man ſeine, der Univerſität Breslau als Dank für den ihm verliehenen Doktorhut gewidmete „Akademiſche Feſtouverture“ wohl nennen — beendeten das Programm. Sie wurde mit natürlichſter Bravour und feinſter Abſchattirung geſpielt. Es geht dabei wohl manchem anderen wie mir: alte Erinnerungen werden wach, und man fährt gelegentlich gar wie zufällig über das feuchte Auge, wenn die altlieben Studentenlieder ertönen, „Wir hatten gebaut ein ſtattliches Haus“, der „Landesvater“, das von den grunzenden Fagotts perſiflirte „Was kommt dort von der Höh'“ und zum Schluß in der Brillantbeleuchtung des vollen Orcheſters das weihevolle „Gaudeamus“. Es war ein feſtlicher Abſchluß eines denkwürdigen Konzerts. Der kritiſche Beruf bringt manch' eine Mühe und Laſt mit ſich, aber es giebt der verſöhnenden Momente gar viele: am Nachmittag Yſaye, am Abend Kreisler. Schade, daß nicht viel mehr Muſiknarren beides genießen konnten.

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date
Establ

THE BOSTON ORCHEST

A Symphony by a Finn and Concerto by Beethoven.

AN APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE

The Return of Fritz Kreisler Enthusiastically Welcomed Last Night.

To judge by the conduct of the audience at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, the more music New York has the more enthusiastically the musicians from Boston are welcomed. The wonder is not great, for a multiplicity of concerts is not necessarily an evidence of excellence, and nothing has yet occurred to indicate to the lovers of the highest class of orchestral music in New York that the visits of the Boston orchestra are in danger of becoming superfluous. Least of all could such a thing be imagined in connection with the solo feature of last night's meeting, a feature which could more easily be spared at these concerts than at any other series in this concert-ridden city. To say at once all that is necessary, though not all that it would be a pleasure to say if time allowed, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the concerto for violin by Beethoven. It was the combination which carried the greatest jo to the minds and hearts of the listener brilliant as the achievement of the so performer was; and it was superlativel brilliant and thrilling, especially in ever thing that followed after the first no of the cadenza in the first movemen Until then a captious critic, with his ea still full of the fine violin performance which have been the pervading feature the concert season thus far, might hav been pardoned a feeling that Mr. Kreisl was a little too much under the domin tion of that spirit of unrest which threatening to become a weariness to t flesh and a curse to the spirit in th period of nerve-rasping musical activity. But when Mr. Kreisler began Beethoven's serene romance there were peace and healing on the wings of the music at once and happiness and refreshment.

The concert began with the first of Sibelius's four symphonies and concluded, after the concerto, with the "Academic" overture by Brahms. Three of the four symphonies have been heard in New York. Mr. Altschuler and the Russian Orchestra have been peculiarly industrious during half a dozen years in making propaganda for the Finnish composer, who by all the principles supposed to govern musical creativeness ought to be more Swedish than Russian, but who has nevertheless managed to stamp an individuality upon much of his music which the lovers of nationalism in music have pretty generally agreed to recognize as characteristically Finnish. The Finns are an older race in the great northern peninsula of Europe than any of the Teutonic peoples located there and belong to an entirely different stock. Racially they may be said to have more in common with their present masters than they have with the Swedes, whose culture they imbibed for seven centuries before the allied powers handed them over to Russia, a little more than a century ago, for they are distant kinsmen of the Huns. But all that is left of the primitive elements in their literature and music is to be found in their folksong, and this has not tinctured their artistic creations very deeply. What has been recognized as national in the considerable number of compositions of Sibelius has been a gentle melancholy, the atmosphere of the land which its people fondly and beautifully call Suomi, and a feeling for melodic grace which is not characteristic of the Muscovite art which has colored the style of Sibelius, and which spoke out most forcibly last night in the frequently rude humor of the scherzo, which seems to us the most spontaneous and excellent portion of the symphony. But there was much to be grateful for in the frank melodiousness of the work, though it was occasionally overwhelmed by over-elaboration. An eloquent performance won for it as grateful a recognition as it did when Dr. Muck played it for us first, a little more than five years ago.

H. E. K.

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 6 - 1912
Establish

Fritz Kreisler Gets Big Welcome at Carnegie Hall

Carnegie Hall had its standees last night and, to its last rail-clinger, this great audience not only gave Fritz Kreisler a greeting that must have touched him warmly, but after his performance infused into its applause a tinge of fervent thankfulness to whatever powers there be in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their ability in persuading this violinist to visit America this season.

It may be that the call of the Boston orchestra, standing as it does among the few pre-eminent bodies of the sort anywhefe, may have taken on the force of a command to Mr. Kreisler. And it may be that Dr. Carl Muck, being now at the orchestra's head, made persuasion doubly persuasive. But in any case thanks are due that Mr. Kreisler saw his way clear to making the voyage from Europe for this one engagement on this side of the Atlantic.

The violinist last night played the Beethoven concerto. Many violinists play it nowadays, but comparisons fail after Mr. Kreisler had drawn his bow over the strings a dozen times. Joachim was the great exponent of the Beethoven concerto for a former generation, but it would seem that now Kreisler has made this work of beauty peculiarly his own.

There are difficulties enough in the concerto to stagger even a great technician, but these difficulties are not merely present for their own sake. In spite of its demands upon the violinist's technical equipment his virtuosity may not appear spectacular. For the concerto demands a musician and a poet in one, who has the penetrative powers of both.

And this is what the concerto found last night in Mr. Kreisler.

One might shift one's viewpoint to details and speak of the virility with which he endowed the allegro, the masculine tenderness with which he played the larghetto and the stirring power in the rondo. But the greater the performance the weaker does cold type become. Once more he played his own cadenza, and repeated hearings of it make it seem a truly fine and noble tribute to the great one of Bonn, so impeccable is its taste, so sound its musicianship and so filled with the blood of life that pulses through the concerto itself.

Dr. Muck and his orchestra added their share to the rounded beauty of the whole performance. Before Mr. Kreisler appeared, Dr. Muck played the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, the most eminent composer of the day in Scandinavia. He is a Finn, and now is at the head of the Department of Music in the University of Helsingfors.

This symphony of Sibelius alone proclaims him one of the foremost musicians of the day. He has frequently received the blighting label of "nationalist" in music, but he is no more nationalist than Tschaikowsky and less so than Greig. He merely speaks in an idiom that is naturally of his nationality. The symphony is thus filled with uncommon rhythms, exotic themes and nge harmonies, but its content eps the wide horizon of common anity.

is music attains magnificence in its ultuous power, and its originality ke a refreshing oasis in a desert of ation. It bristles with difficulties ch the orchestra mastered with virity, and Dr. Muck saw to it that message received full proclama- . Brahm's "Academic Overture," itedly played, ended the promme.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date
Estal 884

Under demure brown covers of an innocent-looking Boston Symphony programme book, which came by mail to some New Yorkers just as the famous orchestra was arriving in town to-day, there was a severe jolt for those who think Boston always takes itself seriously. The types had not gone crazy. For here was food for thought, beans replacing brains, hash in place of hasheesh, a menu where the music was before. It was the Papyrus Club's dinner in honor of the return of Dr. Karl Muck, or "Muck Zuruck," as set fort with hysterical and nondescripti notes by P. B. Ale."

The programme began with a Ma tini obligato and Vermicelli variatio on the "primal beefstock theme hande down from the cavemen." Then fo lowed an intermezzo in scallops attributed to T. Whorf, "born in Boston, 1770, ancestor of the codfish aristocracy." As well as noisette of tenderloin, Bordelaise, and ices, Gelati. The gastronomic symphony closed with camembert, von Liederkranz's cafe, Le Noir, and "Les Cigares de Desir," Frederick S. Converse, as his merry townsmen misspelled him. There was even the typical Hale entr'acte, devoted to "The Turkey Trotte."

It's no joke to New York to-day to find there isn't a seat unsubscribed in either Carnegie Hall to-night and the Saturday matinee, or the Brooklyn Academy to-morrow. The cleverness of C. A. Ellis's exclusive contract with a star, Fritz Kreisler, to reenforce his popular conductor, is only now beginning to appear. The price of a season subscription was said to have been paid for single tickets here, and the orchestra and soloist could easily fill the hall for an extra concert if they were so inclined.

Any peaceful disposal of the Balkan war will be good news to Fritz Kreisler, the Hungarian violinist, who makes his only appearances in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Thursday and Saturday. Up to the time of his sailing, there was doubt whether he would be able to come to America at all.

Kreisler is an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian Army, and had received notice to hold himself in readiness to join his regiment, which is one of the Uhlan regiments of the service. Arrangements were made, however, by which he was released for the time.

He was only allowed to sail with the understanding that, should the mobilization of the entire Austrian Army take place, he should be ready to sail on short notice.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date
Esta 884

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's brilliant programmes, and the interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist Fritz Kreisler. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler is in America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his appearances are limited in the East to concerts of that organization. During the week he is soloist at all the Boston Symphony concerts on its second Southern trip.

Here he will play that most notable work for the violin, Bruch's first concerto in G minor.

The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The second symphony, of which Mr. Fiedler was so fond, is better known than the first, but many connoisseurs regard the first as the greater work and more truly characteristic of the genius of the composer. Sibelius in all his music reflects the traits of his country and his people. Often it is stern, harsh and rugged, yet these qualities are offset always by bursts of extraordinary lyric beauty. Sibelius is one of the few composers of our day who have something to say of their own and are able to say it in an idiom of their own. He has copied from no one, but works out his own problems in his own way. The other numbers will be Brahms' jolly "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's pompous and splendid "Ouverture Solennelle." The programme in its proper order is as follows:—

Symphony No. 1 in E minor..............	Sibelius
Overture, "Academic Festival"..........	Brahms
Concerto for violin in G minor, No. 1......	Bruch
Ouverture Solennelle	Glazounoff

From
Address NOV 19 1912
Date
Est 1884

Die Nachfolge Mahler's.

Aus Wien kommt die Nachricht, daß Direktor Hans Gregor den Generalmuſikdirektor Dr. Karl Muck, der zur Zeit das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter leitet, als Nachfolger Mahler's und Walter's für den Dirigentenpoſten an der Wiener Hofoper gewonnen hat. Kapellmeiſter Bruno Walter geht als Nachfolger Dr. Felix Mottl's nach München und Dr. Muck ſoll Walter's Poſten antreten.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York. DEC 6 1912
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Concert.

Eines der ſchönſten und wonnereichſten Concerte war es, das die Boſtoner uns bisher geboten haben, das geſtrige in Carnegie Hall, das Sibelius Erſte Symphonie, Brahms' „Akademiſche Feſtouverture" und das Beethoven'ſche Violin-Concert, geſpielt von Fritz Kreisler, brachte. Das anregende Programm, die bewunderungswürdige Kunſt Dr. Mucks, der virtuoſe Glanz ſeines Orcheſters, der bei jedesmaligem Anhören wieder entzückt und fortreißt, und die reife und blendende Virtuoſität Kreisler's ſchloſſen ſich geſtern zu einem Vollakkord des Erfolgs zuſammen, wie er nicht allzuhäufig erzielt wird.

Sibelius' Orcheſtermuſik gehört im Gegenſatz zu ſeinem friſchen und kräftigen Muſiziren in ſeinen Liedern noch immer etwas zum Nebuloſen und Widerhaarigen. Es iſt eben reine Heimathskunſt, Aeußerung einer Volkskultur, die uns recht ferne liegt. In Melodie und Rhythmus waltet da eine Volksſeele in ihrer träumeriſchen Sehnſucht, ſüßen Melancholie, ihrem tiefem Schmerz, ihrer Reſignation und ihrem verhaltenen Trotz. Tiefernſt, düſter, grau in grau iſt dieſe Muſik, der man gelegentlich gar zu gerne einen belebenden Sonnenſtrahl wünſchen würde.

Namentlich des Meiſters Erſte Symphonie iſt tönendes Finnland, in der Form ſehr frei, in der Thematik bald kräftig und derb, bald ſentimental und pathetiſch; vornehm in der Harmonik, aber recht borſtig und ungelenk in der Orcheſtrirung. Es war bewunderungswürdig, wie Muck das Ungelenke und Ungefügte dieſer Tonmalerei virtuos behandelte, der Monotonie durch kräftige Farbengebung ſteuerte und das Fremdartige intereſſant erſcheinen ließ. Und das Orcheſter hat ſelten glänzender und hingebender geſpielt, ſo daß es mit Recht einen Theil des reichen Beifalls auf ſich nehmen konnte. Die Aufnahme des Werkes war geſtern eine ſehr warme, denn nach allen Sätzen zollte man ſtarken Beifall und zum Schluß mußte Dr. Muck wiederholt erſcheinen und danken.

Fritz Kreisler mit Beethoven's Konzert. Es iſt ein Werk des Optimismus, wie ihn der ſchwergeprüfte und grillengeplagte Meiſter nicht häufig ſo ſchrankenlos in tönendes Gold niedergelegt hat. Und das iſt ja ſo recht eine Sache für Kreisler, den Künſtler lebensbejahenden Kraftgefühls.

Er ſpielt das Werk als Künſtler größten Stiles und perſönlichen Temperaments mit ſonnigem Glanz, Leichtigkeit und Abgeklärtheit einfach wundervoll. Den erſten Satz groß und hinreißend und die freie Phantaſie der Kadenz mit blühendſter Phantaſie. Welche Sangesfreudigkeit im Mittelſatz, welche Nachtigallentöne ſeiner Violine, welch' herrlicher, aus Kraft und Anmuth geborener Ton. Sprudelnde Friſche, fortreißender Rhythmus und die Ausſchöpfung aller humoriſtiſchen Möglichkeiten zeichneten das Rondo aus. Kreisler, ſchon mit einer Ovation empfangen, wurde geradezu begeiſtert gefeiert.

Die weihevollen Töne der muſikaliſchen Doktor-Diſſertation Brahms', — ſo kann man ſeine, der Univerſität Breslau als Dank für den ihm verliehenen Doktorhut gewidmete „Akademiſche Feſtouverture" wohl nennen — beendeten das Programm. Sie wurde mit natürlichſter Bravour und feinſter Abſchattirung geſpielt. Es geht dabei wohl manchem anderen wie mir: alte Erinnerungen werden wach, und man fährt gelegentlich gar wie zufällig über das feuchte Auge, wenn die altlieben Studentenlieder ertönen, „Wir hatten gebaut ein ſtattliches Haus", der „Landesvater", das von den grunzenden Fagotts perſiflirte „Was kommt dort von der Höh'" und zum Schluß in der Brillantbeleuchtung des vollen Orcheſters das weihevolle „Gaudeamus". Es war ein feſtlicher Abſchluß eines denkwürdigen Konzerts. Der kritiſche Beruf bringt manch' eine Mühe und Laſt mit ſich, aber es giebt der verſöhnenden Momente gar viele: am Nachmittag Yſaye, am Abend Kreisler. Schade, daß nicht viel mehr Muſiknarren beides genießen konnten.

H.

Establish

From N. Y. Evg. Staatszeitung
Address NOV 19 1912
Date

Die Nachfolge Mahler's.

Aus Wien kommt die Nachricht, daß Direktor Hans Gregor den Generalmuſikdirektor Dr. Karl Muck, der zur Zeit das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter leitet, als Nachfolger Mahler's und Walter's für den Dirigentenpoſten an der Wiener Hofoper gewonnen hat. Kapellmeiſter Bruno Walter geht als Nachfolger Dr. Felix Mottl's nach München und Dr. Muck ſoll Walter's Poſten antreten.

Est 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHEST

A Symphony by a Finn and Concerto by Beethoven.

AN APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE

The Return of Fritz Kreisler Enthusiastically Welcomed Last Night.

To judge by the conduct of the audience at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, the more music New York has the more enthusiastically the musicians from Boston are welcomed. The wonder is not great, for a multiplicity of concerts is not necessarily an evidence of excellence, and nothing has yet occurred to indicate to the lovers of the highest class of orchestral music in New York that the visits of the Boston orchestra are in danger of becoming superfluous. Least of all could such a thing be imagined in connection with the solo feature of last night's meeting, a feature which could more easily be spared at these concerts than at any other series in this concert-ridden city. To say at once all that is necessary, though not all that it would be a pleasure to say if time allowed, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the concerto for violin by Beethoven. It was the combination which carried the greatest joy to the minds and hearts of the listeners, brilliant as the achievement of the solo performer was; and it was superlatively brilliant and thrilling, especially in everything that followed after the first note of the cadenza in the first movement. Until then a captious critic, with his ears still full of the fine violin performances, which have been the pervading feature of the concert season thus far, might have been pardoned a feeling that Mr. Kreisler was a little too much under the domination of that spirit of unrest which is threatening to become a weariness to the flesh and a curse to the spirit in this period of nerve-rasping musical activity. But when Mr. Kreisler began Beethoven's serene romance there were peace and healing on the wings of the music at once and happiness and refreshment.

The concert began with the first of Sibelius's four symphonies and concluded, after the concerto, with the "Academic" overture by Brahms. Three of the four symphonies have been heard in New York. Mr. Altschuler and the Russian Orchestra have been peculiarly industrious during half a dozen years in making propaganda for the Finnish composer, who by all the principles supposed to govern musical creativeness ought to be more Swedish than Russian, but who has nevertheless managed to stamp an individuality upon much of his music which the lovers of nationalism in music have pretty generally agreed to recognize as characteristically Finnish. The Finns are an older race in the great northern peninsula of Europe than any of the Teutonic peoples located there and belong to an entirely different stock. Racially they may be said to have more in common with their present masters than they have with the Swedes, whose culture they imbibed for seven centuries before the allied powers handed them over to Russia, a little more than a century ago, for they are distant kinsmen of the Huns. But all that is left of the primitive elements in their literature and music is to be found in their folksong, and this has not tinctured their artistic creations very deeply. What has been recognized as national in the considerable number of compositions of Sibelius has been a gentle melancholy, the atmosphere of the land which its people fondly and beautifully call Suomi, and a feeling for melodic grace which is not characteristic of the Muscovite art which has colored the style of Sibelius, and which spoke out most forcibly last night in the frequently rude humor of the scherzo, which seems to us the most spontaneous and excellent portion of the symphony. But there was much to be grateful for in the frank melodiousness of the work, though it was occasionally overwhelmed by overelaboration. An eloquent performance won for it as grateful a recognition as it did when Dr. Muck played it for us first, a little more than five years ago.

H. E. K.

Estabi

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 6 - 1912

Fritz Kreisler Gets Big Welcome at Carnegie Hall

Carnegie Hall had its standees last night and, to its last rail-clinger, this great audience not only gave Fritz Kreisler a greeting that must have touched him warmly, but after his performance infused into its applause a tinge of fervent thankfulness to whatever powers there be in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their ability in persuading this violinist to visit America this season.

It may be that the call of the Boston orchestra, standing as it does among the few pre-eminent bodies of the sort anywhere, may have taken on the force of a command to Mr. Kreisler. And it may be that Dr. Carl Muck, being now at the orchestra's head, made persuasion doubly persuasive. But in any case thanks are due that Mr. Kreisler saw his way clear to making the voyage from Europe for this one engagement on this side of the Atlantic.

The violinist last night played the Beethoven concerto. Many violinists play it nowadays, but comparisons fail after Mr. Kreisler had drawn his bow over the strings a dozen times. Joachim was the great exponent of the Beethoven concerto for a former generation, but it would seem that now Kreisler has made this work of beauty peculiarly his own.

There are difficulties enough in the concerto to stagger even a great technician, but these difficulties are not merely present for their own sake. In spite of its demands upon the violinist's technical equipment his virtuosity may not appear spectacular. For the concerto demands a musician and a poet in one, who has the penetrative powers of both.

And this is what the concerto found last night in Mr. Kreisler.

One might shift one's viewpoint to details and speak of the virility with which he endowed the allegro, the masculine tenderness with which he played the larghetto and the stirring power in the rondo. But the greater the performance the weaker does cold type become. Once more he played his own cadenza, and repeated hearings of it make it seem a truly fine and noble tribute to the great one of Bonn, so impeccable is its taste, so sound its musicianship and so filled with the blood of life that pulses through the concerto itself.

Dr. Muck and his orchestra added their share to the rounded beauty of the whole performance. Before Mr. Kreisler appeared, Dr. Muck played the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, the most eminent composer of the day in Scandinavia. He is a Finn, and now is at the head of the Department of Music in the University of Helsingfors.

This symphony of Sibelius alone proclaims him one of the foremost musicians of the day. He has frequently received the blighting label of "nationalist" in music, but he is no more nationalist than Tschaikowsky and less so than Greig. He merely speaks in an idiom that is naturally of his nationality. The symphony is thus filled with uncommon rhythms, exotic themes and nge harmonics, but its content eps the wide horizon of common anity.

is music attains magnificence in its ultuous power, and its originality ke a refreshing oasis in a desert of ation. It bristles with difficulties h the orchestra mastered with virity, and Dr. Muck saw to it that message received full proclama. Brahm's "Academic Overture," itedly played, ended the programme.

Establish

EVG. SUN
ss: New York

Under demure brown covers of an inocent-looking Boston Symphony programme book, which came by mail to me New Yorkers just as the famous hestra was arriving in town to-day, was a severe jolt for those who Boston always takes itself sey. The types had not gone crazy. or here was food for thought, beans replacing brains, hash in place of hasheesh, a menu where the music was before. It was the Papyrus Club's dinner in honor of the return of Dr. Karl Muck, or "Muck Zuruck," as set forth with hysterical and nondescriptive notes by P. B. Ale."

The programme began with a Martini obligato and Vermicelli variation on the "primal beefstock theme handed down from the cavemen." Then followed an intermezzo in scallops attributed to T. Whorf, "born in Boston, 1770, ancestor of the codfish aristocracy." As well as noisette of tenderloin, Bordelaise, and ices, Gelati. The gastronomic symphony closed with camembert, von Liederkranz's cafe, Le Noir, and "Les Cigares de Desir," Frederick S. Conserve, as his merry townsmen misspelled him. There was even the typical Hale entr'acte, devoted to "The Turkey Trotte."

It's no joke to New York to-day to find there isn't a seat unsubscribed in either Carnegie Hall to-night and the Saturday matinee, or the Brooklyn Academy to-morrow. The cleverness of C. A. Ellis's exclusive contract with a star, Fritz Kreisler, to reenforce his popular conductor, is only now beginning to appear. The price of a season subscription was said to have been paid for single tickets here, and the orchestra and soloist could easily fill the hall for an extra concert if they were so inclined.

Any peaceful disposal of the Balkan war will be good news to Fritz Kreisler, the Hungarian violinist, who makes his only appearances in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Thursday and Saturday. Up to the time of his sailing, there was doubt whether he would be able to come to America at all.

Kreisler is an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian Army, and had received notice to hold himself in readiness to join his regiment, which is one of the Uhlan regiments of the service. Arrangements were made, however, by which he was released for the time.

He was only allowed to sail with the understanding that, should the mobilization of the entire Austrian Army take place, he should be ready to sail on short notice.

884

HERALD
s: New York
Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's brilliant programmes, and the interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist Fritz Kreisler. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler is in America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his appearances are limited in the East to concerts of that organization. During the week he is soloist at all the Boston Symphony concerts on its second Southern trip.

Here he will play that most notable work for the violin, Bruch's first concerto in G minor.

The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The second symphony, of which Mr. Fiedler was so fond, is better known than the first, but many connoisseurs regard the first as the greater work and more truly characteristic of the genius of the composer. Sibelius in all his music reflects the traits of his country and his people. Often it is stern, harsh and rugged, yet these qualities are offset always by bursts of extraordinary lyric beauty. Sibelius is one of the few composers of our day who have something to say of their own and are able to say it in an idiom of their own. He has copied from no one, but works out his own problems in his own way. The other numbers will be Brahms' jolly "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's pompous and splendid "Ouverture Solennelle." The programme in its proper order is as follows:—

Symphony No. 1 in E minor	Sibelius
Overture, "Academic Festival"	Brahms
Concerto for violin in G minor, No. 1	Bruch
Ouverture Solennelle	Glazounoff

Esta 884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date DEC 6 - 1912
Esta … 884

Fritz Kreisler reappeared (after an absence of about two years) last night as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The co-operation of the orchestra itself was an immense aid in the triumph, which he won by his almost faultless and enchanting rendering of the Beethoven Concerto in D major—a work which, though repeated many times, gains on each hearing.

Beauty of tone, technical excellence, virtuosity of an exalted kind and poetic feeling were exemplified in Kreisler's interpretation of this masterpiece. Toward the end of the allegro (the first movement) Kreisler introduced a candenza, of most complex character, which was really musical.

The distinguished Viennese had a reception which did honor to himself and the discernment of his audience.

As ever, the Bostonians, under the direction of Dr. Muck, played with splendid fire and wonderful proportion. The purely orchestral numbers in a well-balanced programme were the impassioned and picturesque first symphony of Sibelius, in E minor, and the familiar "Academic Festival Overture" of Brahms. Every seat in the vast hall and all the standing room were filled last night.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date
Estal … 34

Fritz Kreisler Plays With the Boston Orchestra

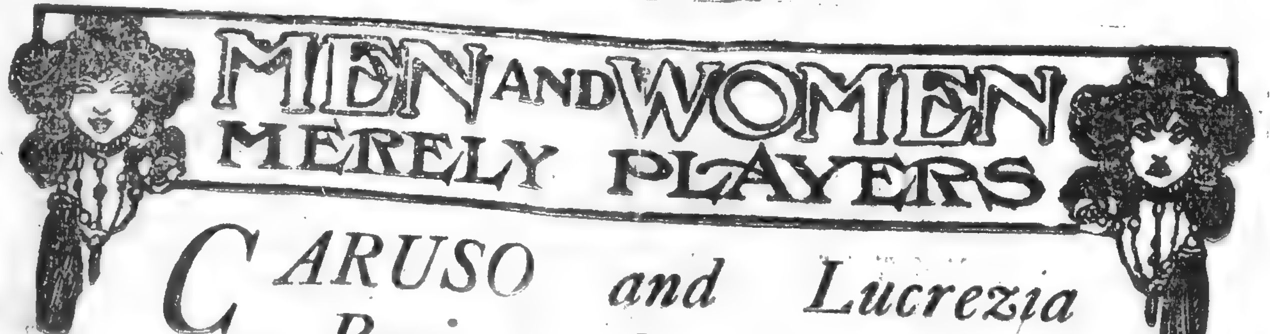
BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is become a rival of the opera as an attraction for New York people of fashion. At the second evening concert of its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night there was not only a crowded house—the subscription has provided for that—but the occupants of the boxes and of the orchestra floor made an appearance of exceptional brilliance and the carriage calls were a record, the waiting line of vehicles extending across Fifty-seventh street as far as Fifth avenue.

Fritz Kreisler, the renowned Austrian violinist, was the soloist. He has been brought to America this year by the Boston organization to play only at a limited number of its concerts. He will not be heard in recital. Mr. Kreisler took part in the Beethoven concerto in D major. A trifle nervous at first, if that were possible for one of his experience and reputation, he soon became confident and played with a breadth of comprehension, a volume of tone, a brilliancy of execution that had an electrifying influence upon the audience. His cadenza near the close of the first movement was more showy than solid; but his easy mastery of its technical difficulties was cause for marvel. At the end he was recalled and applauded almost with vehemence no less than five times, something of a record for a Boston Symphony audience.

Dr. Muck began his programme with Sibelius's first symphony, a work of charm and originality, with surprises here and there, but homogeneous and compelling. This he directed with spirit and power, letting loose his brasses and drums without fear. His conducting of the concerto was admirable and in both numbers his fine musicians played with inspiring tone and confidence. Brahms's Academic Festival overture was the last number.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date DEC 6 - 1912
Establishe…



CARUSO and Lucrezia Bori at the Opera and Kreisler, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall.

TO the long, long chorus of praise that has gone up over the performances in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra another strophe must be added for the brilliant performance in Carnegie Hall last night.

This time not only the unanimity of the players and the power of the conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, must be praised, but an extra thanksgiving must be uttered for the return of Fritz Kreisler and for the choice of the Beethoven concerto for violin as his introductory medium.

The violinist played the golden measures with all the fire of his nature. It was a superb reading, beautifully clear in its phrasing and intonation, yet always pulsing with passionate vitality. The orchestra, as was to be expected, seemed inspired by the soloist to an even finer ensemble than usual.

The concert opened with the first symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer, a superb work in four movements, which Dr. Muck presented here in an earlier visit some years ago.

The spirit of a race speaks in this symphony, which stirs the imagination, awakens new fancies and turns the listener's jaded thought into new channels. In its surge and swing, Sibelius reveals himself as a Finnish Wagner, for he is as keen an interpreter of elemental nature in this symphony as the Wagner of the Ring Cycle.

In the third movement, marked allegro, which takes the place of the scherzo, there is a delightful will o' the wisp quality, as full of sprites as a picture by Du Lac or Rockham.

Brahm's academic overture completed the programme.

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED 1899, BY A. DUPONT

ANTONIO SCOTTI.

From POST
Address: Washington, D.C.
Date
Estab … 4

KREISLER AT HIS BEST.

Great Viennese Violinist Is Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After an absence of several years, Fritz Kreisler returned to Washington yesterday afternoon to play the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy concerto for violin in E minor, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great Viennese virtuoso, at the age of 37, now seems to be at the summit of his art. Certainly his tone has never been richer or clearer than yesterday afternoon, and the golden quality of the second movement of the concerto with its compelling melody was one of the most hauntingly beautiful numbers ever heard at a Boston Symphony concert in the Capital. Mr. Kreisler's bearing, with an entire absence of artificiality or pose, reflects the sincerity of his feeling and broadens the sympathy with which his hearers respond to his brilliant achievements. The orchestral portion of the concerto was handled with great deftness and charm by Dr. Carl Muck.

The symphony for the evening was Sibelius' work in E minor. This is the first of the Finnish composer's four symphonies, and is rather too national in quality and atmosphere to have a very wide appeal among music lovers who have feasted so long on the Beethoven class of composition. Sibelius' symphony does not convey an impression of clear vision or exalted thought. When his work is not turbid it is usually turbulent. The scherzo, however, has distinctive character, and there is a certain fascination in its several fantastical phrases.

Brahms' Academic Festival Overture was a completely satisfying feature of the program, with Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solenelle" as the concluding number.

It is seldom that two living composers find a place on a single Boston Symphony program, and the capacity audience at the National yesterday thoroughly enjoyed the privilege of comparing the art of two of the greatest musical spirits of northern Europe, Sibelius the Finn, and Glazounoff the Russian.

From POST
Address: Washington, D.C.
Date
Estab … 384

THE music-loving world of Washington had a continuous feast of melody yesterday, beginning with the first of a course of ten musical recitals at 11:30 in the morning, at the home of the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, and concluding with the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater in the afternoon. As usual, everything in a social line gave way to the Boston Symphony, and the theater was filled with a brilliant audience.

Mrs. Taft had with her Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, and Mrs. Buckner Randolph.

Mrs. Leiter occupied a box. The German Ambassador and Countess Von Bernstorff entertained in their box Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend. Mrs. McMillan had with her Mrs. Slocum and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Miss Mary Williams had with her Mrs. Slater and Miss Gwynn.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had with them Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Ralph Barnard, Mrs. Benjamin Woodruff, and Miss Hartmann.

Others entertaining box parties were Mrs. I. T. Mann and Mrs. Calderon Carlisle.

Others in the audience were the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Meyer, Miss Mary Sheridan, the Misses Irene and Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Woodbury Blair, Miss Patten, Mme. Hauge, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. Peckham, Mrs. Henning Jennings, Miss Jennings, Miss Colman, Mr. Bowie Clarke, the Rev. Ward F. Denys, the Misses Denys, Mr. Henry White, Count and Countess Scherr-Thoss, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. John C. Fremont, Miss Jessie Fremont, Mr. and Mme. Yanes, Mrs. John Hay, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Faust, Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, Mrs. Gould Lincoln, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. George Howland Chase, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. John E. Wilkie, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, Mrs. W. Murray Crane, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. H. H. Ward, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Ruggles, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, the bishop of Washington, Maj. von Herwarth, of the German embassy; Mr. Kalpaschnikoff, of the Russian embassy; Mr. Henry du Pont, the Minister from the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mr. and Mrs. Livingstone Hunt, Miss Maury, Mrs. Rae, Admiral O'Neil, Admiral Barker, Admiral Clover, Miss Sarah Lee, Mr. and Mrs. James Marion Johnstone, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mr. Gordon Crawford, Mr. James White, Miss Polly Morgan, Mrs. Matthewson, Mrs. Thomas F. Bayard, Mr. Clinton Stewart, Miss Marie Stevens, Col. Lay, Mr. Thurkow, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Jack Biddle, Mrs. Marshall Field, and Mrs. Manderville Carlisle.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D.C.
Date
Establish…

Kreisler and Boston Symphony.

A rare concert was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, for its soloist, at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Aside from the exquisite artistry of Mr. Kreisler, the great Viennese virtuoso, in the rendition of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy concerto for violin in E minor, the recital was memorable for the splendid work of the orchestra in the Sibelius symphony in E minor, Brahms' Academic Festival overture and Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle," under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The Sibelius work was especially impressive, although, perhaps, the Brahms number was the most enjoyed.

It was the first appearance of Kreisler in Washington in several years. Time has not changed his marvelous tone and has served only to ripen the richness of his art.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
…k, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has arranged a classical program of great charm for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, December 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's Little Symphony in F, No. 8, and the other orchestral numbers Schumann's overture Genoveva and Beethoven's overture Leonora, No. 3. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the incomparable violinist, who will play Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra in D. This will be Kreisler's only appearance in Baltimore.

to the American public

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Concert Tonigh

Fritz Kreisler in the few concerts h has given in America during the la month has shown that he is withou doubt the greatest violinist of our tim Never has the beauty of his tone been s wonderful, never has his musicianshi been more complete nor has his playin been filled with greater romantic ferv than now. His only appearance in Balt more this year will be at the Boston Symphony concert this evening, when he is to play the great Brahm's Concerto. The other numbers are Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F major; Schumann's Genoveva Overture and Beethoven's Overture Leonora No. 3.

Establis 4

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY THIS EVENING

Viennese Violinist Will Be Soloist With The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of the current season at the Lyric this evening, the soloist being Fritz Kreisler, the noted Viennese violinist.

This should prove one of the most notable musical events of the season, as it will be Mr. Kreisler's only appearance here this year. He will be heard in the big orchestral Brahms violin concerto, the same that Mischa Elman played here last week with the Philharmonic.

Kreisler is an inspired and fervant player, one of the most interesting musicians of our day. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory under Hellmesberger, and at Paris under Massert, and is one of the most moving interpreters now appearing on the concert stage.

The Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck's direction, will play the eighth Beethoven symphony, the one in F major; Schumann's little known "Genoveva" overture and the third "Lenore" overture by Beethoven.

Esta 84

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric tonight will be notable on account of the only appearance in Baltimore this season of Fritz Kreisler, who is regarded by critics as one of the greatest violinists of our time. He will play the great Brahms Concerto. The other numbers are Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major, Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora" No. 3. Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor.

Es 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

KREISLER, PRINCE OF VIOLINISTS, HERE

Appears As Soloist With The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist combined last night to make the second Baltimore concert of the current series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric a most notable musical event.

The assisting artist was that prince of violinists, Fritz Kreisler, and he played the Brahms' D major concerto. The other numbers were Beethoven's eighth symphony, his "little symphony in F," as the composer was wont to call it to distinguish it from its predecessor, the seventh, which he called "a great symphony in A, one of my most excellent"; the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" and the Beethoven "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

As a matter of fact, the eighth symphony is a great symphony, but what was there that Beethoven wrote that was not "great?" Very little indeed.

This symphony in F is full of wonderfully beautiful tone pictures, and they require a Muck to display them to advantage with all their exquisitely delicate shading and blending. Each note, each phrase, each theme requires handling by one who sees into the depths of the work and takes from it the beauties than can be revealed only with a highly delicate hand guided by highly sensitive and discriminating musical discernment.

Next came the overture to "Genoveva" and then the crowning piece of the evening, the concerto.

There were many in the audience who but a week before had heard the same work given by the New York Philharmonic Society's orchestra, with Mischa Elman as the soloist and Josef Stransky as conductor.

Dr. Muck's reading of the work was enthusiastic, yet at no time did the solo instrument suffer in the slightest. Kreisler's tone is by no means as big as that of Elman, yet it has marvelous beauty and purity, and the man's technique is absolutely perfect. His mind, body and soul are in the work and therefore his interpretation was flawless. At the conclusion of the wonderful cadenza, inserted by the great Joachim, the audience heaved a sigh as if coming from a trance. Small wonder the soloist got such an ovation at the conclusion of the work.

The Beethoven "Leonora," No. 3, ended one of the most interesting, delightful and inspiring concerts heard in Baltimore in many a day.

J. B. M.

Estabi 84

From PHILADELPHIA
Address
Date

is required.

The only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals this season.

Es k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting

From Address PHILADELPHIA
Date

KREISLER GETS AN OVATION AT ONLY APPEARANCE HERE

Violinist Is Heard With Boston Symphony at Notable Concert in This City

Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, was the soloist last night at one of the finest concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given here, at the Academy of Music.

Kreisler has not been in America for three years, and as this was his only appearance in this city, the welcome accorded him last night was a tumultuous one and demands for encores were many.

His interpretation of the far famed Beethoven Concerto in D was rarely beautiful, and the power of expression and the wonderful technique of this great artist were shown to great advantage.

Dr. Muck Conducted

Dr. Karl Muck conducted, as usual, in a masterly fashion, the two orchestral numbers on the program being rendered by the orchestra in a way that won delighted applause from the large and fashionable audience gathered to hear them.

The first number on the program was the Brahms Symphony in D. Major, whose beautiful harmonies and haunting theme are well known among music lovers, but never fail to delight.

The final number was Schumann's ever beautiful overture to "Genoveva," completing a program that was well rounded and a notable one in every way.

Est 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND KREISLER AT ACADEMY

Sublime Work of Soloist and Orchestra Wins Plaudits of Capacity Audience

DR. MUCK CONDUCTED

Est 884

FRITZ KREISLER, past grand master of romanticism in violin playing, Bohemian by birth and by artistic selection, made an imposing and memorable event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. The stormy, fiery temperament is somewhat subdued with advancing years, the ebullient display of bewildering, matchless technique is resolutely restrained, and supreme tonal poetry has usurped the place of exciting dramatism in Kreisler's playing—a wondrous and elevating change that sets him apart from and above the expert throng of contemporary violinists. He has become a great classicist, with added powers of interpretation that inspire keen critical approbation and arouse intense popular furor.

Beethoven's D major concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Kreisler on this occasion, is a romantic and exquisite essay in musical invention, with accompaniment written for one of the small mixed orchestras of the composer's day. Picturesque development and intricate tonal embroidery of two leading themes in the first part; a lovely tracery of affluent melodic invention in the slow movement and a joyous rondo, like some wild folk dance, for the spirited conclusion—these salient attributes demand artistry in accompaniment as well as supreme skill and broad powers of interpretation in the soloist. Only in the final allegro was the tempest of Doctor Muck's tremendous string choir too strong to be overborne even by the potential appeal of Kreisler and his priceless Guarnerius. A slight lessening of tone volume in the symphonic answer, and, behold, the ideal attained!

Mr. Kreisler has fairly made this splendid concerto his very own since he played it last in America, eleven years ago. Not even Ysaye, who, with Kreisler, dwells in supreme heights of Parnassus, could have surpassed the dignity, authority and rare personal distinction of this amazing performance. Those who heard it — the house was everywhere crowded—now have an assured standard by which ambitious aspirants may be hereafter estimated.

Of especial interest and importance were the cadenzas of the first and third movements—both highly elaborated by the violinist himself. It was new-century artistry superimposed on eighteenth-century inspiration.

The effect upon the audience of the first great cadenza was compelling and extraordinary. No such tour de force in violin playing has been heard heretofore at the Academy of Music within the memory of the present generation. It seemed at times as though Kreisler had commanded a score of invisible violins to assist in this astonishing musical feat.

Doctor Muck's finely balanced and highly self-conscious orchestral force gave a spirited and technically admirable rendering of the four musicological movements of Brahms' second symphony—a masterly composition, which since its first hearing in Vienna, thirty-five years ago, has everywhere been received with tolerant and urbane cordiality. The superexcellent quality of the orchestra's violin choir was strikingly and gratefully in evidence in the adagio movement.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture pleasantly closed one of the most triumphant concerts given here by this orchestra under Doctor Muck's direction.

From JOURNAL
Address
Date

Lectures on Symphony Music.

A lecture on the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme for next Tuesday night was given last night by Hans Schneider in Manning Hall, Brown University. Mr. Schneider made the Beethoven Concerto and the Sibelius Symphony the chief theme of his talk, contrasting the modern and classic music and their means of expression. Albert Foster, violinist, played the concerto by Beethoven to Mr. Schneider's accompaniment on the piano. Their rendition was received with applause.

ork, 1884

[107]

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date [illegible] 1912

Esta[illegible] 1884

Great Fiddlers Have Their Day of Reckoning

Ysaye at Carnegie Hall in the Afternoon; Kreisler in the Evening—Boston Orchestra on Second Tour of Season—"Manon Lescaut" at the Opera.

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.10 P. M., concert of the Symphony Society.

Berkeley Theatre—3 P. M., lesson recital by Mme Antoinette Szumowska, pianist.

Carnegie Hall—2.30 P. M., piano recital by Ernest Schelling.

Metropolitan Opera House—7.30 P.M., "Die Meistersinger."

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—8.15 P. M., piano recital by Leo Ornstein.

Carnegie Hall—2.30 P. M., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Metropolitan Opera House—2 P. M., "Faust."

It was a day of great violinists yesterday. In the afternoon Eugène Ysaye, the king of the tribe, was heard in recital at Carnegie Hall. In the evening at the same hall Fritz Kreisler, the one fiddler who can seriously dispute the supremacy of Ysaye, was heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ysaye, as we all know, is in America on an extensive tour. Mr. Kreisler is here for a few weeks only, under the auspices of the Boston orchestra, and his appearances in New York have been limited to two in Manhattan (the first last night), and one in Brooklyn as soloist with that famous band.

Mr. Kreisler in the evening faced a very different audience, for New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—such is the subscription—must be given this season to capacity houses. This great audience received him warmly on his entrance, and after the concerto—Beethoven's—called him back repeatedly, with most enthusiastic applause. Mr. Kreisler has not changed in appearance since he was here last, though a restlessness of manner and a gymnastic activity not observable of old drew attention yesterday; nor has his way of playing changed. It was a very energetic, propulsive performance he gave of the concerto, marked by admirable ease and sureness of execution. His tone, too, which of late years has sometimes lacked its early sensuous beauty, was smooth and sweet, as well as intense and penetrating. And yet, in spite of this high technical excellence, for some reason—possibly my own recollection of the afternoon, possibly because the violinist was not in the mood—it seemed to me that Mr. Kreisler had played the first two movements more impressively here. The final rondo was another matter. He was incontestably in the mood for that. As he played it, with the splendid support of the Boston orchestra, it was fairly cyclonic.

A feature of this concert only second to the appearance of Mr. Kreisler was the magnificent performance Dr. Muck directed of Sibelius's rugged, elemental symphony in E minor. To close the evening in joyous mood came Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. But there are devoted admirers of Brahms that do not find the overture in question either joyous or festive.

PITTS SANBORN.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date

[illegible]tablished: Lon[illegible]

YSAYE AND KREISLER STIR MUSIC WORLD

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Yesterday was memorable for lovers of violin playing, as it offered Ysaye in the afternoon, and Fritz Kreisler appeared in the evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the only two appearances he will make here this season, he having come from Europe just to play this engagement with the Boston orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, in its second visit this season brought Kreisler as soloist, and his medium of expression was the Beethoven concerto, always a supreme test and joy. It was played in a manner only possible to a master of all that is finished and polished in violin playing, by a great, powerful musician, an artist in the fullest sense. No less beautiful than the performance of Kreisler was the accompaniment of Dr. Muck with the ever-wonderful orchestra under his baton. Kreisler supplied his own cadenzas, which were most brilliant. Numerous recalls were sounded for the violinist by an audience which filled Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Muck presented an interesting symphony by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, known here principally through Maud Powell's performances of his violin concerto. It is full of beautiful moments and much of it is darkly majestic and dramatic in atmosphere. If Brahms's first symphony was named "Beethoven's tenth," the Sibelius work heard last night might have been named "Tschaikowsky's seventh." The programme closed with Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture." To-morrow Kreisler will play the Brahms concerto in D major, and the programme will open with the Beethoven eighth symphony.

Ysaye met with the same appreciation and enthusiasm which has greeted him with every appearance yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, when he played the Mozart sonata in D major, Bruch's D minor concerto, Vitali's chaconne with Frank Sealey at the organ, an aria by Vieuxtemps and Saint-Saens's Havanaise. Among his encores was a charming composition of his own.

Elizabeth Topping, pianist, assisted by George Castelle, baritone, gave a recital at the Waldorf-Astoria last night to a large audience. Miss Topping plays with facility and musical appreciation and she held her hearers throughout, as did Mr. Castelle, whose singing was also above the ordinary, both through his voice and interpretations.

From TIMES
Address: New York
DEC 6 - 1912
Date

Establis[illegible]

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Fritz Kreisler the Soloist—A Symphony by Sibelius Played.

Dr. Muck performed another modern symphony at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday. It was Jean Sibelius's first, in E minor; and like Bischoff's, that he gave a month ago, it is one that he introduced to New York when he was formerly conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It is true that in the intervening four years there have been few new symphonies worth attention produced.

And this symphony of the Finnish composer is worth repeating. His ideas are independent and original; his orchestration, though it has not always smoothness and transparency, or even euphony, is peculiarly appropriate to the expression of those ideas. They are the product of a musical temperament affected by the gloom and melancholy of the Far North, of its forests and crags and desolation. However, Sibelius's melodic invention may have been influenced by the character of the Finnish folksong. It is apparent that he has not attempted to make this symphony an embodiment, specifically, of that folksong, or of a "national" spirit.

The prevailing mood of the work is one of gloom and lamentation, except in the somewhat bizarre and fantastical allegro, the third movement. The thematic invention is robust, and the composer works freely within the symphonic form, without fettering himself in it. After the fashion of many modern symphonists he has introduced themes from the earlier movements into some of the later ones; thus, in the last, marked "like a fantasia," there are themes from the first and second movements. There is, on the whole, a strong imaginative flow, a sense of spaciousness and rich expression, in this symphony that are not to be found in many modern compositions of this form. In short, while it may not be one of profoundest depth or lasting power, it is music that is good to listen to, and that engages the listener's sympathies. It was warmly applauded last evening, and was played with clear understanding and appreciation of its spirit.

Fritz Kreisler, who is in America solely to play with the Boston Symphony Orcestra, was the soloist, and played Beethoven's violin concerto. Mr. Kreisler has, before now, established his place among the great ones of his art by his performance of this concerto, which still remains the supreme test of a great artist's quality. This performance marks the summit of Mr. Kreisler's achievements as an artist so far as they have been made known in New York. It was a performance in the noblest style, eloquent, uplifted, full of poetic feeling, and poignant expression. It was an embodiment of the beauty of the work in the beauty of its tonal investiture, in the phrasing that disclosed the noble proportions and symmetry of the music, in the poise and repose that governed it all. It was violin playing of the highest rank.

Mr. Kreisler played cadenzas of his own in the first and last movements that were fitting in their style and construction to be incorporated with the work. Needless to say the performance deeply stirred the public and Mr. Kreisler was many times recalled.

The concert was ended with Brahms's "Academic Overture."

From EVe. SUN
Address: New York
Date

Est[illegible] 1884

If Ysaye's son and Elman's father were not ashamed to be standees last night to hear the Boston Symphony and Fritz Kreisler, it is no wonder all the little fiddlers in New York struggled with some of the biggest financiers to get inside Carnegie Hall. Fifty-seventh street was solid automobiles to Fifth avenue. Alma Gluck was not the only star who looked on with shining face while the performer of the evening played his most wonderful fugue on two strings by way of Cadenza to Beethoven. Geraldine Farrar sat in a box upstairs, observed by all in the parterre during intermission, and at the far corner by the stage Mrs. Carl Muck surveyed a house sold out months ahead for these concerts led by her husband. Only the two seats that C. A. Ellis holds for Henry L. Higginson, the Boston orchestra's founder, remained vacant in the centre aisle as the music began.

In Sibelius's first symphony, Dr. Muck brought back a pet novelty of his five years ago. The Finlander's work could only spring from a soil where nature wears a mantle of haunting mystery, its winter monotony ever broken by echoes of soldiers, sleighbells and forest storms. Soft harp chords after the brazen clash of descending chromatics seemed a heavenly dance, or—quite as distant—the echo of some grand ducal ball. The sighing andante might have been Tschaikowsky's own. A drum-beat scherzo of savage humor in wooden clogs, often iron-shod, was transformed to a fantasy of fairies. The close was all tempest and tragedy. The band stood up to the applause.

Then appeared Kreisler, the supple, muscular figure now in its prime, had outgrown no less the boyish prodigy than the later matinee idol days. A military haircut and a little mustache, with an upward curl that followed every mightier flourish of the bow arm, were all that old-time admirers need know of his looks. The pulse beat of [illegible] Beethoven's classic concerto was stirred with his vivid, virile interpretation. The baton of Muck wove vanishing arabesques of sound beneath the singing silences. And when Kreisler nervously tightened up his strings for that amazing two-voiced cadenza of his own, like a high-wire performer preparing the "dip of death," the most sedate musical assembly in social New York was fairly electrified out of its wonted calm.

The recalls were a sort of royal progress over the stage. Everybody, to the last gallery god and hundredth standee, knew there could be no encore. The two-hour concert ended with Brahms's jolly student overture, which is anything but "Academic." It was more like "Hansel and Gretel" grown up and gone to college with Brahms at Goettingen, made famous by Canning's irreverent poem quoted in the programme book by Philip Hale.

> Whene'er with haggard eyes I view
>   This dungeon that I'm rotting in
> I think of those companions true
> Who studied with me at the U>   —niversity of Goettingen.
>   —niversity of Goettingen.

Every seat is sold for Kreisler's appearances with the Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn to-night and in Carnegie Hall again to-morrow. Over the bridge either the fire laws or the promenades in the opera house of the Academy allow more "standees." Last night's programme is repeated in Brooklyn with the substitution of a Max Bruch concerto for that of Beethoven and the addition of a Glazounoff "Ouverture Solennelle."

At to-morrow's farewell, for he really sails without giving any other concerts in New York, Kreisler will play the concerto of Brahms and Muck conducts Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and [illegible]

[illegible] known to the American public. Brahms [illegible] Then you [illegible] think the superior c[illegible]

[108]

From POST
Address: New York DEC 6 - 1
Date
Est 84

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

After Fritz Kreisler had played the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, there was an outburst of demonstrative and prolonged applause which aroused the fear, after a while, that it might be kept up for forty minutes or more as at recent political meetings in Madison Square Garden. After a while, however, it fortunately subsided, and the musicians were able to continue with the Larghetto, of which the soloist and Dr. Muck's players gave a most ingratiating and heart-warming interpretation. Then came the merry rondo, which was played with so much vivacity and rhythmic swing that it lost its inherent triviality. Mr. Kreisler is the embodiment of rhythm, and he make ery listener's nerves sway in time wit every accent.

The greatest achievement, however, the first movement, in which Beeth rises to the level of his highest symp flights. It is a tremendously long ment, but last night's audience would been glad if it could have been prolo by an hour. Never has the Boston chestra accompanied a soloist more pathetically; never has Kreisler—or one else, so far as our experience g played the sole part in such a clairvo manner. Clairvoyant is the only word that adequately describes the situation. The soloist seemed to be in a trance, getting his inspiration direct from Beethoven. It was stirring, thrilling, overwhelming—a feat such as only genius is capable of, and the audience—well, how it expressed its gratitude for this revelation of the real Beethoven has already been told.

Much of the almost unprecedented applause after this movement was due to the cadenza which Mr. Kreisler introduced—his own cadenza. There are several cadenzas to this great concerto, but all are cardhouses compared to the palace built by the great Austrian violinist. Mr. Horsman has aptly called it a "condenza"; it certainly does condense the substance of the whole movement in a marvellous manner, which makes one think of the "Leonora" overture, of which Wagner remarked that it summed up the whole opera "Fidelio." Beethoven himself could have never written this cadenza; he was a pianist, but not a violin virtuoso; and only a virtuoso of the first rank could have worked up the themes with such wonderful harmonies and ingenious additions of his own, yet always in absolute consonance with Beethoven's own manner. It was the climax of the musical season so far.

Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra also earned and got tremendous applause for their playing of the first Sibelius symphony and the admirable "Academic Overture" of Brahms which opened and closed the concert. The symphony had been played by the same orchestra and conductor before. As a whole it was perhaps h repeating, for the first and the ments are rather dull and long The andante, however, with mood, is attractive, and the f molto fascinates by its wild, bar dor. Much of the music sincer Tchaikovsky, whose influence is where.

To-morrow afternoon Fritz Kr the Brahms concerto with the chestra. It is useless to try to all were sold long ago. Surely will relent, and not keep the ki linists for his orchestra alone. A Kreisler recital would rejoice the hearts of thousands who have been left out in the cold.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan Opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musical critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like, and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

The Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment, but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlitz' "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat banal Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

From
Address: New York City.
Date DEC - 1912
Estal

Even before the grand opera season boomed out its initial call for attention to music lovers, the concert-givers had begun to be busy. New York's newest concert room, Æolian Hall, had to be opened; the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to reintroduce its permanent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck; the vanguard of recitalists had to rush, pell-mell, into the arena, outstripping their rivals in their race against time.

First of all, there was Dr. Karl Mucks return to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had held this position during two seasons, while the German Emperor granted him leave of absence from his duties as royal conductor of the Berlin Opera House. So deep an impression did Dr. Muck make that he was offered the Boston position as a permanency. But report has it that Dr. Muck would ask no release from his royal patron, the Kaiser, so he simply returned to Berlin, filled his duties there and at the end of four years had fulfilled his contract, leaving him free to come to Boston.

Germany moved heaven and earth to keep Dr. Muck in its own domain, going to such lengths as even introducing a bill in the Reichstag to hold him. But the conductor had pledged himself to Mr. Henry L. Higginson's cause—the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its sole patron. So he came.

After an absence of four years this famous conductor was welcomed by a huge audience when he appeared on the platform of Carnegie Hall. Unlike Arthur Nikisch, for instance, Dr. Muck is not an emotionalist. Neither his personality nor his conducting ever cause thrills to pursue each other in squads down the spine of the listener. So there was no real occasion for tumults of enthusiasm, hoarse cries of welcome, or any of those signs of furore. Instead, Dr. Muck was received and applauded in a dignified manner. He chose for his first number Beethoven's "Eroica," and he conducted it with no attempt to put hidden dramatic meanings into this music; he indulged in no exaggerations, no extravagances of climax. It was simply superb, honest Beethoven playing, and as such it will linger long in the memory of its hearers.

What was most surprising about the whole concert was the change that had been wrought in this orchestra. Dr. Muck had already weeded out quite a bit of so-called "dead wood." Some new woodwind players had been imported from France; a new 'cellist sat at the first desk, and there were new faces to be noticed in the various other choirs. The whole orchestra had taken on a superb balance, for, unlike his immediate predecessor, Fiedler, Dr. Muck does not allow the brass to dominate in the ensemble. The playing of the whole programme, but chiefly the Scherzo of the "Eroica," was a wonderfully beautiful exhibition of artistic skill. Single numbers by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner followed, and the chief one of these for comment was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was brilliant both in conducting and performance.

The matinée mate to this Boston Symphony evening concert occurred the following Saturday, when Dr. Muck conducted Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, which is of interminable length and is stuffed with the thoughts and effects of some other composers, but has an effective third movement. It taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost, and these remarkable players came out of the ordeal with flying colors. Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" was exquisitely played, and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was brilliancy itself. In a word, concert-goers are to be congratulated upon the return of this famous conductor, who is a thinking musician and an authority of the highest order.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. DEC 7 - 1912
Date
1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Kreisler Soloist in an Interesting Programme.

The programme presented by Dr. Karl Muck for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening contained two works of comparative novelty, an "Overture Solennelle," by Glazounoff, and the First Symphony, in E minor, of Sibelius. The occasion was made further noteworthy by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who has returned to this country for a brief series of concerts with the Boston Orchestra and who was heard in the Bruch Concerto in G Minor. Brahms' "Academic Overture" completed the programme.

The symphony of Sebelius is worthy of more frequent hearings. Its chief characteristics are its vigorous moods of savage turmoil, culminating in uncouth, almost barbaric climaxes with which are contrasted quiet passages surcharged with that brooding melancholy which pervades the music of all Slavic nations.

There is a wealth of emotion and the work is richly scored, although the overuse of the bass becomes at times monotonous. Yet the work is somewhat superficial, intellectually considered, and the absence of thematic material, containing in itself elements of real generative force and possibilities, renders too obvious the bare workmanship in the development of this material and robs the climaxes of genuine interest.

The theme of the slow movement, which is elegiac in character, however, bears the hallmarks of genuine folk song, and this part of the work is rich, racy and of the soil. The rhythm is pronounced and striking, and there is a clear bit of orchestration, in which the clarinettes toward the close of each presentation of the theme by the strings take it up and complement the wonderful song in a dainty and charming conclusion.

In the scherzo there is much gamboling in the wood wind, rather heavy and clumsy playfulness, be it said, which is interrupted by the incisive rhythm of the thum in the drums, and there is much genuine humor of a rude and boisterous kind, not the hearty unbuttoned mood of a Beethoven scherzo, but rather the unamiable, malicious humor of a Peter Gynt. In the finale Sibelius, in common with most modern writers, seeks to obtain an effect of unity for the whole work by reintroducing the theme of the first movement, which his time appears in a more rugged and pomous form. Dr. Muck conducted the work with manifest interest and sympathetic insight.

Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" was first performed in St. Petersburg in 1900, and was then known as a "Festival Overture," but when published it appeared under its present title. The casual listener may then be pardoned if he remains in doubt as to the moods and purposes of this composition. He may regard it like Hamlet's uncle "with an auspicious and a dropping eye, in equal scale weighing delight and dole." It proved a composition spirited rather than solemn, somewhat threadbare in spots, and empty of any real musical significance, one of that numerous progeny of the Young Russian School which Anton Rubenstein used to receive from their hands with a low, bow, as Tschaikowski tells us.

A more brilliant and spirited reading of the familiar Bruch Concerto has seldom been heard in this city. The fiery and impetuous qualities of Mr. Kreisler's style are balanced and controlled by the poise and repose of the mature artist. The beautiful adagio was sung with a wealth of rich and golden tone, which seemed the very embodiment of the spirit of the romantic style, and the brilliant finale was played with incisive rhythm, splendid tone and an impetuosity and dash which at no time descended to the level of mere bravura. The artist received many recalls at the close.

The other orchestra number was the "Academic Overture" of Brahms, and Dr. Muck and his men seemed in the mood to evoke the spirit of student hilarity which Brahms has embodied in this overture, and elaborated with such skill and consummate workmanship.

PARIS EDITION
From HERALD
Address: New York NOV 19 1912
1884

Dr. Muck Conducts.

(From the NEW YORK HERALD of November 8.)

Three thousand concert-goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston, when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again. Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

From WORLD
Address: New York DEC 8 - 1912
Date
Established:

KREISLER'S PLAYING IS FEATURE OF CONCERT

Slezak's Debut as Faust at the Metropolitan Yesterday's Second Musical Event.

Two important musical events took place yesterday afternoon, one in Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing, the other at the Metropolitan Opera House, where Leo Slezak sang the role of Faust for the first time in New York.

The violin playing of Fritz Kreisler proved the feature of the Symphony concert, which is saying a good deal. The Vienna violinist was in rare form, his interpretation of the Brahms concerto surpassing the great performance which this artist gave of the Beethoven concerto on Thursday night. There were emotional qualities in the work of Kreisler yesterday and a fire and brilliancy he never suggested until this year. His efforts caused much enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra left very little to be desired in their playing of Beethoven's Eight Symphony, the same

From POST
Address: New York DEC 6
Date
Est 14

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

After Fritz Kreisler had played the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, there was an outburst of demonstrative and prolonged applause which aroused the fear, after a while, that it might be kept up for forty minutes or more as at recent political meetings in Madison Square Garden. After a while, however, it fortunately subsided, and the musicians were able to continue with the Larghetto, of which the soloist and Dr. Muck's players gave a most ingratiating and heart-warming interpretation. Then came the merry rondo, which was played with so much vivacity and rhythmic swing that it lost its inherent triviality. Mr. Kreisler is the embodiment of rhythm, and he makes ery listener's nerves sway in time with every accent.

The greatest achievement, however, the first movement, in which Beeth rises to the level of his highest symph flights. It is a tremendously long m ment, but last night's audience would b been glad if it could have been prolon by an hour. Never has the Boston chestra accompanied a soloist more s pathetically; never has Kreisler—or one else, so far as our experience goe played the solo part in such a clairvoy manner. Clairvoyant is the only word that adequately describes the situation. The soloist seemed to be in a trance, getting his inspiration direct from Beethoven. It was stirring, thrilling, overwhelming—a feat such as only genius is capable of, and the audience—well, how it expressed its gratitude for this revelation of the real Beethoven has already been told.

Much of the almost unprecedented applause after this movement was due to the cadenza which Mr. Kreisler introduced—his own cadenza. There are several cadenzas to this great concerto, but all are card-houses compared to the palace built by the great Austrian violinist. Mr. Horsman has aptly called it a "condenza"; it certainly does condense the substance of the whole movement in a marvellous manner, which makes one think of the "Leonora" overture, of which Wagner remarked that it summed up the whole opera "Fidelio." Beethoven himself could have never written this cadenza; he was a pianist, but not a violin virtuoso; and only a virtuoso of the first rank could have worked up the themes with such wonderful harmonies and ingenious additions of his own, yet always in absolute consonance with Beethoven's own manner. It was the climax of the musical season so far.

Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra also earned and got tremendous applause for their playing of the first Sibelius symphony and the admirable "Academic Overture" of Brahms which opened and closed the concert. The symphony had been played by the same orchestra and conductor before. As a whole it was perhaps h repeating, for the first and the ments are rather dull and long The andante, however, with mood, is attractive, and the fi molto fascinates by its wild, barl dor. Much of the music sincer Tchaikovsky, whose influence is where.

To-morrow afternoon Fritz Kre the Brahms concerto with the B chestra. It is useless to try to all were sold long ago. Surely will relent, and not keep the ki linists for his orchestra alone. A Kreisler recital would rejoice the hearts of thousands who have been left out in the cold.

From HERALD
Address: New York
E 1884

Dr. Muck Conducts.

(From the NEW YORK HERALD of November 8.)

Three thousand concert-goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston, when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again. Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan Opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musical critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like, and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

The Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment, but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlitz' "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat banal Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

From
Address: New York City.
Date
Estal

Even before the grand opera season boomed out its initial call for attention to music lovers, the concert-givers had begun to be busy. New York's newest concert room, Æolian Hall, had to be opened; the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to reintroduce its permanent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck; the vanguard of recitalists had to rush, pell-mell, into the arena, outstripping their rivals in their race against time.

First of all, there was Dr. Karl Muck's return to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had held this position during two seasons, while the German Emperor granted him leave of absence from his duties as royal conductor of the Berlin Opera House. So deep an impression did Dr. Muck make that he was offered the Boston position as a permanency. But report has it that Dr. Muck would ask no release from his royal patron, the Kaiser, so he simply returned to Berlin, filled his duties there and at the end of four years had fulfilled his contract, leaving him free to come to Boston.

Germany moved heaven and earth to keep Dr. Muck in its own domain, going to such lengths as even introducing a bill in the Reichstag to hold him. But the conductor had pledged himself to Mr. Henry L. Higginson's cause—the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its sole patron. So he came.

After an absence of four years this famous conductor was welcomed by a huge audience when he appeared on the platform of Carnegie Hall. Unlike Arthur Nikisch, for instance, Dr. Muck is not an emotionalist. Neither his personality nor his conducting ever cause thrills to pursue each other in squads down the spine of the listener. So there was no real occasion for tumults of enthusiasm, hoarse cries of welcome, or any of those signs of furore. Instead, Dr. Muck was received and applauded in a dignified manner. He chose for his first number Beethoven's "Eroica," and he conducted it with no attempt to put hidden dramatic meanings into this music; he indulged in no exaggerations, no extravagances of climax. It was simply superb, honest Beethoven playing, and as such it will linger long in the memory of its hearers.

What was most surprising about the whole concert was the change that had been wrought in this orchestra. Dr. Muck had already weeded out quite a bit of so-called "dead wood." Some new woodwind players had been imported from France; a new 'cellist sat at the first desk, and there were new faces to be noticed in the various other choirs. The whole orchestra had taken on a superb balance, for, unlike his immediate predecessor, Fiedler, Dr. Muck does not allow the brass to dominate in the ensemble. The playing of the whole programme, but chiefly the Scherzo of the "Eroica," was a wonderfully beautiful exhibition of artistic skill. Single numbers by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner followed, and the chief one of these for comment was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was brilliant both in conducting and performance.

The matinée mate to this Boston Symphony evening concert occurred the following Saturday, when Dr. Muck conducted Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, which is of interminable length and is stuffed with the thoughts and effects of some other composers, but has an effective third movement. It taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost, and these remarkable players came out of the ordeal with flying colors. Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" was exquisitely played, and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was brilliancy itself. In a word, concert-goers are to be congratulated upon the return of this famous conductor, who is a thinking musician and an authority of the highest order.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date
Established:

KREISLER'S PLAYING IS FEATURE OF CONCERT

Slezak's Debut as Faust at the Metropolitan Yesterday's Second Musical Event.

Two important musical events took place yesterday afternoon, one in Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing, the other at the Metropolitan Opera House, where Leo Slezak sang the role of Faust for the first time in New York.

The violin playing of Fritz Kreisler proved the feature of the Symphony concert, which is saying a good deal. The Vienna violinist was in rare form, his interpretation of the Brahms concerto surpassing the great performance which this artist gave of the Beethoven concerto on Thursday night. There were emotional qualities in the work of Kreisler yesterday and a fire and brilliancy he never suggested until this year. His efforts caused much enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra left very little to be desired in their playing of Beethoven's Eight Symphony, the same

---

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date
1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Kreisler Soloist in an Interesting Programme.

The programme presented by Dr. Karl Muck for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening contained two works of comparative novelty, an "Overture Solennelle," by Glazounoff, and the First Symphony, in E minor, of Sibelius. The occasion was made further noteworthy by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who has returned to this country for a brief series of concerts with the Boston Orchestra and who was heard in the Bruch Concerto in G Minor. Brahms' "Academic Overture" completed the programme.

The symphony of Sebelius is worthy of more frequent hearings. Its chief characteristics are its vigorous moods of savage turmoil, culminating in uncouth, almost barbaric climaxes with which are contrasted quiet passages surcharged with that brooding melancholy which pervades the music of all Slavic nations.

There is a wealth of emotion and the work is richly scored, although the overuse of the bass becomes at times monotonous. Yet the work is somewhat superficial, intellectually considered, and the absence of thematic material, containing in itself elements of real generative force and possibilities, renders too obvious the bare workmanship in the development of this material and robs the climaxes of genuine interest.

The theme of the slow movement, which is elegiac in character, however, bears the hallmarks of genuine folk song, and this part of the work is rich, racy and of the soil. The rhythm is pronounced and striking, and there is a clear bit of orchestration, in which the clarinettes toward the close of each presentation of the theme by the strings take it up and complement the wonderful song in a dainty and charming conclusion.

In the scherzo there is much gamboling in the wood wind, rather heavy and clumsy playfulness, be it said, which is interrupted by the incisive rhythm of the thum in the drums, and there is much genuine humor of a rude and boisterous kind, not the hearty unbuttoned mood of a Beethoven scherzo, but rather the unamiable, malicious humor of a Peter Gynt. In the finale Sibelius, in common with most modern writers, seeks to obtain an effect of unity for the whole work by reintroducing the theme of the first movement, which his time appears in a more rugged and pomous form. Dr. Muck conducted the work with manifest interest and sympathetic insight.

Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" was first performed in St. Petersburg in 1900, and was then known as a "Festival Overture," but when published it appeared under its present title. The casual listener may then be pardoned if he remains in doubt as to the moods and purposes of this composition. He may regard it like Hamlet's uncle "with an auspicious and a dropping eye, in equal scale weighing delight and dole." It proved a composition spirited rather than solemn, somewhat threadbare in spots, and empty of any real musical significance, one of that numerous progeny of the Young Russian School which Anton Rubenstein used to receive from their hands with a low, bow, as Tschaikowski tells us.

A more brilliant and spirited reading of the familiar Bruch Concerto has seldom been heard in this city. The fiery and impetuous qualities of Mr. Kreisler's style are balanced and controlled by the poise and repose of the mature artist. The beautiful adagio was sung with a wealth of rich and golden tone, which seemed the very embodiment of the spirit of the romantic style, and the brilliant finale was played with incisive rhythm, splendid tone and an impetuosity and dash which at no time descended to the level of mere bravura. The artist received many recalls at the close.

The other orchestra number was the "Academic Overture" of Brahms, and Dr. Muck and his men seemed in the mood to evoke the spirit of student hilarity which Brahms has embodied in this overture, and elaborated with such skill and consummate workmanship.

[109]

From POST

Address: New York

Date Dec. 6

1884

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

After Fritz Kreisler had played the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, there was an outburst of demonstrative and prolonged applause which aroused the fear, after a while, that it might be kept up for forty minutes or more as at recent political meetings in Madison Square Garden. After a while, however, it fortunately subsided, and the musicians were able to continue with the Larghetto, of which the soloist and Dr. Muck's players gave a most ingratiating and heart-warming interpretation. Then came the merry rondo, which was played with so much vivacity and rhythmic swing that it lost its inherent triviality. Mr. Kreisler is the very embodiment of rhythm, and he makes every listener's nerves sway in time with his every accent.

The greatest achievement, however, was the first movement, in which Beethoven rises to the level of his highest symphonic flights. It is a tremendously long movement, but last night's audience would hav been glad if it could have been prolonged by an hour. Never has the Boston Orchestra accompanied a soloist more sympathetically; never has Kreisler—or any one else, so far as our experience goes—played the solo part in such a clairvoyant manner. Clairvoyant is the only word that adequately describes the situation. The soloist seemed to be in a trance, getting his inspiration direct from Beethoven. It was stirring, thrilling, overwhelming—a feat such as only genius is capable of, and the audience—well, how it expressed its gratitude for this revelation of the real Beethoven has already been told.

Much of the almost unprecedented applause after this movement was due to the cadenza which Mr. Kreisler introduced—his own cadenza. There are several cadenzas to this great concerto, but all are card-houses compared to the palace built by the great Austrian violinist. Mr. Horsman has aptly called it a "condenza"; it certainly does condense the substance of the whole movement in a marvellous manner, which makes one think of the "Leonora" overture, of which Wagner remarked that it summed up the whole opera "Fidelio." Beethoven himself could have never written this cadenza; he was a pianist, but not a violin virtuoso; and only a virtuoso of the first rank could have worked up the themes with such wonderful harmonies and ingenious additions of his own, yet always in absolute consonance with Beethoven's own manner. It was the climax of the musical season so far.

Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra also earned and got tremendous applause for their playing of the first Sibelius symphony and the admirable "Academic Overture" of Brahms which opened and closed the concert. The symphony had been played by the same orchestra and conductor before. As a whole it was perhaps hardly worth repeating, for the first and the last movements are rather dull and long-drawn out. The andante, however, with its sombre mood, is attractive, and the final allegro molto fascinates by its wild, barbaric splendor. Much of the music sincerely flatters Tchaikovsky, whose influence is felt everywhere.

To-morrow afternoon Fritz Kreisler plays the Brahms concerto with the Boston Orchestra. It is useless to try to get seats; all were sold long ago. Surely Mr. Ellis will relent, and not keep the king of violinists for his orchestra alone. A Kreisler recital would rejoice the hearts of thousands who have been left out in the cold.

From HERALD

Address: New York

1884

Dr. Muck Conducts.

(From the NEW YORK HERALD of November 8.)

Three thousand concert-goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston, when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again. Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan Opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musical critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like, and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

The Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment, but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlitz' "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat banal Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

New York City.

Even before the grand opera season boomed out its initial call for attention to music lovers, the concert-givers had begun to be busy. New York's newest concert room, Æolian Hall, had to be opened; the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to reintroduce its permanent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck; the vanguard of recitalists had to rush, pell-mell, into the arena, outstripping their rivals in their race against time.

First of all, there was Dr. Karl Muck's return to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had held this position during two seasons, while the German Emperor granted him leave of absence from his duties as royal conductor of the Berlin Opera House. So deep an impression did Dr. Muck make that he was offered the Boston position as a permanency. But report has it that Dr. Muck would ask no release from his royal patron, the Kaiser, so he simply returned to Berlin, filled his duties there and at the end of four years had fulfilled his contract, leaving him free to come to Boston.

Germany moved heaven and earth to keep Dr. Muck in its own domain, going to such lengths as even introducing a bill in the Reichstag to hold him. But the conductor had pledged himself to Mr. Henry L. Higginson's cause—the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its sole patron. So he came.

After an absence of four years this famous conductor was welcomed by a huge audience when he appeared on the platform of Carnegie Hall. Unlike Arthur Nikisch, for instance, Dr. Muck is not an emotionalist. Neither his personality nor his conducting ever cause thrills to pursue each other in squads down the spine of the listener. So there was no real occasion for tumults of enthusiasm, hoarse cries of welcome, or any of those signs of furore. Instead, Dr. Muck was received and applauded in a dignified manner. He chose for his first number Beethoven's "Eroica," and he conducted it with no attempt to put hidden dramatic meanings into this music; he indulged in no exaggerations, no extravagances of climax. It was simply superb, honest Beethoven playing, and as such it will linger long in the memory of its hearers.

What was most surprising about the whole concert was the change that had been wrought in this orchestra. Dr. Muck had already weeded out quite a bit of so-called "dead wood." Some new wood-wind players had been imported from France; a new 'cellist sat at the first desk, and there were new faces to be noticed in the various other choirs. The whole orchestra had taken on a superb balance, for, unlike his immediate predecessor, Fiedler, Dr. Muck does not allow the brass to dominate in the ensemble. The playing of the whole programme, but chiefly the Scherzo of the "Eroica," was a wonderfully beautiful exhibition of artistic skill. Single numbers by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner followed, and the chief one of these for comment was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was brilliant both in conducting and performance.

The matinée mate to this Boston Symphony evening concert occurred the following Saturday, when Dr. Muck conducted Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, which is of interminable length and is stuffed with the thoughts and effects of some other composers, but has an effective third movement. It taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost, and these remarkable players came out of the ordeal with flying colors. Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" was exquisitely played, and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was brilliancy itself. In a word, concert-goers are to be congratulated upon the return of this famous conductor, who is a thinking musician and an authority of the highest order.

SLER'S PLAYING IS FEATURE OF CONCERT

zak's Debut as Faust at the Metropolitan Yesterday's Second Musical Event.

Two important musical events took place yesterday afternoon, one in Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing, the other at the Metropolitan Opera House, where Leo Slezak sang the role of Faust for the first time in New York.

The violin playing of Fritz Kreisler proved the feature of the Symphony concert, which is saying a good deal. The Vienna violinist was in rare form, his interpretation of the Brahms concerto surpassing the great performance which this artist gave of the Beethoven concerto on Thursday night. There were emotional qualities in the work of Kreisler yesterday and a fire and brilliancy he never suggested until this year. His efforts caused much enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra left very little to be desired in their playing of Beethoven's Eight Symphony, the same

---

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Kreisler Soloist in an Interesting Programme.

The programme presented by Dr. Karl Muck for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening contained two works of comparative novelty, an "Overture Solennelle," by Glazounoff, and the First Symphony, in E minor, of Sibelius. The occasion was made further noteworthy by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who has returned to this country for a brief series of concerts with the Boston Orchestra and who was heard in the Bruch Concerto in G Minor. Brahms' "Academic Overture" completed the programme.

The symphony of Sebelius is worthy of more frequent hearings. Its chief characteristics are its rigorous moods of savage turmoil, culminating in uncouth, almost barbaric climaxes with which are contrasted quiet passages surcharged with that brooding melancholy which pervades the music of all Slavic nations.

There is a wealth of emotion and the work is richly scored, although the overuse of the bass becomes at times monotonous. Yet the work is somewhat superficial, intellectually considered, and the absence of thematic material, containing in itself elements of real generative force and possibilities, renders too obvious the bare workmanship in the development of this material and robs the climaxes of genuine interest.

The theme of the slow movement, which is elegiac in character, however, bears the hallmarks of genuine folk song, and this part of the work is rich, racy and of the soil. The rhythm is pronounced and striking, and there is a clear bit of orchestration, in which the clarinettes toward the close of each presentation of the theme by the strings take it up and complement the wonderful song in a dainty and charming conclusion.

In the scherzo there is much gamboling in the wood wind, rather heavy and clumsy playfulness, be it said, which is interrupted by the incisive rhythm of the thum in the drums, and there is much genuine humor of a rude and boisterous kind, not the hearty unbuttoned mood of a Beethoven scherzo, but rather the unamiable, malicious humor of a Peter Gynt. In the finale Sibelius, in common with most modern writers, seeks to obtain an effect of unity for the whole work by reintroducing the theme of the first movement, which his time appears in a more rugged and pomous form. Dr. Muck conducted the work with manifest interest and sympathetic insight.

Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" was first performed in St. Petersburg in 1900, and was then known as a "Festival Overture," but when published it appeared under its present title. The casual listener may then be pardoned if he remains in doubt as to the moods and purposes of this composition. He may regard it like Hamlet's uncle "with an auspicious and a dropping eye, in equal scale weighing delight and dole." It proved a composition spirited rather than solemn, somewhat threadbare in spots, and empty of any real musical significance, one of that numerous progeny of the Young Russian School which Anton Rubenstein used to receive from their hands with a low, bow, as Tschaikowski tells us.

A more brilliant and spirited reading of the familiar Bruch Concerto has seldom been heard in this city. The fiery and impetuous qualities of Mr. Kreisler's style are balanced and controlled by the poise and repose of the mature artist. The beautiful adagio was sung with a wealth of rich and golden tone, which seemed the very embodiment of the spirit of the romantic style, and the brilliant finale was played with incisive rhythm, splendid tone and an impetuosity and dash which at no time descended to the level of mere bravura. The artist received many recalls at the close.

The other orchestra number was the "Academic Overture" of Brahms, and Dr. Muck and his men seemed in the mood to evoke the spirit of student hilarity which Brahms has embodied in this overture, and elaborated with such skill and consummate workmanship.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

Est 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

End of Its Second Visit to New York.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to New York came to a conclusion with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, at which Dr. Muck produced Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Brahms's violin concerto (the solo part played by Fritz Kreisler) and the second of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his opera, "Fidelio,"—that known to concert lists as "Leonor No. 3." All this music, except the Schumann overture, was extremely familia and the symphony had already been heard here this season. It was most exquisitely played, but what gave it a special interest in the minds of the curious in such matters was a study of Dr Muck's attitude toward a feature of the work which at intervals since Wagner called attention to it has challenged comment. Old readers of The Tribune may remember that a discussion of the proper tempi of the two middle movements was had in this journal as long ago as 1889, in which, besides the reviewer, Dr. von Bülow and Beethoven's great biographer, Alexander W. Thayer, himself a Tribune man some sixty years ago and an interested reader of it down to his death, took part. It was through Wagner that an exaggerated slowness of many tempi, which still prevails chiefly in Germany, came into fashion. He protested against what he considered the flippancy of Mendelssohn, and out of his remarks grew the notion that Beethoven wanted the third movement of his eighth symphony treated as the slow movement because he had prescribed a "tempo di menuetto" for it at a time when through his own example, largely, the old-fashioned dance movement had become a scherzo. But Beethoven had also noted a metronomic indication which made it plain that he wanted the piece to proceed at an extremely fast pace—a faster pace, indeed, than any conductor has ventured upon in all the many years of this writer's experience with the work. When Dr. von Bülow conducted the symphony at a concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, in March, 1889, he played the movement fully one-third slower than Beethoven marked it, and defended his course on the ground, among others, that Beethoven had been misled in his marking by an incorrect instrument. A fact that seems to have been overlooked in the many discussions which have taken place concerning the relative tempi of the two movements is that Beethoven plainly conceived the entire symphony in a merrier mood than his interpreters have done during the last generation. Here some comparative figures are interesting. The composer called for a tempo indicated by sixty-nine measures (the dotted half note being the unit here) to the minute; Dr. von Bülow in 1889 was thirteen measures to the minute slower than this, Mr. Seidl on an average ten measures slower at a Philharmonic concert in December, 1894, and Mr. Safonoff the same at a Philharmonic in January, 1906. Dr. Muck's tempo yesterday was in perfect agreement with Dr. von Bülow's.

It must not be understood that the composer or any of his interpreters ever insisted upon a rigid adherence to the metronomic mark. All that Beethoven wanted was to give a hint, which should serve a general purpose—prevent a gross misconception of his purpose. Though he railed against all mechanical contrivances at times, he yet championed the use of Mälzl's instrument with great warmth, and this even after he had had a quarrel with the inventor which reached the law courts. He was within five months of his death when he sent the metronomic marks for the Ninth Symphony to the publishers and the Philharmonic Society of London. That his conception of a proper tempo varied slightly with his moods has interesting illustration in a transcript made by Thayer of a conversation book used by the composer in October, 1826—now in the possession of this writer. The subject of conversation is the metronomizing of the Choral Symphony for the publisher. Beethoven writes the notes indicating the unit of time and his nephew Karl the figures. After the maestoso in the finale, for which Beethoven had prescribed 60 quarter notes to the minute, Karl writes: "132 is the same tempo, only in notes of half the measure (in two beats)." And later: "You take it quicker than 126, 132, as we had it this morning. Haven't you any composition on which the metronome is noted? From it we could both see the form."

The difference of opinion between the composer and the conductors was smaller in the Allegretto Scherzando. Beethoven marked it 88 eighth notes to the minute; von Bülow played 90, Seidl 96, Safonoff 86 and Fr. Muck yesterday 80. Mr. Seidl, however, at times varied from 96 to 100 and even 120. Dr. von Bülow's notion that the third movement must, at any cost, be made to present itself to the hearers as the slow movement in the symphonic scheme led him to substitute 92 for Beethoven's 126; Seidl and Safonoff were in agreement at 100 and Dr. Muck came nearest to the composer with 116. So he did also in the finale, in which the time unit is a measure in alla breve time. Beethoven marked whole notes 81; von Bülow played [illegible], Seidl and Safonoff 68 and Dr. Muck 80. There is no pedantic purpose in setting forth these figures; the spirit of a composition is not indicated by its pace alone. Other elements enter into it, but it is interesting to observe that the gladsomeness and madcap humor with which Dr. Muck and his orchestra filled the work yesterday had so much sanction in the pace prescribed by the composer's mechanical formula, to which, it is safe to assume, Dr. Muck gave never a thought. It was a case of correct feeling and at the same time a justification of the composer's markings.

Mr. Kreisler and his companions soared heavenward again in the slow movem of the Brahms concerto and indulge a tumult of joyousness in the finalé.

the whole his performance surpassed tha of Thursday evening in the Beethove concerto. H. E. K.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

E 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sibelius' Symphony and Fritz Kreisler's Violin Playing Features in Fine Programme.

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra series at the Academy of Music, last night, was enjoyed to the full by the host of listeners that the large support of these concerts assures. Each of the four numbers programmed by Dr. Karl Muck had a pronounced element of interest, and the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, has so often proved that he is a capable artist that he had an unusually prolonged welcome when he appeared on the stage. The "Symphony No. 1, in E Minor," by Jan Sibelius; Brahms' "Academic Festival Ouerture," "Bruch's "Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G Minor," and Glazounoff's "Ouerture Solennelle" made up the musical list.

Being a comparatively new and strikingly meritorious work by a living composer still under 50 years of age, and from whom much may be expected, the symphony challenged attention. It is not an absolute novelty, as it was introduced to this country by Dr. Muck six years ago when he conducted the Boston Orchestra for a season. A remarkable fact is that the work was not taken up by any other conductor of an American orchestra during the six years since it was first heard. For it is a fine product of modern thought in orchestral writing. The composer has not been widely known outside of his native Finland. But it is impossible that the light of such a composer shall be hid, and he must be hailed as belonging to the world at large.

True in spirit and general structure to the approved form for the symphony, the music is a new proclamation of musical feeling of such directness and originality as to hold the attention and win admiration of its bold frankness and of that kind of attractiveness that makes it more a thing of human interest than a mere work of art. It is an outspoken expression of Finnish temperament with characteristics so clearly defined as to leave no doubt of the impress of national feeling. The composer is free and capricious in the use of melodic figures and in his call upon the resources of the orchestra. He shows a fond dalliance with the wood wind-instruments, bringing them into practically equal prominence with the strings. Sudden contrasts in tone, quality and episodic intrusions crowd one another as though prompted by the exuberant workings of a fancy that fairly reveled in utilizing the various voices of the orchestra. There is a kaleidoscopic succession of melodic fragments as the different instruments take up, one after the other, little phrases of which the composer makes liberal use. In this respect he betrays almost a mannerism of style, such fondness does he show for imitative devices.

Pronounced in its individuality, voicing its thought with assertive independence of conventional procedure, and so obviously sincere as a disclosure of national sentiment, this symphony is surely a flight of genius. Although it suggests that use has been made of folk-melodies, the composer has denied ever using a theme that was not his own invention. This statement is interesting as an assurance of the composer's ingenuity in voicing the spirit of his national music without literally adapting it to his purpose.

The very favorable impression the symphony made on last night's audience was naturally due in large measure to Dr. Muck's really superb interpretation. The work makes claims upon technical execution that are not easily met, and the members of the orchestra responded most admirably, voicing every detail in a way to reveal the finest devotion to an artistic purpose. Fortunate, indeed, is the composer who can have his unfamiliar creation presented in such a manner.

The Bruch "Concerto," in which Mr. Kreisler was heard, has taken its place among the standard modern works of its class, and it was played, last night, with all due regard for its essential musical qualities. Mr. Kreisler brought out but small volume of tone, however, and there was not the breadth and fullness that were demanded in some parts of the solo. His fine art showed itself plenteously though in an exquisite quality of tone and in a finished mastery of execution.

Brahms' "Academic Overture" is a straightforward composition that represents the composer in frank, agreeable mood in proclaiming the buoyant spirits of students days. The Glazounoff "Ouerture" is of a character to find a welcome as a bright example of the musical form it represents wherein the chief melodies are given in broad sweeps of the strings. It is a cheerful exposition of the conventional overture form.

A strange omission from the house programme was the non-appearance of Mr. Kriesler's name. There was nothing to indicate who was the soloist of the evening although, of course, everybody knew. But, maybe, it is too much to expect that the concert programme of today shall always satisfactorily perform its real function of providing information about the concert. So much attention in its preparation is demanded by its modern mission as an advertising circular!

◆

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date DEC [illegible]

Establisl 1884

MR. KREISLER ENDS TWO DAY SEASON

Violinist Heard Again with Boston Symphony—To Return to Austria After Charity Recital.

When Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, finished bowing his gratitude at the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday, he had made his season's début and farewell in concert within less than forty-eight hours. His only other appearance here will be a charity recital, after which he will return to Austria for military duty.

Thursday night he played the Beethoven concerto, yesterday he played the Brahms concerto. Both were remarkable performances, yesterday's being probably the more amazing, for the Brahms concerto is said to have been written not for, but "against" the violin. Technically it is awe inspiring. Mr. Kreisler played it with artistic ease mastering its problems of bowing and fingering. But more than that, he revealed the depths of the difficult work, playing the first movement with fine repose and assurance, loosing the sentimental beauty of the second, and dashing off the final movement with brilliancy and temperament.

Dr. Muck, who conducted the orchestra, provided a sympathetic accompaniment that counted for much in the effectiveness of the performance. The audience applauded with enthusiasm—a rare thing—for after the Brahms violin concerto the audience usually heaves a sigh of relief.

The orchestral part of the programme included Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, beautifully played; Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a work lacking in interest despite its finished performance, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3, in which the conducting of Dr. Muck and the playing of the orchestra were superb.

A disturbing incident occurred during the last movement of the Beethoven symphony, when at a pianissimo passage some one back stage walked leisurely, w without rubber heels. Dr. Muck glared the direction of the noise, but it continu In the intermission efforts were made identify the culprit, but without succes

"And the worst of it was," said a m sician later, "that whoever made the no had an unmusical soul, for he did not ke time with the music as he walked."

◆

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date DEC 8 - [illegible]

ork, 1884

KREISLER SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Violinist and Boston Symphony Give Brilliant Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Once more yesterday afternoon Fritz Kreisler gave a brilliant exhibition of his powers in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time in Brahms's instead of Beethoven's concerto. Among those who marveled at his skill—enthusiasts who filled Carnegie Hall—sat no less a competitor in the realm artistic than Mischa Elman.

As at the concert last Thursday evening, Kreisler did not appear to be at his best. Phenomenal as was his performance of a difficult cadenza in the first movement, when the little instrument he held high from his shoulder sang in many voices, his fingers had a nervous frenzy that skimmed lightly the noble current of the opening Allegro and barely touched the lofty poetic heights of the Adagio. In the thrilling and invigorating Finale, however—music throbbing with rhythmical life and pulse—Kreisler moved entirely in his element.

Not a bit less inspiring, though, was the artistically and technically impeccable accompaniment given by the orchestra under Dr. Muck's guidance. Not an accompaniment was this, in reality, but a flawless union, a perfect fusion of the symphonic body with its solo associate.

Rare artistic enjoyment, too, was provided by the Boston players and their great leader in Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which opened the programme. Only under Dr. Muck, it would seem, can that wonderful aggregation concentrate every particle of its technical powers on the interpretative message delivered. Few in the assemblage noted the slightest wavering in rhythmical balance during the final movement.

Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture closed the concert.

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date [illegible] -1912

Estab

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Fritz Kreisler's Beautiful Playing of Brahms's Concerto—The Work of the Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a notable one that gave the audience the highest degree of pleasure. Not only was the orchestra itself in its most consummate form and Dr. Muck in his most perfect vein, but Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, seemed to reach a higher point of eloquence, inspired by Brahms's violin concerto, than he has often attained. The result was one of those rare occasions when perfection seems within grasp and hearing.

It would be a long undertaking to tell of all the beauties of the performance of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Third "Leonore" overture, or of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture that were the orchestral numbers. Dr. Muck's readings were instinct with life, with rhythmic intensity, with an exquisite sense of proportion in detail and in the larger outlines, never failing in a sense of beauty of tone and dynamic gradation. He elicits from the virtuosos of the orchestra all their art, their enthusiasm, their devotion, making them contribute all they possess to the greater whole he is molding. No conductor, perhaps, has ever more perfectly made use of all the accumulation of artistic skill and power that are at his disposition in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is all very well for him, when he is recalled by the applause after a performance, to point politely back to his men, as to the ones who really did it. Artists they are, and as artists they play; and were they less artists the results would be by so much less. But the supremely satisfying quality of such a performance as yesterday's comes from the brain and hand, the constructive sense, the technical skill, the vivifying imagination, and the glowing artistic spirit of the conductor.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of Brahms's concerto was the achievement of a great artist, broadly eloquent, exquisitely poetical, free, sometimes, as an improvisation, yet with all its impulse of energy, perfectly symmetrical and perfectly poised. In its way almost as remarkable was the playing of the orchestral accompaniment, which is no "accompaniment," but the other half, an integral part of the concerto. Anything more beautifully molded to the soloist's desire, more instinctively appreciative of his intentions, more subtly modulated in every nuance of color and dynamics, more perfectly balanced, in all its instrumental components is not easily to be imagined. So should this concerto be played, and so it is seldom played—but it is matter for artists, not artisans or beginners. And so played it answers with its own voice the querulous complaint about a "concerto against the violin" and the traditional chatter about the muddy, thick, inexpressive instrumentation of Brahms, the orchestral composer.

The audience was naturally deeply stirred, and manifested it with a demonstration not often heard from matinee audiences. Mr. Kreisler was time and again recalled, and his triumph was pre-eminently deserved.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York. DEC 9 - 1912
Date

Establis

Boſtoner Symphonie=Konzert.

Die ſtets herzlich willkommenen Boſtoner Gäſte boten uns Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ein wunderſchönes Konzert mit Fritz Kreisler als Soliſten, und das dicht gefüllte Haus gab ſeiner Begeiſterung durch unzweideutige Zeichen der Zufriedenheit Ausdruck.

Schumann's ſelten gehörte „Genoveva"=Ouverture eröffnete das Programm. Dr. Muck verlieh ihr namentlich im Allegroſatz wirkſame dramatiſche Lebendigkeit und fand gegen Schluß mächtige Steigerungen. Er dirigirte ferner eine höchſt effektvolle „Leonoren"=Ouverture (No. 3), die wie ein glühender Feuerſtrom durch den Saal rauſchte, und entzückte ſein Publikum durch eine geiſtreiche und graziöſe Wiedergabe von Beethoven's „Achter". Die knappe, kernige Friſche des erſten Satzes, der leicht geſchürzte Humor des zweiten mit den regelmäßigen metronomgleichen Begleitungs=Akkorden der Bläſer, den anmuthig hüpfenden Violinen und den drollig=tänzeriſchen Anwandlungen der Brummbäſſe, wirkten höchſt ſtiliſtiſch. Das Menuett nahm er ſteif=gravitätiſch und mit ſcharfen parodiſtiſchen Streiflichtern, und der letzte Satz funkelte und ſprühte nur ſo von Geiſt und Humor. Das Orcheſter ſpielte mit klaſſiſcher Autorität und Virtuoſität. Der Beifall war warm.

Herr Kreisler imponirte durch eine großzügige Wiedergabe von Brahms' Violin=Concert, in der man nur gelegentliche Intonations=Schwierigkeiten bemängeln konnte, welche Leiſtung man aber ehrlich bewundern mußte. Da erſchien die gewaltigſte Technik in den Dienſt der leitenden Idee geſtellt und die muſikaliſche Strenge und Sprödigkeit des Werkes künſtleriſch gemildert. Kreisler wurde etwa zehnmal geradezu begeiſtert gerufen.

known to the American public. Bra

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date ....

Est 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

End of Its Second Visit to New York.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to New York came to a conclusion with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, at which Dr. Muck produced Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Brahms's violin concerto (the solo part played by Fritz Kreisler) and the second of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his opera, "Fidelio,"—that known to concert lists as "Leonore No. 3." All this music, except the Schumann overture, was extremely familiar and the symphony had already been heard here this season. It was most exquisitely played, but what gave it a special interest in the minds of the curious in such matters was a study of Dr. Muck's attitude toward a feature of the work which at intervals since Wagner called attention to it has challenged comment. Old readers of The Tribune may remember that a discussion of the proper tempi of the two middle movements was had in this journal as long ago as 1889, in which, besides the reviewer, Dr. von Bülow and Beethoven's great biographer, Alexander W. Thayer, himself a Tribune man some sixty years ago and an interested reader of it down to his death, took part. It was through Wagner that an exaggerated slowness of many tempi, which still prevails chiefly in Germany, came into fashion. He protested against what he considered the flippancy of Mendelssohn, and out of his remarks grew the notion that Beethoven wanted the third movement of his eighth symphony treated as the slow movement because he had prescribed a "tempo di menuetto" for it at a time when through his own example, largely, the old-fashioned dance movement had become a scherzo. But Beethoven had also noted a metronomic indication which made it plain that he wanted the piece to proceed at an extremely fast pace—a faster pace, indeed, than any conductor has ventured upon in all the many years of this writer's experience with the work. When Dr. von Bülow conducted the symphony at a concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, in March, 1889, he played the movement fully one-third slower than Beethoven marked it, and defended his course on the ground, among others, that Beethoven had been misled in his marking by an incorrect instrument. A fact that seems to have been overlooked in the many discussions which have taken place concerning the relative tempi of the two movements is that Beethoven plainly conceived the entire symphony in a merrier mood than his interpreters have done during the last generation. Here some comparative figures are interesting. The composer called for a tempo indicated by sixty-nine measures (the dotted half note being the unit here) to the minute; Dr. von Bülow in 1889 was thirteen measures to the minute slower than this, Mr. Seidl on an average ten measures slower at a Philharmonic concert in December, 1894, and Mr. Safonoff the same at a Philharmonic in January, 1906. Dr. Muck's tempo yesterday was in perfect agreement with Dr. von Bülow's.

It must not be understood that the composer or any of his interpreters ever insisted upon a rigid adherence to the metronomic mark. All that Beethoven wanted was to give a hint, which should serve a general purpose—prevent a gross misconception of his purpose. Though he railed against all mechanical contrivances at times, he yet championed the use of Mälzl's instrument with great warmth, and this even after he had had a quarrel with the inventor which reached the law courts. He was within five months of his death when he sent the metronomic marks for the Ninth Symphony to the publishers and the Philharmonic Society of London. That his conception of a proper tempo varied slightly with his moods has interesting illustration in a transcript made by Thayer of a conversation book used by the composer in October, 1826—now in the possession of this writer. The subject of conversation is the metronomizing of the Choral Symphony for the publisher. Beethoven writes the notes indicating the unit of time and his nephew Karl the figures. After the maestoso in the finale, for which Beethoven had prescribed 60 quarter notes to the minute, Karl writes: "132 is the same tempo, only in notes of half the measure (in two beats)." And later: "You take it quicker than 126, 132, as we had it this morning. Haven't you any composition on which the metronome is noted? From it we could both see the form."

The difference of opinion between the composer and the conductors was smaller in the Allegretto Scherzando. Beethoven marked it 88 eighth notes to the minute; von Bülow played 90, Seidl 96, Safonoff 86 and Fr. Muck yesterday 80. Mr. Seidl, however, at times varied from 96 to 100 and even 120. Dr. von Bülow's notion that the third movement must, at any cost, be made to present itself to the hearers as the slow movement in the symphonic scheme led him to substitute 92 for Beethoven's 126; Seidl and Safonoff were in agreement at 100 and Dr. Muck came nearest to the composer with 116. So he did also in the finale, in which the time unit is a measure in alla breve time. Beethoven marked whole notes 84; von Bülow played 84, Seidl and Safonoff 68 and Dr. Muck 80. There is no pedantic purpose in setting forth these figures; the spirit of a composition is not indicated by its pace alone. Other elements enter into it, but it is interesting to observe that the gladsomeness and madcap humor with which Dr. Muck and his orchestra filled the work yesterday had so much sanction in the pace prescribed by the composer's mechanical formula, to which, it is safe to assume, Dr. Muck gave never a thought. It was a case of correct feeling and at the same time a justification of the composer's markings.

Mr. Kreisler and his companions soared heavenward again in the slow movement of the Brahms concerto and indulged in a tumult of joyousness in the finalé. On the whole his performance surpassed that of Thursday evening in the Beethoven concerto.

H. E. K.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Establisl 1884

HE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

elius' Symphony and Fritz Kreisler's Violin Playing Features in Fine Programme.

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra series at the Academy of Music, last night, was enjoyed to the full by the host of listeners that the large support of these concerts assures. Each of the four numbers programmed by Dr. Karl Muck had a pronounced element of interest, and the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, has so often proved that he is a capable artist that he had an unusually prolonged welcome when he appeared on the stage. The "Symphony No. 1, in E Minor," by Jan Sibelius; Brahms' "Academic Festival Ouerture," "Bruch's "Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G Minor," and Glazounoff's "Ouerture Solennelle" made up the musical list.

Being a comparatively new and strikingly meritorious work by a living composer still under 50 years of age, and from whom much may be expected, the symphony challenged attention. It is not an absolute novelty, as it was introduced to this country by Dr. Muck six years ago when he conducted the Boston Orchestra for a season. A remarkable fact is that the work was not taken up by any other conductor of an American orchestra during the six years since it was first heard. For it is a fine product of modern thought in orchestral writing. The composer has not been widely known outside of his native Finland. But it is impossible that the light of such a composer shall be hid, and he must be hailed as belonging to the world at large.

True in spirit and general structure to the approved form for the symphony, the music is a new proclamation of musical feeling of such directness and originality as to hold the attention and win admiration of its bold frankness and of that kind of attractiveness that makes it more a thing of human interest than a mere work of art. It is an outspoken expression of Finnish temperament with characteristics so clearly defined as to leave no doubt of the impress of national feeling. The composer is free and capricious in the use of melodic figures and in his call upon the resources of the orchestra. He shows a fond dalliance with the wood wind-instruments, bringing them into practically equal prominence with the strings. Sudden contrasts in tone, quality and episodic intrusions crowd one another as though prompted by the exuberant workings of a fancy that fairly reveled in utilizing the various voices of the orchestra. There is a kaleidoscopic succession of melodic fragments as the different instruments take up, one after the other, little phrases of which the composer makes liberal use. In this respect he betrays almost a mannerism of style, such fondness does he show for imitative devices.

Pronounced in its individuality, voicing its thought with assertive independence of conventional procedure, and so obviously sincere as a disclosure of national sentiment, this symphony is surely a flight of genius. Although it suggests that use has been made of folk-melodies, the composer has denied ever using a theme that was not his own invention. This statement is interesting as an assurance of the composer's ingenuity in voicing the spirit of his national music without literally adapting it to his purpose.

The very favorable impression the symphony made on last night's audience was naturally due in large measure to Dr. Muck's really superb interpretation. The work makes claims upon technical execution that are not easily met, and the members of the orchestra responded most admirably, voicing every detail in a way to reveal the finest devotion to an artistic purpose. Fortunate, indeed, is the composer who can have his unfamiliar creation presented in such a manner.

The Bruch "Concerto," in which Mr. Kreisler was heard, has taken its place among the standard modern works of its class, and it was played, last night, with all due regard for its essential musical qualities. Mr. Kreisler brought out but small volume of tone, however, and there was not the breadth and fullness that were demanded in some parts of the solo. His fine art showed itself plenteously though in an exquisite quality of tone and in a finished mastery of execution.

Brahms' "Academic Overture" is a straightforward composition that represents the composer in frank, agreeable mood in proclaiming the buoyant spirits of students days. The Glazounoff "Ouerture" is of a character to find a welcome as a bright example of the musical form it represents wherein the chief melodies are given in broad sweeps of the strings. It is a cheerful exposition of the conventional overture form.

A strange omission from the house programme was the non-appearance of Mr. Kriesler's name. There was nothing to indicate who was the soloist of the evening although, of course, everybody knew. But, maybe, it is too much to expect that the concert programme of today shall always satisfactorily perform its real function of providing information about the concert. So much attention in its preparation is demanded by its modern mission as an advertising circular!

HERALD
ess: New York
Date .... DEC ....

MR. KREISLER ENDS TWO DAY SEASON

Violinist Heard Again with Boston Symphony—To Return to Austria After Charity Recital.

When Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, finished bowing his gratitude at the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday, he had made his season's début and farewell in concert within less than forty-eight hours. His only other appearance here will be a charity recital, after which he will return to Austria for military duty.

Thursday night he played the Beethoven concerto, yesterday he played the Brahms concerto. Both were remarkable performances, yesterday's being probably the more amazing, for the Brahms concerto is said to have been written not for, but "against" the violin. Technically it is awe inspiring. Mr. Kreisler played it with artistic ease mastering its problems of bowing and fingering. But more than that, he revealed the depths of the difficult work, playing the first movement with fine repose and assurance, loosing the sentimental beauty of the second, and dashing off the final movement with brilliancy and temperament.

Dr. Muck, who conducted the orchestra, provided a sympathetic accompaniment that counted for much in the effectiveness of the performance. The audience applauded with enthusiasm—a rare thing—for after the Brahms violin concerto the audience usually heaves a sigh of relief.

The orchestral part of the programme included Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, beautifully played; Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a work lacking in interest despite its finished performance, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3, in which the conducting of Dr. Muck and the playing of the orchestra were superb.

A disturbing incident occurred during the last movement of the Beethoven symphony, when at a pianissimo passage some one back stage walked leisurely, w without rubber heels. Dr. Muck glared the direction of the noise, but it continu In the intermission efforts were made identify the culprit, but without succes

"And the worst of it was," said a m sician later, "that whoever made the no had an unmusical soul, for he did not ke time with the music as he walked."

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date .... DEC 8 -

York, 1884

KREISLER SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Violinist and Boston Symphony Give Brilliant Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Once more yesterday afternoon Fritz Kreisler gave a brilliant exhibition of his powers in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time in Brahms's instead of Beethoven's concerto. Among those who marveled at his skill—enthusiasts who filled Carnegie Hall—sat no less a competitor in the realm artistic than Mischa Elman.

As at the concert last Thursday evening, Kreisler did not appear to be at his best. Phenomenal as was his performance of a difficult cadenza in the first movement, when the little instrument he held high from his shoulder sang in many voices, his fingers had a nervous frenzy that skimmed lightly the noble current of the opening Allegro and barely touched the lofty poetic heights of the Adagio. In the thrilling and invigorating Finale, however—music throbbing with rhythmical life and pulse—Kreisler moved entirely in his element.

Not a bit less inspiring, though, was the artistically and technically impeccable accompaniment given by the orchestra under Dr. Muck's guidance. Not an accompaniment was this, in reality, but a flawless union, a perfect fusion of the symphonic body with its solo associate.

Rare artistic enjoyment, too, was provided by the Boston players and their great leader in Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which opened the programme. Only under Dr. Muck, it would seem, can that wonderful aggregation concentrate every particle of its technical powers on the interpretative message delivered. Few in the assemblage noted the slightest wavering in rhythmical balance during the final movement.

Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture closed the concert.

nown to the American public. Bram

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date .... - 1912

Estab

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Fritz Kreisler's Beautiful Playing of Brahms's Concerto—The Work of the Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a notable one that gave the audience the highest degree of pleasure. Not only was the orchestra itself in its most consummate form and Dr. Muck in his most perfect vein, but Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, seemed to reach a higher point of eloquence, inspired by Brahms's violin concerto, than he has often attained. The result was one of those rare occasions when perfection seems within grasp and hearing.

It would be a long undertaking to tell of all the beauties of the performance of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Third "Leonore" overture, or of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture that were the orchestral numbers. Dr. Muck's readings were instinct with life, with rhythmic intensity, with an exquisite sense of proportion in detail and in the larger outlines, never failing in a sense of beauty of tone and dynamic gradation. He elicits from the virtuosos of the orchestra all their art, their enthusiasm, their devotion, making them contribute all they possess to the greater whole he is molding. No conductor, perhaps, has ever more perfectly made use of all the accumulation of artistic skill and power that are at his disposition in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is all very well for him, when he is recalled by the applause after a performance, to point politely back to his men, as to the ones who really did it. Artists they are, and as artists they play; and were they less artists the results would be by so much less. But the supremely satisfying quality of such a performance as yesterday's comes from the brain and hand, the constructive sense, the technical skill, the vivifying imagination, and the glowing artistic spirit of the conductor.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of Brahms's concerto was the achievement of a great artist, broadly eloquent, exquisitely poetical, free, sometimes, as an improvisation, yet with all its impulse of energy, perfectly symmetrical and perfectly poised. In its way almost as remarkable was the playing of the orchestral accompaniment, which is no "accompaniment," but the other half, an integral part of the concerto. Anything more beautifully molded to the soloist's desire, more instinctively appreciative of his intentions, more subtly modulated in every nuance of color and dynamics, more perfectly balanced, in all its instrumental components is not easily to be imagined. So should this concerto be played, and so it is seldom played—but it is matter for artists, not artisans or beginners. And so played it answers with its own voice the querulous complaint about a "concerto against the violin" and the traditional chatter about the muddy, thick, inexpressive instrumentation of Brahms, the orchestral composer.

The audience was naturally deeply stirred, and manifested it with a demonstration not often heard from matinee audiences Mr. Kreisler was time and again recalled, and his triumph was preeminently deserved.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York. DEC 9 - 1912
Date ....

Establis

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die ſtets herzlich willkommenen Boſtoner Gäſte boten uns Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ein wunderſchönes Konzert mit Fritz Kreisler als Soliſten, und das dicht gefüllte Haus gab ſeiner Begeiſterung durch unzweideutige Zeichen der Zufriedenheit Ausdruck.

Schumann's ſelten gehörte „Genoveva"-Ouverture eröffnete das Programm. Dr. Muck verlieh ihr namentlich im Allegroſatz wirkſame dramatiſche Lebendigkeit und fand gegen Schluß mächtige Steigerungen. Er dirigirte ferner eine höchſt effektvolle „Leonoren"-Ouverture (No. 3), die wie ein glühender Feuerſtrom durch den Saal rauſchte, und entzückte ſein Publikum durch eine geiſtreiche und graziöſe Wiedergabe von Beethoven's „Achter". Die knappe, kernige Friſche des erſten Satzes, der leicht geſchürzte Humor des zweiten mit den regelmäßigen metronomgleichen Begleitungs-Akkorden der Bläſer, den anmuthig hüpfenden Violinen und den drollig-tänzeriſchen Anwandlungen der Brummbäſſe, wirkten höchſt ſtiliſtiſch. Das Menuett nahm er ſteif-gravitätiſch und mit ſcharfen parodiſtiſchen Streiflichtern, und der letzte Satz funkelte und ſprühte nur ſo von Geiſt und Humor. Das Orcheſter ſpielte mit klaſſiſcher Autorität und Virtuoſität. Der Beifall war warm.

Herr Kreisler imponirte durch eine großzügige Wiedergabe von Brahms' Violin-Concert, in der man nur gelegentliche Intonations-Schwierigkeiten bemängeln konnte, welche Leiſtung man aber ehrlich bewundern mußte. Da erſchien die gewaltigſte Technik in den Dienſt der leitenden Idee geſtellt und die muſikaliſche Strenge und Sprödigkeit des Werkes künſtleriſch gemildert. Kreisler wurde etwa zehnmal geradezu begeiſtert gerufen.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date DEC 8 1912

MUCK LETS BEETHOVEN SPEAK AGAIN IN MUSIC

k, 1884

Conductor Refrains From Putting Himself Between Eighth Symphony and Audience.

RARE PLAYING OF PIECE

Kreisler Heard in Brahms Concerto, but Hardly to His Best Advantage.

A "little symphony," such a little symphony that it has dwelt close to the hearts of music lovers for near a century, is Beethoven's eighth. It is a badly battered symphony, too, hauled rudely from the shelves, handed hastily out to the players and rattled off to fill in time at concerts where piano pyrotechnics corrupt and virtuosos break in and steal away musical sensibility. But once in a blue moon some one pays respect unto the letter of the score, and then what a big "little" symphony it is.

Fidgety Hans von Bülow set the little eighth upon its feet here many years ago. But when was it played as it was yesterday afternoon at the second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall? And this was the grand feature of the performance, that there was absolutely no possibility of thinking about Dr. Muck's "reading." He did not disclose one. If he had a reading, he left it at home on the piano. He was not present to exploit the conceptions of Karl Muck, late of Berlin, but of Ludwig van Beethoven, citizen of the world.

What a comfort it was! Think, O ye who are weary of the airs and graces of prima donna conductors, waving their arms semaphorically to indicate the hum of mighty workings in their prodigious brains and translating every one from Bach to Rimsky-Korsakov into their own language. Think of these delirious creatures with their solemn messages, these mystics, oracles, prophets, every one of whom ought, like Dana Da of blessed memory, to have a triple tau and a crux ansata after his name. And then think of the measureless oceans of balderdash which some of them pour out in the name of honest music!

Then think, ye tottering ten thousand, of Muck letting Beethoven himself shine before men, till you felt as if at last you had seen the real thing and must shout, after the manner of your predecessors "Thalassa, thalassa." It was, dearly beloved, a most heavenly experience, for there was no pompous, prancing, loudly advertised personality standing between us and the lovely music. And how the Boston musicians did play it, with inimitable beauty and clarity of tone, with that crystalline lucidity which is apparently their exclusive possession, with perfection of attack, never too strong, never too weak, with elegance and fastidious taste in nuance, with balance never disturbed, with the repose and easy grace of aristocracy. And all this time Dr. Muck was there wielding the baton. Perhaps after all we must conclude that something was due to him, but he did not advertise it. Some will suspect that most of the wonders of this performance were worked by the conductor, but assuredly others will be satisfied that he really did nothing at all.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was the second number, and the last was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3. Between these came the Brahms violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo player. Here let us pause a moment to beg Dr. Muck to bend his mind more closely to the gentle art of programme making. It was not a piece of programme art that he gave us yesterday. If he had omitted the Schumann composition he would have had a good programme; as it was the concert was too long and the Schumann work suffered from its juxtaposition with the others.

Mr. Kreisler again gave his hearers plenty of pleasure. His performance of the first movement of the Brahms concerto seemed unaccountably dull till he came to the cadenza, which was exciting, but in the slow movement and the finale he was more like himself. But we have heard him pour out the message of this characteristic composition with more convincing eloquence. His interpretation yesterday would have made the fame of a minor violinist, but it was not quite Kreisler.

From CAL
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 8 1912

Establish

BEETHOVEN'S "LITTLE EIGHTH" SYMPHONY THE GRAND FEATURE AT MATINEE PERFORMANCE OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL.

A "little symphony," such a little symphony that it has dwelt close to the hearts of music lovers for near a century, is Beethoven's eighth. It is a badly battered symphony, too, hauled rudely from the shelves, handed hastily out to the players and rattled off to fill in time at concerts where piano pyrotechnics corrupt and virtuosos break in and steal away musical sensibility. But once in a blue moon some one pays respect unto the letter of the score and then what a big "little" symphony it is.

Hans von Bulow set the little eighth upon its feet here many years ago. But when was it played as it was yesterday afternoon at the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall? And this was the grand feature of the performance, that there was absolutely no possibility of thinking about Dr. Muck's "reading." He did not disclose one. If he had a reading, he left it at home on the piano. He was not present to exploit the conception of Karl Muck, late of Berlin, but of Ludwig van Beethoven, citizen of the world.

Schumann's "Genovesa" overture was the second number and the last was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3. Between these came the Brahms violin concerto with Fritz Kreisler as the solo player. Here let us pause a moment to beg Dr. Muck to bend his mind more closely to the gentle art of program making. It was not a piece of program art that he gave us. If he had omitted the Schumann composition he would have had a good program; as it was the concert was too long and the Schumann work suffered from its juxtaposition with the others.

Kreisler again gave his hearers plenty of pleasure. His performance of the first movement of the Brahms concerto seemed unaccountably dull till he came to the cadenza, which was exciting, but in the slow movement, and the finale was more like himself. But we have heard him pour out the message of this characteristic composition with more convincing eloquence. His interpretation would have made the fame of a minor violinist, but it was not quite Kreisler.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 7 1912

FRITZ KREISLER SCORES TRIUMPH AT ACADEMY

rk, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night in the Academy of Music. An audience considerably larger than that which attended the opera last Saturday greeted the players. The size of the attendance was probably due not only to the well-merited and ever-increasing popularity of the orchestra but in a large degree to the appearance of Fritz Kreisler, who played Bruch's violin concerto with the orchestra. The distinguished Viennese had not been in Brooklyn for two years, and when he came on the stage last night he received an ovation. After he played the applause was prolonged and enthusiastic. He refused to comply, however, with the insistent demand for an encore. Kreisler's part of the programme was all too short.

For that matter the Boston Symphony programmes always seem too short for the lovers of the orchestra—and they include all the lovers of what is best in music. Last night the principal number was the first of Sibelius' four symphonies, which had been played the night before at the orchestra's Manhattan concert. Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture was also repeated from that programme. The other numbers were the violin concerto and Glazounoff's "Overture Solonnelle."

The combination of the orchestra's playing with that of Kreisler was undoubtedly the cause of the audience's greatest pleasure. Kreisler was superb. The great violinist played with exquisite beauty of tone, emotional power and faultless taste. He introduced many brilliant cadenzas of his own—not acrobatic stunts, although impossible for execution by one who did not possess the greatest technical skill. They materially heightened the effectiveness of Bruch's composition.

With the possible exception of Ysaye there is no living violinist who has obtained the world-wide celebrity which Kreisler has. He is an artist who is truly great, a musician who is thoroughly admirable.

The Sibelius symphony was introduced to New York by Dr. Muck five years ago. It is a melodic work, but filled with a certain melancholy said to be characteristic of Finland, its composer's native country. It was eloquently voiced by the orchestra last night.

Dr. Muck, who received such a memorable welcome last month when he made his first appearance as the conductor after an absence of several years, was once more in charge of the orchestra. The same authoritative readings that have always been characteristic of him, were noticeable throughout the concert. He has a clear and logical perception of the results he wants obtained. His readings last night were poetic and consistently and beautifully effective. The players which make up the orchestra responded splendidly to his inspiring leadership.

It was a triumphant night for Kreisler, but Dr. Muck and the orchestra deserve a large share of the glory of a memorable concert.

From
Address: New York City.
Date 8 - 1912

In den beiden Concerten, welche das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter in letzter Woche hier gegeben hat, trat der eminente Violinvirtuoſe Herr Fritz Kreisler als Soliſt auf und entzückte die Hörer durch ſein in jeder Weiſe vollendetes Spiel. Der Künſtler iſt in dieſer Saiſon nur für das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter verpflichtet worden, ſo daß das große Publikum auf den Genuß, ihn in einem ſelbſtändigen Recital zu bewundern, Verzicht leiſten muß.

ork, 1884

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date

KREISLER AT HIS BEST WITH BOSTON ORCRESTRA.

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second matinee concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday. The house was crowded to the limit with many applicants for admission turned away. Mr. Kreisler was heard in Brahms's concerto in D major, and one is tempted to say that he never played with such inspiration. It was playing that stifled criticism and that compelled the highest admiration. He was recalled many times and applauded in a manner that is unusual by this audience of the musical elect. Dr. Muck and his superb band, in this work, in Beethoven's eighth symphony, in Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and in Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, showed the mettle that makes this organization, perhaps, the best in the world.

YSAYE PLAYS SUPERB

E

, 1884

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date

ducted.

At the matinee performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Dr. Muck's masterly reading of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was the first in a series of musical delights.

This really great conductor took no liberties with the score, indulged in no petty personal eccentricities, but gave the great work a reading of such clarity that it seemed to bathe the listeners in great floods of golden sunlight. All the joyous spirit of the Eighth Symphony was perfectly revealed.

Then came another superb work, Brahms' D major concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist, and with orchestra and leader uniting in an ensemble rarely if ever equalled here.

Schuman's overture, "Genoveva," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3 completed the programme.

Esta

884

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra goes on its way rejoicing to-day after playing with Fritz Kreisler to the three largest audiences that have greeted any orchestra this season in New York.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date DEC 6 - 1912

KREISLER WILL PLAY BENEFIT.

Through the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will give his only recital in New York City this season in the large ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria on the afternoon of Friday, December 20, at 3 o'clock, for the benefit of the Music School Supplement.

1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date DEC 8

Boston Symphony Concert.

At the second Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, another programme of much interest and beauty was performed.

The orchestra contributed the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and the No. 3 "Leonore" overture. It also supported Fritz Kreisler in his interpretation of the Brahms violin concerto in D major.

The vast hall was thronged by eager and attentive listeners.

1884

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUSIC'S SWEET CHARMS AFFECTED BY THE LIGHT

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

The writer wishes to thank Wilbur Kinsey, manager of the Lyric, for diminishing somewhat the brilliance of the lights at the Symphony concert on Wednesday night, this having been done as the result of a previous request to switch the lights off altogether during concerts. Everybody that I talked to remarked on what an improvement this was, but invariably added that while it was better, it was not best, and that a still greater improvement could be worked by going further.

Mr. Kinsey, in answering my letter of the 7th ult., stated that it was because the wishes of the management of the Symphony concerts had to be considered that the lights could not be put out. Are we to understand that they object to their hearers sitting in darkness? Very solicitous, certainly, but we know what we want, and we want what we want when we want it. Just try it—that's all I ask, and if it isn't agreeable go back to the old way. We never progress until we try something new, and the progressives are in the ascendency, even in music. As a matter of fact, however, it has not been a great many years ago that at every musical stunt that season at the Lyric the lights were put out.

Be a sport, Mr. Kinsey, and give us a chance.

H. C. H.

Baltimore, Dec. 5.

1884

From Address
Date

Some very interesting recollections of Edward MacDowell, by Henry F. Gilbert, are printed in the New Music Review. Mr. Gilbert was one of his pupils; he helped to copy the orchestral parts of his first suite, and tells some interesting facts regarding the sources and the composition of the Indian Suite. Mr. Gilbert remembers the occasion of the first performance of the symphonic poem, "Hamlet and Ophelia," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "It was rehearsed all the week and we were all anticipating a treat. But on Friday, the day of the first public concert, the first horn player of the orchestra, having decided that the psychological moment had now arrived for severing his domestic relations, took the two o'clock train for New York, without telling any one. As the concert was at 2:30, this left no time to adjust matters. MacDowell was naturally considerably upset. At first he was all for getting a lawyer and stopping the performance. He cooled down finally, however, and heard his work executed (or possibly murdered) minus the first horn."

On another occasion, MacDowell had composed three songs, one of which was to a poem by Thomas Bailey Aldrich. "He was quite pleased with them, and wished to publish them in his next set of songs. But permission to use the words of the Aldrich songs was somewhat impolitely and rather firmly refused by Mr. Aldrich. MacDowell was certainly indignant enough, and, after a few picturesque, but uncomplimentary, references to Aldrich, sat down then and there and wrote a poem of his own to fit his own music. The original words of Aldrich began:

The blackbird sings in the hazel brake

whereas the MacDowell words begin:

The robin sings in the apple tree.

He chuckled over this considerably. The song is No. 1 in the collection of eight songs Opus 47. Having gotten his hand in, as it were, he frequently wrote both the words and music of his songs thereafter."

The composer with whom MacDowell was most sympathetic was Grieg. Mr.

Est 1884

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date DEC 9 - 1912

Beethoven and Kreisler Share Concert Honors

The Eighth Symphony and Kreisler in the Brahms Concerto the Features of Boston Symphony Concert — Other Musical Matters.

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.30 P. M., song recital by Miss Donna Easley, soprano; 8.15 P. M., concert of the Flonzaley Quartet.

Belasco Theatre—3.30 P. M., concert of the Barrère Ensemble.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "Aida."

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—8.15 P. M., concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

Carnegie Hall—3 P. M., concert by Eugène Ysaye and the Philharmonic orchestra.

One of the finest privileges a concert audience has had this year (or any other year, for that matter) was to hear Beethoven's Eighth Symphony played as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the leadership of Dr. Muck at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. In bulk, of course, the "little symphony in F" cannot compete with the "Eroica," the Fifth, the Seventh, or the Ninth, but in quality it stands among the great symphonies. Being small, it has suffered a good deal of rough handling from orchestras that could not do much harm to its tougher brethren. But Dr. Muck and his men on Saturday avenged it for a host of wrongs. Technical perfection, delicious quality of tone, and a simple directness that sought nothing Beethoven himself did not indicate combined to make this performance one to be remembered long with gratitude and praise.

There were other good things in the concert, too. For one Mr. Kreisler played the Brahms concerto, making, incidentally, the last of his three appearances in New York planned for the present season. Mr. Kreisler had played in concert every previous day of the week, and it would not have been surprising had he shown signs of weariness, but none could be detected save perhaps in the earlier part of the first movement. When he reached the cadenza he was in form to accomplish things that were nothing short of astonishing, and from that point on he played the Brahms concerto as he alone plays it. There may be some who find his treatment of Brahms too temperamental, too exciting. If so, they are probably among the few who persist in enmity toward Brahms and naturally resent being swept by force willy nilly into the opposite camp. The audience—a "capacity hous recalled Mr. Kreisler ag with rapturous and long plause.

Between the symphon certo Schumann's "Geno was heard. Though pla it did not escape seemin of place. The concert cl thoven's third "Leon This had a thrilling pe through anything sensat in the reading, but throu force of the music prese

PITTS

Est 1884

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry hall on New Year's Eve, Providence will have its first opportunity to hear Elena Gerhardt, who is regarded as one of the greatest concert singers of her time. Miss Gerhardt, a German by birth and education, made her first appearances in America last year, and from the beginning enjoyed a most extraordinary success wherever she sung.

She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the eminent conductor, and is one of the few singers of our time who has chosen to devote herself to concert rather than to go into opera. With the Symphony orchestra she will sing two arias yet to be announced.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date

Third Symphony Concert. 16

At the third Boston Symphony Concert to be given in Infantry Hall on New Year's eve Providence will have its first opportunity to hear Elena Gerhardt, who is regarded as one of the greatest concert singers of her time. Miss Gerhardt, a German by birth and education, made her first appearances in America last year and from the beginning enjoyed extraordinary success wherever she sung. She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the eminent conductor, and is one of the few to devote herself to concert rather than to go into opera. With the Symphony Orchestra she will sing two arias yet to be announced.

Est 1884

From Address
Date

ler.

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thinks there is "too much composition being done by little men in German to-day. They are all copyists of the greater men, and follow blindly in their tracks, with the result that they lack all individuality."

When the Council of Trent

rk, 1884

From POST
Address: New York

Kreisler Will Give a Recital.

Fritz Kreisler will, after all, give one of his unique recitals in New York before his return next season, when he is booked for a tour of forty concerts under the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis has courteously granted the great violinist permission to appear in a recital at the Waldorf-Astoria on the afternoon of December 20. The receipts will go to the Music School Settlement. This concert brings one more of the foremost artists of the day in connection with a work to which the most distinguished musicians have given their support and sanction, many by giving the pupils recitals at the School in East Third Street, where their artistry found sincere appreciation. Among the honorary members of the School are Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, and Emma Juch-Wellmann, and Paderewski, Pablo Casals, Josef Lhevinne, Raoul Pugno, and Ernest Schelling. Tickets for this recital will be on sale at the residence of Mrs. Charles H. Ditson, No. 19 East Thirty-seventh Street, and at the regular agencies.

1884

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

itz Kreisler to Play at Benefit.

itz Kreisler, the violinist, who came re this season under engagement exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization he has already appeared in New York twice, is to give a recital in New York after all, it was announced ds will occur at the Wal the benefit nt. Tickets nce of Mrs. Thirty-sev ar agencies.

1884

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date

Established: Lo

MUSICAL SEASON NOW IN FULL SWING

Week-End Crowded with Concerts of Note — Many Turned Away from Kreisler Performance — Alma Gluck at Her Best with Mozart Society—Zimbalist, Ysaye and Amato in Delightful Programmes—Sousa Presents New March.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

There have been few week-ends in the musical world overcrowded to the extent of the one that has just passed, but there have also been few with as many events of equal interest, and the very large audiences in most cases would seem to prove that there is a demand for it.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Kreisler again as soloist, had more standees and more turned away Saturday afternoon than on Thursday night, which is the only manner of estimating the popularity of the attraction, as all the seats in Carnegie Hall are sold by subscription. With a marvelous accompaniment by Dr Muck, the violinist played the Brahms concerto in a manner which disarmed criticism. It was a masterpiece of musicianship, of rare art, of memorable playing, and it elicited storms of applause.

Dr. Muck's offerings were the eighth symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's to the American public. Brahms think the superior

[112]

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date 1912

KREISLER WILL PLAY BENEFIT.

Through the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will give his only recital in New York City this season in the large ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria on the afternoon of Friday, December 20, at 3 o'clock, for the benefit of the Music School Supplement.

E 1884

From AMERICAN

Address: New York.

Da DEC 8

Boston Symphony Concert.

At the second Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, another programme of much interest and beauty was performed.

The orchestra contributed the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and the No. 3 "Leonore" overture. It also supported Fritz Kreisler in his interpretation of the Brahms violin concerto in D major.

The vast hall was thronged by eager and attentive listeners.

Es 1884

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

MUSIC'S SWEET CHARMS AFFECTED BY THE LIGHT

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

The writer wishes to thank Wilbur Kinsey, manager of the Lyric, for diminishing somewhat the brilliance of the lights at the Symphony concert on Wednesday night, this having been done as the result of a previous request to switch the lights off altogether during concerts. Everybody that I talked to remarked on what an improvement this was, but invariably added that while it was better, it was not best, and that a still greater improvement could be worked by going further.

Mr. Kinsey, in answering my letter of the 7th ult., stated that it was because the wishes of the management of the Symphony concerts had to be considered that the lights could not be put out. Are we to understand that they object to their hearers sitting in darkness? Very solicitous, certainly, but we know what we want, and we want what we want when we want it. Just try it—that's all I ask, and if it isn't agreeable go back to the old way. We never progress until we try something new, and the progressives are in the ascendency, even in music. As a matter of fact, however, it has not been a great many years ago that at every musical stunt that season at the Lyric the lights were put out.

Be a sport, Mr. Kinsey, and give us a chance. H. C. H.

Baltimore, Dec. 5.

1884

From

Address

Date

Some very interesting recollections of Edward MacDowell, by Henry F. Gilbert, are printed in the New Music Review. Mr. Gilbert was one of his pupils; he helped to copy the orchestral parts of his first suite, and tells some interesting facts regarding the sources and the composition of the Indian Suite. Mr. Gilbert remembers the occasion of the first performance of the symphonic poem, "Hamlet and Ophelia," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "It was rehearsed all the week and we were all anticipating a treat. But on Friday, the day of the first public concert, the first horn player of the orchestra, having decided that the psychological moment had now arrived for severing his domestic relations, took the two o'clock train for New York, without telling any one. As the concert was at 2:30, this left no time to adjust matters. MacDowell was naturally considerably upset. At first he was all for getting a lawyer and stopping the performance. He cooled down finally, however, and heard his work executed (or possibly murdered) minus the first horn."

On another occasion, MacDowell had composed three songs, one of which was to a poem by Thomas Bailey Aldrich. "He was quite pleased with them, and wished to publish them in his next set of songs. But permission to use the words of the Aldrich songs was somewhat impolitely and rather firmly refused by Mr. Aldrich. MacDowell was certainly indignant enough, and, after a few picturesque, but uncomplimentary, references to Aldrich, sat down then and there and wrote a poem of his own to fit his own music. The original words of Aldrich began:

> The blackbird sings in the hazel brake

whereas the MacDowell words begin:

> The robin sings in the apple tree.

He chuckled over this considerably. The song is No. 1 in the collection of eight songs Opus 47. Having gotten his hand in, as it were, he frequently wrote both the words and music of his songs thereafter."

The composer with whom MacDowell was most sympathetic was Grieg. Mr.

Esta 1884

From GLOBE

Address: New York

Date DEC 9 - 1912

Beethoven and Kreisler Share Concert Honors

The Eighth Symphony and Kreisler in the Brahms Concerto the Features of Boston Symphony Concert — Other Musical Matters.

Es 1884

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.30 P. M., song recital by Miss Donna Easley, soprano; 8.15 P. M., concert of the Flonzaley Quartet.

Belasco Theatre—3.30 P. M., concert of the Barrère Ensemble.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "Aida."

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—8.15 P. M., concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

Carnegie Hall—3 P. M., concert by Eugène Ysaye and the Philharmonic orchestra.

One of the finest privileges a concert audience has had this year (or any other year, for that matter) was to hear Beethoven's Eighth Symphony played as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under the leadership of Dr. Muck at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. In bulk, of course, the "little symphony in F" cannot compete with the "Eroica," the Fifth, the Seventh, or the Ninth, but in quality it stands among the great symphonies. Being small, it has suffered a good deal of rough handling from orchestras that could not do much harm to its tougher brethren. But Dr. Muck and his men on Saturday avenged it for a host of wrongs. Technical perfection, delicious quality of tone, and a simple directness that sought nothing Beethoven himself did not indicate combined to make this performance one to be remembered long with gratitude and praise.

There were other good things in the concert, too. For one Mr. Kreisler played the Brahms concerto, making, incidentally, the last of his three appearances in New York planned for the present season. Mr. Kreisler had played in concert every previous day of the week, and it would not have been surprising had he shown signs of weariness, but none could be detected save perhaps in the earlier part of the first movement. When he reached the cadenza he was in form to accomplish things that were nothing short of astonishing, and from that point on he played the Brahms concerto as he alone plays it. There may be some who find his treatment of Brahms too temperamental, too exciting. If so, they are probably among the few who persist in enmity toward Brahms and naturally resent being swept by force willy nilly into the opposite camp. The audience—a "capacity house," of course—recalled Mr. Kreisler again and again with rapturous and long-continued applause.

Between the symphony and the concerto Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was heard. Though played admirably, it did not escape seeming somewhat out of place. The concert closed with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. This had a thrilling performance, not through anything sensational attempted in the reading, but through the inherent force of the music presented perfectly.

PITTS SANBORN.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry hall on New Year's Eve, Providence will have its first opportunity to hear Elena Gerhardt, who is regarded as one of the greatest concert singers of her time. Miss Gerhardt, a German by birth and education, made her first appearances in America last year, and from the beginning enjoyed a most extraordinary success wherever she sung.

She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the eminent conductor, and is one of the few singers of our time who has chosen to devote herself to concert rather than to go into opera. With the Symphony orchestra she will sing two arias yet to be announced.

E 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PROVIDENCE, R.

Address

Date

Third Symphony Concert.

16

At the third Boston Symphony Concert to be given in Infantry Hall on New Year's eve Providence will have its first opportunity to hear Elena Gerhardt, who is regarded as one of the greatest concert singers of her time. Miss Gerhardt, a German by birth and education, made her first appearances in America last year and from the beginning enjoyed extraordinary success wherever she sung. She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the eminent conductor, and is one of the few to devote herself to concert rather than to go into opera. With the Symphony Orchestra she will sing two arias yet to be announced.

6

Est 1884

From

Address

Date

ler.

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thinks there is "too much composition being done by little men in German to-day. They are all copyists of the greater men, and follow blindly in their tracks, with the result that they lack all individuality."

When the Council of Trent

E rk, 1884

From POST

Address: New York

Kreisler Will Give a Recital.

Fritz Kreisler will, after all, give one of his unique recitals in New York before his return next season, when he is booked for a tour of forty concerts under the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis has courteously granted the great violinist permission to appear in a recital at the Waldorf-Astoria on the afternoon of December 20. The receipts will go to the Music School Settlement. This concert brings one more of the foremost artists of the day in connection with a work to which the most distinguished musicians have given their support and sanction, many by giving the pupils recitals at the School in East Third Street, where their artistry found sincere appreciation. Among the honorary members of the School are Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, and Emma Juch-Wellmann, and Paderewski, Pablo Casals, Josef Lhevinne, Raoul Pugno, and Ernest Schelling. Tickets for this recital will be on sale at the residence of Mrs. Charles H. Ditson, No. 19 East Thirty-seventh Street, and at the regular agencies.

1884

From TIMES

Address: New York

Dat DE

Fritz Kreisler to Play at Benefit.

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who came here this season under engagement exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization he has already appeared in New York twice, is to give a recital in New York after all, it was announced ds will occur at the Wal-the benefit

nt. Tickets
nce of Mrs.
Thirty-sev-ar agencies.

1884

SICAL SEASON NOW IN FULL SWING

eek-End Crowded with Concerts of Note — Many Turned Away from Kreisler Performance — Alma Gluck at Her Best with Mozart Society—Zimbalist, Ysaye and Amato in Delightful Programmes—Sousa Presents New March.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

There have been few week-ends in the musical world overcrowded to the extent of the one that has just passed, but there have also been few with as many events of equal interest, and the very large audiences in most cases would seem to prove that there is a demand for it.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Kreisler again as soloist, had more standees and more turned away Saturday afternoon than on Thursday night, which is the only manner of estimating the popularity of the attraction, as all the seats in Carnegie Hall are sold by subscription. With a marvelous accompaniment by Dr Muck, the violinist played the Brahms concerto in a manner which disarmed criticism. It was a masterpiece of musicianship, of rare art, of memorable playing, and it elicited storms of applause.

Dr. Muck's offerings were the eighth symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's to the American public. Brahms think the superior

From POST
Address: New York
Date ....DEC

Establishe

MUSIC AND DRAM

Kreisler and the Boston Orche

Dr. Carl Muck and his admirab ton orchestra were again heard t advantage on Saturday afternoon, they played the eighth of Beethoven's phonies, the same composer's third "Leonora" overture, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. The symphony fared better than it did at its first hearing in Vienna, in 1814. On that occasion it "did not please the audience," according to Czerny. It more than pleased Saturday's hearers in Carnegie Hall, but that hardly proves their superiority in culture to the audience which heard and did not applaud the première of this composition nearly a century ago. There were no orchestras in those days equal to the best we have now, and in all probability the performance in 1814 left much to be desired, not only in matters of expression, but of technical execution. Beethoven himself seldom had occasion to be satisfied with the way his things were played. To be sure, it must have been difficult for the players of his time, accustomed to the inelastic "classical" primness of those days, to follow his beat, as he indulged as freely in tempo rubato and reading between the lines as any "prima donna conductor" of our time. On this point there is interesting testimony in Nohl's "Beethoven and his Contemporaries," a book which may be cordially commended to those who imagine that the great Ludwig was a metronome.

Special thanks are due to Dr. Muck for reviving Schumann's romantic overture, which, like the third "Leonora," sums up the substance of an opera in a way more satisfactory than the opera itself. Poor Schumann! He thought Wagner was jealous, and therefore refused to accept his advice when he was writing his "Genoveva." With Wagner's aid, it is not improbable that that opera might have escaped its fiasco. There is much beautiful music in it.

Fritz Kreisler was again the soloist. The Brahms concerto which he played was written for Joseph Joachim, who, though he was the leading violinist of the time, had, according to a prominent Leipzig critic, great difficulty in performing it, although he had lent a helping hand in its construction. That was a third of a century ago. In the meantime the technique of violin playing has advanced with rapid strides, so that even the young fiddlers, just out of their teens and the conservatory, venture to play this bristling concerto in public. They usually have cause to regret it—for two reasons. In the first place, it is not idiomatic for the violin, and its difficulties are not effective. In the second place, it does not lend itself to sensuous cajolings. Even Mr. Kreisler, with his consummate art, could not make the adagio sound so deep and soulful as he did the larghetto of the Beethoven concerto two days previously; nor could he construct so sublime a cadenza for the first movement for the reason that Brahms did not play into his hands, as Beethoven did, with sublime themes. In the third movement the tables were turned. Here Brahms is superior, and the rhythmic incisiveness of his fiery rondo gave Mr. Kreisler his best opportunity to show his mettle to the audience and to elicit applause that had to be responded to by many returns to the stage. If we must have the Brahms concerto, by all means let Mr. Kreisler play it, for no one does it so well.

It is to be hoped that he may be persuaded to give at least one recital ere he returns to Europe, so as to give the thousands of his American admirers a chance to hear him and his mellow Guarnerius in some of those melodious old Italian pieces which he has resurrected and edited, to the joy of all violinists, public and amateur, and also in some of his own delightfully Viennese pieces. He is to return next season, to be sure, but that is a long time to wait.

One thing there is reason to be grateful for: no longer is there any danger that he will have to report for military duty in the polyphonic Balkan war. The company in which he is a first lieutenant belongs to one of the crack regiments of the Austrian army which would have been sent to the front at once in case of war. For this reason the rumor, not long ago, that Lieut. Kreisler had been called back actually affected the stock market. But imagine a state of civilization which would allow one isorders which our south-sea brothers ave controlled. Canada, indeed, has ad in its "Mounted Police" an admira-le organization, but we presume that

---

From EVO. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date ....DEC 9 -

Establishe

MONDAY

Fritz Kreisler's Violin Thrills Interpreting Brahms' Concerto

When the reviewer of musical happenings is confronted with seven such happenings in two days and the necessity of commenting upon all seven in the Monday issue following these full and overflowing forty-eight hours, he has the choice of hurrying from one to another, paragraph upon paragraph, or else selecting the most significant, dwelling a bit upon that, and chronicling the others. Let us select the latter course in regard to the seven concerts of Saturday and Sunday.

There can be no question that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with Fritz Kreisler as the solo performer, achieved the distinction of significance. Its significance was two-fold, in that it had to do with the music of Beethoven and Brahms, and had to do with it, moreover, in one of those true revelations of interpretation that occur only rarely during a concert year.

Dr. Muck selected for his programme the Eighth Symphony and the "Leonore" No. 3 overture of Beethoven, the violin concerto of Brahms and the far less important "Geneveva" overture of Schumann. The Eighth Symphony, called a "little" symphony by Beethoven himself, proved to be "little" only in extent, as it must always prove to be when it is played with the combination of delicacy, force and grasp that Dr. Muck and the men from Boston expended upon it. It was Beethoven's most lightly joyous symphonic expression disclosed in all its graciousness.

Mr. Kreisler, for some years, has been regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim in the playing of the Brahms concerto. The violinist disproves eloquently that it is a "concerto against the violin." He was some little time—for him—in reaching his full powers in the opening movement, but he produced a veritable thrill in the cadenza. The middle movement was played with a noble expressiveness and a glorious tone, and the rondo was a thing to arouse unbridled enthusiasm—as it did—with its splendid dash and fervor.

BOSTON GLOBE—
DECEMBER 14.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Reger's New Concerto Work of True Interest.

Mr Godowsky Plays Beethoven With More Virtuosity Than Sentiment.

The program at the eighth Symphony rehearsal yesterday was as follows:

Reger, "Concerto in the Ancient Style" for orchestra, op 123, first time in Boston; Beethoven, concerto in G major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Leopold Godowsky, soloist; Borodin, Symphony No. 2 in B minor, first time in Boston.

Owing to the illness of Dr Muck, Otto Urack, his newly appointed assistant, made his first appearance at a Symphony concert as conductor.

Some have awaited with confidence the day when Reger would emerge from his contrapuntal orgies and wallowings with a purged and chastened spirit. They have watched his opus numbers climb steadily beyond the 100 mark with but little promise of a regeneration.

True, there have been glimpses now and then, as in the slow movement of the E flat major quartet first played here by Messrs. Hess and Schroeder and their associates, of a musical speech, significant, but not prolix, neither turgid, with a harmonic vocabulary of sweeping vision, and thoughts of profound beauty. But these glimpses were rare.

A New Discretion.

Yesterday this concerto was brought forward. It shows unmistakably a new discretion, a new sense of proportion, a new balance and sanity of thought. There is elaborate figuration and there is contrapuntal development, but the sheer skill of the workman in design does not now obscure its character and purpose.

Here is music wearing a suggestion of the precise and formal guise of Bach with a modern freedom in ornamentation and color. The rhythmic figuration is antique in flavor. The first theme opens with a pompous flourish of a Handelian fugal subject, and returns at the crest of an imposing ascent, broadened and set off by contrapuntal devices in trumpets and horns. It may have been but an incident of the performance yesterday that its contour was somewhat obscured by them.

The use of solo violin and flute in a sprightly dialogue is interesting. Against this series of running passages there is a contrasting section of sustained melodic phrases. The softly echoing horns make a singularly beautiful effect. Reger has not been so fortunate generally in making his points of repose.

Some Melodic Invention.

The slow movement is the most musical of the work. It is built upon lines of breadth and simplicity, and gives the impression of quiet and well-poised strength. There is melodic invention which lacks neither spontaneity nor grace. The movement as a whole denotes a Reger of new sensibility.

It would be preferable to hear the closing allegro again before concluding that it returns to the boisterousness of his Comedy Overtures. The critical faculty appears to have lapsed and there are few evidences of inspiration.

A performance with Dr Muck may serve Reger in good stead here. That Mr Urack showed traces of nervousness is not strange with so important a program before him. He has the ardor of youth, which at times approaches impetuosity, but he also has imagination as well as evident experience in orchestral routine.

Mr Godowsky's Skill.

Mr Godowsky's fame as a technician has crossed the Atlantic during his European residence. In smoothness, true limpidity of scale passages and digital dexterity in general, the performance yesterday was a remarkable one. The andante was sung with the sustained vocal beauty of cantilena, and the pianist displayed his mastery in the trill and other ornamentations.

All of this, however, remained more upon the surface than it penetrated to the emotional depths of the concerto. The cadenza of the first movement, whether by the pianist or another, was a blot upon the performance, a vehicle for virtuosity, and out of the frame of the work.

Borodin's symphony, which Liszt praised, and wherein he sketches the figures of Russian knights, was intentionally grim, elemental and angular music, uncompromisingly National in its tone.

There are features of rugged strength in it, and some diversity of character, but the four square phraseology and the unescapable sequence is scarcely less tedious than in the "Thamar" of Valikirew.

JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 14.

URACK CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Ill, New Assistant Gives Spirited Exhibition.

For the first time in a good many years the regular conductor of the Symphony concerts is absent from his post this week. Dr. Muck fell a victim to tonsilitis last Tuesday, and so his place at yesterday's concert was taken by the new assistant conductor, Otto Urack.

Mr. Urack, who is one of the youngest members of the orchestra, gave a spirited exhibition of conducting at the matinee. It was really one of the best features of the concert and the conductor pro tem. fairly shared honors with the soloist, Professor Godowsky. It was a tremendous task to spring at the last hour upon any conductor, for the program this week includes two works new to Boston, the German Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," and the Russian Borodin's second symphony.

The Reger work is brilliantly scored, and it abounds in openings for the solo violin, while the symphony is as bizarre as a bargain sale in Nidjni-Novgorod. It is splashed all over with orientalism. The tinkle of the guzla and the coo of the bamboo flute are missing; but there are cymbals, tambourine, harp and the big bass drum to lend high color to Borodin's tone poem of the troubadours, heroes and princes of feudal Russia.

Borodin himself was of the princely house of Imeretinsky, which claims descent from King David of old, so that the oriental clink of the symphony is no affectation, but a tendency that was second nature to the composer. These two novelties were dashingly performed.

Leopold Godowsky, the distinguished Russian pianist, gave a polished performance of the Beethoven concerto in G major and was recalled half a dozen times.

Heinrich Warnke, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist at next week's concerts. He will play the concerto in A minor, by Klughardt, a work which has never been heard here. The rest of the program will comprise Mozart's symphony in G minor and Bruckner's symphony in E major.

ADVERTISER.
DECEMBER 14.

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE REGER'S "CONCERTO IN ANCIENT STYLE"

Borodin's Second Symphony Heard Yesterday for First Time by Local Orchestra — Mr. Urack Conducts.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Reger. Concerto in Ancient Style.
Beethoven. Fourth Piano Concerto, in G major. Soloist, Mr. Leopold Godowsky.
Borodin. Symphony No. 2, in B minor.

The return of our musical Argonauts with a golden fleece of reviews was celebrated yesterday afternoon by a programme that was in some respects memorable. It gave two new works and presented a new and great pianist. It also presented a new conductor, Mr. Urack, in the place of Dr. Muck, who was ill. The ingenuity of Reger shrivelled up before the inspiration of Beethoven, but the concerto in ancient style was nevertheless an important work, one which required a hearing and demanded studying. It was not in ancient style except in the fact that it played several instruments in a concerted manner, instead of having a single prominent solo instrument as the classical concertos generally do. The hands were the hands of Esau but the voice was the voice of Jacob. It was the very modern and ingenious Max Reger masquerading in an antique combination. It was also in the old free form, but not at all in the old calm spirit.

But Reger proves that he can vie contrapuntally with almost any of the old composers. The figure development of the first movement is remarkably skilful. The solo violin has much difficult work to do and it was all well done. A triumphant fanfare, trumpets echoed by woodwind, is interwoven with considerable complexity with some of the figures which have preceded. The movement, and in fact the entire work is conservative in orchestration, after the manner of olden times, the classical orchestra score.

The second movement, Largo, is the most attractive, or let us say the least repellent, of the three. Here there are moments of attractive tunefulness, and the chief theme, with its antiphonal effects of strings and woodwind, and its transition upon the horns, are points which redeem the complexity of the rest of the work. The second theme, major against the preceding minor effects, and given "Tutti," is not as great as the chief subject. There is considerable mystery, which is heightened by pauses. We should like to hear this second movement again, but not if it entailed listening to the other two movements.

The finale is again the learned Reger, the best fugal writer of the 20th century. There is no such wonderful contrapuntal triumph as he wins in his great orchestral fugue which was given at these concerts a few seasons ago, but there is fugato work, great interweaving of themes, obbligato work for solo violin and flute, in the style of the ancient concerto, (and this was splendidly played) and a broad coda.

Musician's music! Something that is not for the public and not even for the elect unless they are willing to study the scheme with patience and intensity. We acknowledge the skill, the profundity, the ingenuity, but we do not thrill to it. We could alter Longfellow into—

> These strainings of Reger's music,
> These mighty thoughts suggest,
> Life's endless toil and endeavor,
> And tonight I long for rest.

But mighty little rest can be found in the "Concerto in Ancient Style." The auditor must sit up and take his medicine.

It was a great test for the new assistant conductor, Mr. Urack, and he came out of it unscathed. He was warmly welcomed at his entrance and was recalled at the end of the work. But he did even better with the real concerto which followed and best of all in the massive Borodin symphony. Whether anything more tangible could have been made out of the Reger concerto we do not know. We should like to have heard Dr. Muck's reading.

Oh how one bathed in Beethoven after the arduous Reger task! It may have been subtle slyness that led Dr. Muck to put this concerto just before Beethoven's beautiful work. He could not have made a greater or more effective contrast. If we were asked off-hand which piano concerto we held to be the greatest and most beautiful in the world, we should pass by the "Emperor" and choose this fourth concerto.

It is not quite so symphonic as the fifth but it is the more appealing of the two, just as Mozart's G minor symphony is more sympathetic than his loftier "Jupiter" symphony. If classical music be the combination of the intellectual with the emotional, the blend could never be more perfect than in this concerto.

And it introduced a great artist. Leopold Godowsky is a giant in technique, a rival of Rosenthal in the field of virtuosity; but he can sometimes make this technical ability a means to a greater end. Yesterday one thought first of Beethoven, second of Godowsky. But not in the two cadenzas. These were colossal. The chord and arpeggio and scale work was something long to be remembered. Whether it was wise to make the first cadenza so long may be questioned. Beethoven was not in sympathy with long cadenzas as the written direction in the finale and the abolition of the solo cadenza in his next concerto show. But it was worth while to hear such a wonderful technique in its fullest display, and in the rest of the work Mr. Godowsky was the true artist. Not

From POST
Address: New York
Date .... DEC

Establishe

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Carl Muck and his admirable Boston orchestra were again heard to best advantage on Saturday afternoon, when they played the eighth of Beethoven's symphonies, the same composer's third "Leonora" overture, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. The symphony fared better than it did at its first hearing in Vienna, in 1814. On that occasion it "did not please the audience," according to Czerny. It more than pleased Saturday's hearers in Carnegie Hall, but that hardly proves their superiority in culture to the audience which heard and did not applaud the première of this composition nearly a century ago. There were no orchestras in those days equal to the best we have now, and in all probability the performance in 1814 left much to be desired, not only in matters of expression, but of technical execution. Beethoven himself seldom had occasion to be satisfied with the way his things were played. To be sure, it must have been difficult for the players of his time, accustomed to the inelastic "classical" primness of those days, to follow his beat, as he indulged as freely in tempo rubato and reading between the lines as any "prima donna conductor" of our time. On this point there is interesting testimony in Nohl's "Beethoven and his Contemporaries," a book which may be cordially commended to those who imagine that the great Ludwig was a metronome.

Special thanks are due to Dr. Muck for reviving Schumann's romantic overture, which, like the third "Leonora," sums up the substance of an opera in a way more satisfactory than the opera itself. Poor Schumann! He thought Wagner was jealous, and therefore refused to accept his advice when he was writing his "Genoveva." With Wagner's aid, it is not improbable that that opera might have escaped its fiasco. There is much beautiful music in it.

Fritz Kreisler was again the soloist. The Brahms concerto which he played was written for Joseph Joachim, who, though he was the leading violinist of the time, had, according to a prominent Leipzig critic, great difficulty in performing it, although he had lent a helping hand in its construction. That was a third of a century ago. In the meantime the technique of violin playing has advanced with rapid strides, so that even the young fiddlers, just out of their teens and the conservatory, venture to play this bristling concerto in public. They usually have cause to regret it—for two reasons. In the first place, it is not idiomatic for the violin, and its difficulties are not effective. In the second place, it does not lend itself to sensuous cajolings. Even Mr. Kreisler, with his consummate art, could not make the adagio sound so deep and soulful as he did the larghetto of the Beethoven concerto two days previously; nor could he construct so sublime a cadenza for the first movement for the reason that Brahms did not play into his hands, as Beethoven did, with sublime themes. In the third movement the tables were turned. Here Brahms is superior, and the rhythmic incisiveness of his fiery rondo gave Mr. Kreisler his best opportunity to show his mettle to the audience and to elicit applause that had to be responded to by many returns to the stage. If we must have the Brahms concerto, by all means let Mr. Kreisler play it, for no one does it so well.

It is to be hoped that he may be persuaded to give at least one recital ere he returns to Europe, so as to give the thousands of his American admirers a chance to hear him and his mellow Guarnerius in some of those melodious old Italian pieces which he has resurrected and edited, to the joy of all violinists, public and amateur, and also in some of his own delightfully Viennese pieces. He is to return next season, to be sure, but that is a long time to wait.

One thing there is reason to be grateful for: no longer is there any danger that he will have to report for military duty in the polyphonic Balkan war. The company in which he is a first lieutenant belongs to one of the crack regiments of the Austrian army which would have been sent to the front at once in case of war. For this reason the rumor, not long ago, that Lieut. Kreisler had been called back actually affected the stock market. But imagine a state of civilization which would allow one isorders which our south-sea brothers ave controlled. Canada, indeed, has ad in its "Mounted Police" an admirale organization, but we presume that

---

---

DEC 9

MONDAY

Kreisler's Violin Thrills Interpreting Brahms' Concerto

n the reviewer of musical hap- s is confronted with seven such enings in two days and the necessity of commenting upon all seven in the Monday issue following these full and overflowing forty-eight hours, he has the choice of hurrying from one to another, paragraph upon paragraph, or else selecting the most significant, dwelling a bit upon that, and chronicling the others. Let us select the latter course in regard to the seven concerts of Saturday and Sunday.

There can be no question that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with Fritz Kreisler as the solo performer, achieved the distinction of significance. Its significance was two-fold, in that it had to do with the music of Beethoven and Brahms, and had to do with it, moreover, in one of those true revelations of interpretation that occur only rarely during a concert year.

Dr. Muck selected for his programme the Eighth Symphony and the "Leonore" No. 3 overture of Beethoven, the violin concerto of Brahms and the far less important "Geneveva" overture of Schumann. The Eighth Symphony, called a "little" symphony by Beethoven himself, proved to be "little" only in extent, as it must always prove to be when it is played with the combination of delicacy, force and grasp that Dr. Muck and the men from Boston expended upon it. It was Beethoven's most lightly joyous symphonic expression disclosed in all its graciousness.

Mr. Kreisler, for some years, has been regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim in the playing of the Brahms concerto. The violinist disproves eloquently that it is a "concerto against the violin." He was some little time—for him—in reaching his full powers in the opening movement, but he produced a veritable thrill in the cadenza. The middle movement was played with a noble expressiveness and a glorious tone, and the rondo was a thing to arouse unbridled enthusiasm—as it did—with its splendid dash and fervor.

BOSTON GLOBE–
DECEMBER 14.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Reger's New Concerto Work of True Interest.

Mr Godowsky Plays Beethoven With More Virtuosity Than Sentiment.

The program at the eighth Symphony rehearsal yesterday was as follows:

Reger, "Concerto in the Ancient Style" for orchestra, op 123, first time in Boston; Beethoven, concerto in G major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Leopold Godowsky, soloist; Borodin, Symphony No. 2 in B minor, first time in Boston.

Owing to the illness of Dr Muck, Otto Urack, his newly appointed assistant, made his first appearance at a Symphony concert as conductor.

Some have awaited with confidence the day when Reger would emerge from his contrapuntal orgies and wallowings with a purged and chastened spirit. They have watched his opus numbers climb steadily beyond the 100 mark with but little promise of a regeneration.

True, there have been glimpses now and then, as in the slow movement of the E flat major quartet first played here by Messrs Hess and Schroeder and their associates, of a musical speech, significant, but not prolix, neither turgid, with a harmonic vocabulary of sweeping vision, and thoughts of profound beauty. But these glimpses were rare.

A New Discretion.

Yesterday this concerto was brought forward. It shows unmistakably a new discretion, a new sense of proportion, a new balance and sanity of thought. There is elaborate figuration and there is contrapuntal development, but the sheer skill of the workman in design does not now obscure its character and purpose.

Here is music wearing a suggestion of the precise and formal guise of Bach with a modern freedom in ornamentation and color. The rhythmic figuration is antique in flavor. The first theme opens with a pompous flourish of a Handelian fugal subject, and returns at the crest of an imposing ascent, broadened and set off by contrapuntal devices in trumpets and horns. It may have been but an incident of the performance yesterday that its contour was somewhat obscured by them.

The use of solo violin and flute in a sprightly dialogue is interesting. Against this series of running passages there is a contrasting section of sustained melodic phrases. The softly echoing horns make a singularly beautiful effect. Reger has not been so fortunate generally in making his points of repose.

Some Melodic Invention.

The slow movement is the most musical of the work. It is built upon lines of breadth and simplicity, and gives the impression of quiet and well-poised strength. There is melodic invention which lacks neither spontaneity nor grace. The movement as a whole denotes a Reger of new sensibility.

It would be preferable to hear the closing allegro again before concluding that it returns to the boisterousness of his Comedy Overtures. The critical faculty appears to have lapsed and there are few evidences of inspiration.

A performance with Dr Muck may serve Reger in good stead here. That Mr Urack showed traces of nervousness is not strange with so important a program before him. He has the ardor of youth, which at times approaches impetuosity, but he also has imagination as well as evident experience in orchestral routine.

Mr Godowsky's Skill.

Mr Godowsky's fame as a technician has crossed the Atlantic during his European residence. In smoothness, true limpidity of scale passages and digital dexterity in general, the performance yesterday was a remarkable one. The andante was sung with the sustained vocal beauty of cantilena, and the pianist displayed his mastery in the trill and other ornamentations.

All of this, however, remained more upon the surface than it penetrated to the emotional depths of the concerto. The cadenza of the first movement, whether by the pianist or another, was a blot upon the performance, a vehicle for virtuosity, and out of the frame of the work.

Borodin's symphony, which Liszt praised, and wherein he sketches the figures of Russian knights, was intentionally grim, elemental and [illegible] music, uncompromisingly National in its tone.

There are features of rugged strength in it, and some diversity of character, but the four square phraseology and the unescapable sequence is scarcely less tedious than in the "Thamar" of Valikirew.

JOURNAL–
DECEMBER 14,

URACK CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Ill, New Assistant Gives Spirited Exhibition.

For the first time in a good many years the regular conductor of the Symphony concerts is absent from his post this week. Dr. Muck fell a victim to tonsilitis last Tuesday, and so his place at yesterday's concert was taken by the new assistant conductor, Otto Urack.

Mr. Urack, who is one of the youngest members of the orchestra, gave a spirited exhibition of conducting at the matinee. It was really one of the best features of the concert and the conductor pro tem. fairly shared honors with the soloist, Professor Godowsky. It was a tremendous task to spring at the last hour upon any conductor, for the program this week includes two works new to Boston, the German Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," and the Russian Borodin's second symphony.

The Reger work is brilliantly scored, and it abounds in openings for the solo violin, while the symphony is as bizarre as a bargain sale in Nidjni-Novgorod. It is splashed all over with orientalism. The tinkle of the guzla and the coo of the bamboo flute are missing; but there are cymbals, tambourine, harp and the big bass drum to lend high color to Borodin's tone poem of the troubadours, heroes and princes of feudal Russia.

Borodin himself was of the princely house of Imeretinsky, which claims descent from King David of old, so that the oriental clink of the symphony is no affectation, but a tendency that was second nature to the composer. These two novelties were dashingly performed.

Leopold Godowsky, the distinguished Russian pianist, gave a polished performance of the Beethoven concerto in G major and was recalled half a dozen times.

Heinrich Warnke, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist at next week's concerts. He will play the concerto in A minor, by Klughardt, a work which has never been heard here. The rest of the program will comprise Mozart's symphony in G minor and Bruckner's symphony in E major.

ADVERTISER.
DECEMBER 14,

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE REGER'S "CONCERTO IN ANCIENT STYLE"

Borodin's Second Symphony Heard Yesterday for First Time by Local Orchestra — Mr. Urack Conducts.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Reger. Concerto in Ancient Style.
Beethoven. Fourth Piano Concerto, in G major. Soloist, Mr. Leopold Godowsky.
Borodin. Symphony No. 2, in B minor.

The return of our musical Argonauts with a golden fleece of reviews was celebrated yesterday afternoon by a programme that was in some respects memorable. It gave two new works and presented a new and great pianist. It also presented a new conductor, Mr. Urack, in the place of Dr. Muck, who was ill. The ingenuity of Reger shrivelled up before the inspiration of Beethoven, but the concerto in ancient style was nevertheless an important work, one which required a hearing and demanded studying. It was not in ancient style except in the fact that it played several instruments in a concerted manner, instead of having a single prominent solo instrument as the classical concertos generally do. The hands were the hands of Esau but the voice was the voice of Jacob. It was the very modern and ingenious Max Reger masquerading in an antique combination. It was also in the old free form, but not at all in the old calm spirit.

But Reger proves that he can vie contrapuntally with almost any of the old composers. The figure development of the first movement is remarkably skilful. The solo violin has much difficult work to do and it was all well done. A triumphant fanfare, trumpets echoed by woodwind, is interwoven with considerable complexity with some of the figures which have preceded. The movement, and in fact the entire work is conservative in orchestration, after the manner of olden times, the classical orchestra score.

The second movement, Largo, is the most attractive, or let us say the least repellent, of the three. Here there are moments of attractive tunefulness, and the chief theme, with its antiphonal effects of strings and woodwind, and its transition upon the horns, are points which redeem the complexity of the rest of the work. The second theme, major against the preceding minor effects, and given "Tutti," is not as great as the chief subject. There is considerable mystery, which is heightened by pauses. We should like to hear this second movement again, but not if it entailed listening to the other two movements.

The finale is again the learned Reger, the best fugal writer of the 20th century. There is no such wonderful contrapuntal triumph as he wins in his great orchestral fugue which was given at these concerts a few seasons ago, but there is fugato work, great interweaving of themes, obbligato work for solo violin and flute, in the style of the ancient concerto, (and this was splendidly played) and a broad coda.

Musician's music! Something that is not for the public and not even for the elect unless they are willing to study the scheme with patience and intensity. We acknowledge the skill, the profundity, the ingenuity, but we do not thrill to it. We could alter Longfellow into—

> These strainings of Reger's music,
> These mighty thoughts suggest,
> Life's endless toil and endeavor,
> And tonight I long for rest.

But mighty little rest can be found in the "Concerto in Ancient Style." The auditor must sit up and take his medicine.

It was a great test for the new assistant conductor, Mr. Urack, and he came out of it unscathed. He was warmly welcomed at his entrance and was recalled at the end of the work. But he did even better with the real concerto which followed and best of all in the massive Borodin symphony. Whether anything more tangible could have been made out of the Reger concerto we do not know. We should like to have heard Dr. Muck's reading.

Oh how one bathed in Beethoven after the arduous Reger task! It may have been subtle slyness that led Dr. Muck to put this concerto just before Beethoven's beautiful work. He could not have made a greater or more effective contrast. If we were asked off-hand which piano concerto we held to be the greatest and most beautiful in the world, we should pass by the "Emperor" and choose this fourth concerto.

It is not quite so symphonic as the fifth but it is the more appealing of the two, just as Mozart's G minor symphony is more sympathetic than his loftier "Jupiter" symphony. If classical music be the combination of the intellectual with the emotional, the blend could never be more perfect than in this concerto.

And it introduced a great artist. Leopold Godowsky is a giant in technique, a rival of Rosenthal in the field of virtuosity; but he can sometimes make this technical ability a means to a greater end. Yesterday one thought first of Beethoven, second of Godowsky. But not in the two cadenzas. These were colossal. The chord and arpeggio and scale work was something long to be remembered. Whether it was wise to make the first cadenza so long may be questioned. Beethoven was not in sympathy with long cadenzas as the written direction in the finale and the abolition of the solo cadenza in his next concerto show. But it was worth while to hear such a wonderful technique in its [illegible] display, and in the rest of the work [illegible] was the true artist. Not

[113]

Although Borodin has been dead for many years (he died in 1887) his second symphony was heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday. It is not a very intricate work, but it is in the good Russian school which uses the folk-song as a foundation and which seeks rather than avoids melody. The symphony is full of massive power. The Andante has themes that are very characteristic and Borodin has confessed that he desired here to picture the ancient Russian bards and minstrels. The first movement is full of pomp and power, as if some festival of barbaric splendor were taking place. The finale has more of this festal style, but in Borodin one does not find the wild bacchanalian revelry that is discernible in Tschaikowsky's finales at times. There is more of pomp and less of Vodka.

If there were crudities in the work, and perhaps a too constantly Slavonic mood, the originality and the unusual flavor condoned this.

Judged from a pedantic stand point this symphony would be crude beside the Reger work, but, as a matter of fact, for all its crudities it towered above it. After all, the final test is ideas, and this symphony is brimful or original ones.

It is Oriental at many points. The proverb says, "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," and Borodin has scratched all the veneering off. Many a German could have developed the great figure of the first movement more skilfully, but none of them would have obtained the mystic power that is here revealed, even without contrapuntal aids. The mysterious pizzicati of the Scherzo, the unrestful 5-4 rhythm of the finale, the thoroughly characteristic and individual style of it all make us wonder that the Symphony concerts have been so tardy in arriving at such a masterpiece. It is another indication of the fact that in orchestral music—"Die Russen Kommen!"

HERALD.

DECEMBER 14.

MR. GODOWSKY AT SYMPHONY

Pianist Gives Masterly Performance of Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G Major

OTTO URACK CONDUCTS

Novelties by Reger and Borodin Features of 8th Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Inasmuch as Dr. Muck is suffering from an attack of tonsilitis, Mr. Urack conducted in his stead. Leopold Godowsky was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Concerto in the ancient style........Reger
Concerto No. 4, G-major, for piano....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, B-minor........Borodin

Reger's concerto and Borodin's symphony were performed for the first time in Boston. The former is a new work and was heard for the first time at Frankfort-on-the-Main on Oct. 4 last. The symphony was composed in the seventies of the last century, produced at St. Petersburg in 1877, and played in this country as early as 1898, if not before then.

Of course, the answer to Reger's concerto takes the form of a question: "Why in 1912 compose a concerto in the ancient style?" Bach and Handel did this sort of thing much better. The form and expression were as their natural speech. Their music was addressed to contemporaneous ears. Some of it still lives, because its strength and beauty even then chafed at the rigid confinement and now leads us to forget the formal bands. This music also had style, as had the sonatas of Scarlatti, the little pieces of the grand Couperin. Why in this century so alien to the period of Bach and Handel attempt to put strong wine of today in the old bottles? For, in spite of the title, the thoughts of Reger and his harmonic scheme, however brave his endeavor, elude the cramping form, nor will they be disguised by any scholastic artifice. Even to those accustomed to the wildest modern music there is much in this concerto that is ultra-modern and disturbing.

The composer's talent is irregular. In this concerto there are pages that are conventional, deliberately so or unconsciously; mere formulas; dull passage work; and lo, there will come a musical thought oddly expressed that ravishes the ear. If Reger only were less productive! If he had not the facility that is fatal! If he only had the saving gift of unsparing self-criticism! If he would only cut out three-fourths of his musical [illegible], and be more anxious about the [illegible] of his sentences and their [illegible] balance! Has he any sense of humor?

---

superb pomp of Handel in ordinary or extraordinary statement. Nor can he hope to attain the simplicity of Bach, who is essentially simple even when he seems contrapuntally most complex.

Mr. Godowsky, who is now ranked among the great pianists of the day, returned after an absence of nearly twelve years. His performance of Beethoven's concerto was masterly; his conception of the work was pure and noble. Years ago he was famous for his technical proficiency. This surpassing technic is now vitalized. A perfect run is now something more than the faultless accomplishment of a task. Formerly, he was reproached for dryness. He may now be praised for beauty of tone. When Eugen d'Albert was first of all a pianist and at the zenith of his fame, he visited Boston and played the second movement of this concerto with an indescribable depth of feeling.

Mr. Godowsky's reading was far different, and more in accordance with the indications of the composer. There was no attempt to answer in protest the stern orchestral recitatives. It would be a pleasure to speak of the many exquisite details of a performance which for sheer beauty, fine sense of proportion and unostentatious but remarkable technical display has seldom, if ever, been equalled here within the last 20 years.

Borodin's first symphony is more or less familiar here. The second was edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff. It would be interesting to know what they did to it; how their edition differs from the original version. It is barbarically oriental enough as it stands. When Borodin was writing it he was also at work on "Prince Igor," and some of the material destined for the opera found its way into the symphony. It is a singular work, interesting chiefly to the ethnologist in music. Defiant in structure, now wild, now stertorous, or at times childishly naive in the orchestration, with themes that for the most part suggest folk-song origin, the music smacks of the soil and of an untamed race. Hearing it, it is easy to understand why Liszt, bored by compositions smugly made according to the correct German expression of the seventies, welcomed Borodin's symphony and urged him to write as he felt.

Mr. Urack, who had had little time for preparation, fulfilled his task modestly and well. The audience fully appreciated his achievement.

The program announced for the concerts of next week includes Mozart's symphony in G minor; a 'cello concerto by Klughardt, and Bruckner's symphony No. 7, the "Romantic." Mr. Warnke will be the soloist.

POST,

DECEMBER 14,

URACK LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Ill—Masterly Performance by Godowsky

BY OLIN DOWNES

Otto Urack, the lately appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a symphony programme for the first time in his life yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck had been taken ill with tonsilitis. By a curious coincidence, Mr. Caplet, the French conductor at the Boston Opera House, was likewise taken ill, and was obliged to hand his baton for the evening to Charles Strony.

The symphony programme of yesterday afternoon was an uncommonly interesting one, and Leopold Godowsky gave the finest performance of the G major concerto of Beethoven which has been given here in many a year. This performance was masterly, almost beyond compare. And the mastery was far more than a matter of physical mechanics. The fourth concerto of Beethoven is anything but a display piece. It is today the most modern of all Beethoven's concertos for piano and orchestra; it is one of the most tender and romantic expressions of the entire period in music, and the piano part is slighter, less pretentious in its style, than any other work which Beethoven composed in this form. It stands unique in the literature of the piano.

It was not, then, as a technician or a virtuoso that Mr. Godowsky made his memorable success, although his technique is flawless, his tone ravishing and crystalline in its purity. It was the quietness, the utter refinement and perfection of art—art that whispered of other things than the conquest of an audience; of things, incidentally, far ahead of the conceptions of Beethoven's colleagues.

Mr. Godowsky's performance was so impressive because of the fact that his mastery was wholly esthetic. The strength was mental; the grasp was stupendous. Greater, indeed, this than he who takes a city.

Some were deeply moved—stirred as one cannot be stirred by music merely sensuous in its appeal. Mr. Godowsky was warmly applauded, as are all artists who appear at these concerts, but others, having given performances not to be mentioned in the same breath, have aroused greater enthusiasm. It is better that such art should be for the few, for that aristocracy whose existence is excused.

Two novelties were on the programme—Reger's concerto [illegible] questionably one of the finest compositions which he has so far put forth.

---

There is real virility of musical thinking, even wit, and more often boisterous humor. There are moments of astonishing beauty. The orchestration is unhackneyed and individual. Mr. Urack conducted sympathetically.

Borodine's Second Symphony is a splendid piece of orientalism, lacking counterpoint, and the resultant strength of architecture, but full of might, pomp and color.

The trio of the scherzo is a gem of orientalism. The melodies of the slow movement, though rather lush, give a gorgeous sensation, and the finale is wild. The symphony is not strongly welded together in its component parts. Still, its spirit is compelling, and its Asiatic idioms engrossing in their strange, exotic quality.

Mr. Urack again showed his musicianship and his contagious enthusiasm. Dr. Muck had been taken ill the day before yesterday, but it had only proven impossible for him to conduct yesterday morning. Mr. Urack, summoned at 10 o'clock to take the stand, went through the new music once with the orchestra, and conducted the accompaniment for Mr. Godowsky's concerto on Thursday night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, without a single rehearsal, gaining Mr. Godowsky's hearty praise. Under the circumstances it may be said that the performance was more than creditable to him. Mr. Urack was cordially applauded at the end of the concert.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 13,

Mr. Godowsky at Cambridge

It was unfortunate that Dr. Muck's indisposition kept him away from the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening. His assistant, Mr. Urack, conducted in his place through a difficult programme which was perhaps the most academic given by the orchestra this year. "What we demand in art," said a great artist, "is beauty, charm, distinction, power." Paraphrase this in terms of music and you will have established the atmosphere of a concert which included Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Bach's Suite for flute and strings, and Beethoven's Concerto in G Minor—all three music of exceeding finesse. This impression was emphasized by the reappearance in the concerto of Mr. Godowsky, a pianist of exceptional technical powers.

That slight uneasiness that befalls even an orchestra of virtuosi under novel leadership was occasionally noticeable last night. Mr. Urack is young, earnest and intensely painstaking. His nervousness, well under control by the time the Concerto was reached, was perceptible during the first stages of the symphony. This was unfortunate, for the music, a structure at once sumptuous and severe, called for an execution as imperturably finished. Then came Bach's lovely Suite for strings and flute performed with honors by the violins and Mr. Maquarre. The flutist once more was an artist of distinction and vivacity of spirit. He well conveyed the sweet, tentative beauty of the Sarabande, while in the blithesome Badinerie, he was beyond praise for lightness of tone and technique.

Mr. Godowsky in the concerto was smooth, neat, vigorous and graceful. He has a remarkable finger facility, a certain rich sonority and a considerable range of broad tonal effects, but his playing was not marked, in this instance, by any great interpretative power. To be sure, the concerto does not lend itself graciously to the passionate philandering of the usual virtuoso. It is gay, graceful and economical of mood—except in the slow movement with the dialogue of player and strings and "the Rest is Silence" motive at the end. Here Mr. Godowsky played with exceeding delicacy. Elsewhere he was as economical of feeling as Beethoven himself.

MUSICAL AMERICA NEW YORK DECEMBER 7, 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITHOUT AN EQUAL, SAYS FIEDLER IN BERLIN

Not Even the Vienna Imperial Orchestra Can Match It in Quality of Tone, in the Opinion of Its Former Conductor—Fiedler's "Brahms Evening" with Berlin Philharmonic Evokes a Stirring Demonstration—French Newspaper Announces Free Chamber Concerts to Strengthen Musical "Entente Cordiale" with Germany

European Bureau of Musical America,
Berlin, Neue Winterfeldtstrasse 30,
November 14, 1912.

THOUGH we in Berlin may not be in a position to say how much America has been the loser by the departure of Max Fiedler, nevertheless we could not possibly be more certain than we are of the stimulus which the music-life of Berlin has experienced in his return to this city. Mr. Fiedler has not established himself in any official capacity, nor has he announced any definite plans; he is merely reintroducing himself to the Berlin public in two Brahms evenings with the Philharmonic Orchestra. However, the first of these, which took place this evening, was sufficient to make his hearers profoundly grateful for his return. A more tense and heartfelt demonstration of admiration than that of to-night I have never witnessed.

But it is needless to comment on the powers of this monarch of the orchestra; on the vitality which he imparts, even to a bloodless composition, and his absolute mastery of the material subjected to his powerful personality—all this is surely well known to the American public. Brahms as Max Fiedler presented him to us through the Academic Festival Overture and Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 2, is Brahms in the hypersuperlative degree.

That the American public is dear to Mr. Fiedler's heart was evinced in a conversation I had with him. His greeting to me, "Ah, an American"—the genuine pleasure which tinged the remark satisfied me at once that Americans retain a goodly share of his affections.

"But I have been treated to just such evidence of appreciation in America, too," remarked Mr. Fiedler, when the demonstration of the audience was mentioned to him, "though I have never attempted to give there a whole evening of Brahms."

Boston Supremacy

"Is the Berlin Philharmonic as responsive to your demands as was the Boston Symphony Orchestra?" Mr. Fiedler was asked.

"Responsive, yes, in a very great measure; but I should not like to say in so great a measure as the Boston Orchestra. As to the orchestra as a whole and in detail, especially in the woodwinds and in the strings, too, I have never found in all my varied experience the equal for tone quality of the Boston organization."

---

even the equal of the Boston Orchestra exists?"

"Candidly, I do not," was Mr. Fiedler's reply. "The one organization most closely approaching it is the Imperial Orchestra of Vienna, but even this splendid body is slightly excelled by the Amercan organization in quality of tone."

This same opinion, incidentally, has been expressed by Richard Strauss.

In connection with the Bach-Beethoven-Brahms Festival, arranged for next April by the Concert Direction Herman Wolff, Count Hülsen-Haeseler, impresario of the Royal Opera, has offered his co-operation and announces a special production of "Fidelio" for April 23, the cast of which will include the best material available from the Court Opera.

A telegram received at this office from the impresario of the Christiania Opera House announces the unprecedented triumph of the American prima donna, Edith de Lys, as Tosca. Mme. de Lys was called before the curtain twenty-five times by a frantically enthusiastic public.

Germaine Schnitzer, in her second concert, called forth from her audience a storm of approval. The musical character of this pianist includes a refined taste and an intimate acquaintance with her subjects. Her capable technic would enable her to disclose these qualities in a yet more effective manner but for insufficient physical strength, which was especially noticeable in the Bach Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue. Numbers from Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Debussy and Schumann comprised the remainder of the program which Miss Schnitzer rendered with excellent musicianship.

Although Borodin has been dead for many years (he died in 1887) his second symphony was heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday. It is not a very intricate work, but it is in the good Russian school which uses the folk-song as a foundation and which seeks rather than avoids melody. The symphony is full of massive power. The Andante has themes that are very characteristic and Borodin has confessed that he desired here to picture the ancient Russian bards and minstrels. The first movement is full of pomp and power, as if some festival of barbaric splendor were taking place. The finale has more of this festal style, but in Borodin one does not find the wild bacchanalian revelry that is discernible in Tschaikowsky's finales at times. There is more of pomp and less of Vodka.

If there were crudities in the work, and perhaps a too constantly Slavonic mood, the originality and the unusual flavor condoned this.

Judged from a pedantic stand point this symphony would be crude beside the Reger work, but, as a matter of fact, for all its crudities it towered above it. After all, the final test is ideas, and this symphony is brimful or original ones.

It is Oriental at many points. The proverb says, "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," and Borodin has scratched all the veneering off. Many a German could have developed the great figure of the first movement more skilfully, but none of them would have obtained the mystic power that is here revealed, even without contrapuntal aids. The mysterious pizzicati of the Scherzo, the unrestful 5-4 rhythm of the finale, the thoroughly characteristic and individual style of it all make us wonder that the Symphony concerts have been so tardy in arriving at such a masterpiece. It is another indication of the fact that in orchestral music—"Die Russen Kommen!"

HERALD.

DECEMBER 14,

MR. GODOWSKY AT SYMPHONY

Pianist Gives Masterly Performance of Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

OTTO URACK CONDUCTS

Novelties by Reger and Borodin Features of 8th Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Inasmuch as Dr. Muck is suffering from an attack of tonsilitis, Mr. Urack conducted in his stead. Leopold Godowsky was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Concerto in the ancient style........Reger
Concerto No. 4, G-major, for piano.... Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, B-minor..........Borodin

Reger's concerto and Borodin's symphony were performed for the first time in Boston. The former is a new work, and was heard for the first time at Frankfort-on-the-Main on Oct. 4 last. The symphony was composed in the seventies of the last century, produced at St. Petersburg in 1877, and played in this country as early as 1898, if not before then.

Of course, the answer to Reger's concerto takes the form of a question: "Why in 1912 compose a concerto in the ancient style?" Bach and Handel did this sort of thing much better. The form and expression were as their natural speech. Their music was addressed to contemporaneous ears. Some of it still lives, because its strength and beauty even then chafed at the rigid confinement and now leads us to forget the formal bands. This music also had style, as had the sonatas of Scarlatti, the little pieces of the grand Couperin.

Why in this century so alien to the period of Bach and Handel attempt to put strong wine of today in the old bottles? For, in spite of the title, the thoughts of Reger and his harmonic scheme, however brave his endeavor, elude the cramping form, nor will they be disguised by any scholastic artifice. Even to those accustomed to the wildest modern music there is much in this concerto that is ultra-modern and disturbing.

The composer's talent is irregular. In this concerto there are pages that are conventional, deliberately so or unconsciously; mere formulas; dull passage work; and lo, there will come a musical thought oddly expressed that ravishes the ear. If Reger only were less productive! If he had not the facility that is fatal! If he only had the saving gift of unsparing self-criticism! If he would only cut out three-fourths of his musical adjectives, and be more anxious about the clarity of his sentences and their melodious balance! Has he any sense of humor?

Strive [illegible] the superb pomp of Handel in ordinary or extraordinary statement. Nor can he hope to attain the simplicity of Bach, who is essentially simple even when he seems contrapuntally most complex.

Mr. Godowsky, who is now ranked among the great pianists of the day, returned after an absence of nearly twelve years. His performance of Beethoven's concerto was masterly; his conception of the work was pure and noble. Years ago he was famous for his technical proficiency. This surpassing technic is now vitalized. A perfect run is now something more than the faultless accomplishment of a task. Formerly, he was reproached for dryness. He may now be praised for beauty of tone. When Eugen d'Albert was first of all a pianist and at the zenith of his fame, he visited Boston and played the second movement of this concerto with an indescribable depth of feeling.

Mr. Godowsky's reading was far different, and more in accordance with the indications of the composer. There was no attempt to answer in protest the stern orchestral recitatives. It would be a pleasure to speak of the many exquisite details of a performance which for sheer beauty, fine sense of proportion and unostentatious but remarkable technical display has seldom, if ever, been equalled here within the last 20 years.

Borodin's first symphony is more or less familiar here. The second was edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff. It would be interesting to know what they did to it; how their edition differs from the original version. It is barbarically oriental enough as it stands. When Borodin was writing it he was also at work on "Prince Igor," and some of the material destined for the opera found its way into the symphony. It is a singular work, interesting chiefly to the ethnologist in music. Defiant in structure, now wild, now stertorous, or at times childishly naive in the orchestration, with themes that for the most part suggest folk-song origin, the music smacks of the soil and of an untamed race. Hearing it, it is easy to understand why Liszt, bored by compositions smugly made according to the correct German expression of the seventies, welcomed Borodin's symphony and urged him to write as he felt.

Mr. Urack, who had had little time for preparation, fulfilled his task modestly and well. The audience fully appreciated his achievement.

The program announced for the concerts of next week includes Mozart's symphony in G minor; a 'cello concerto by Klughardt, and Bruckner's symphony No. 7, the "Romantic." Mr. Warnke will be the soloist.

POST,

DECEMBER 14,

URACK LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Ill—Masterly Performance by Godowsky

BY OLIN DOWNES

Otto Urack, the lately appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a symphony programme for the first time in his life yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck had been taken ill with tonsilitis. By a curious coincidence, Mr. Caplet, the French conductor at the Boston Opera House, was likewise taken ill, and was obliged to hand his baton for the evening to Charles Strony.

The symphony programme of yesterday afternoon was an uncommonly interesting one, and Leopold Godowsky gave the finest performance of the G major concerto of Beethoven which has been given here in many a year. This performance was masterly, almost beyond compare. And the mastery was far more than a matter of physical mechanics. The fourth concerto of Beethoven is anything but a display piece. It is today the most modern of all Beethoven's concertos for piano and orchestra; it is one of the most tender and romantic expressions of the entire period in music, and the piano part is slighter, less pretentious in its style, than any other work which Beethoven composed in this form. It stands unique in the literature of the piano.

It was not, then, as a technician or a virtuoso that Mr. Godowsky made his memorable success, although his technique is flawless, his tone ravishing and crystalline in its purity. It was the quietness, the utter refinement and perfection of art—art that whispered of other things than the conquest of an audience; of things, incidentally, far ahead of the conceptions of Beethoven's colleagues.

Mr. Godowsky's performance was so impressive because of the fact that his mastery was wholly esthetic. The strength was mental; the grasp was stupendous. Greater, indeed, this than he who takes a city.

Some were deeply moved—stirred as one cannot be stirred by music merely sensuous in its appeal. Mr. Godowsky was warmly applauded, as are all artists who appear at these concerts, but others, having given performances not to be mentioned in the same breath, have aroused greater enthusiasm. It is better that such art should be for the few, for that aristocracy whose existence is excused.

Two novelties were on the programme—Reger's concerto in the ancient style, and Borodine's Second Symphony—[illegible] strongly contrasted works. R[illegible], is unquestionably one of the finest compositions which he has so far put forth.

There is real virility of musical thinking, even wit, and more often boisterous humor. There are moments of astonishing beauty. The orchestration is unhackneyed and individual. Mr. Urack conducted sympathetically.

Borodine's Second Symphony is a splendid piece of orientalism, lacking counterpoint, and the resultant strength of architecture, but full of might, pomp and color.

The trio of the scherzo is a gem of orientalism. The melodies of the slow movement, though rather lush, give a gorgeous sensation, and the finale is wild. The symphony is not strongly welded together in its component parts. Still, its spirit is compelling, and its Asiatic idioms engrossing in their strange, exotic quality.

Mr. Urack again showed his musicianship and his contagious enthusiasm. Dr. Muck had been taken ill the day before yesterday, but it had only proven impossible for him to conduct yesterday morning. Mr. Urack, summoned at 10 o'clock to take the stand, went through the new music once with the orchestra, and conducted the accompaniment for Mr. Godowsky's concerto on Thursday night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, without a single rehearsal, gaining Mr. Godowsky's hearty praise. Under the circumstances it may be said that the performance was more than creditable to him. Mr. Urack was cordially applauded at the end of the concert.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 13,

Mr. Godowsky at Cambridge

It was unfortunate that Dr. Muck's indisposition kept him away from the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening. His assistant, Mr. Urack, conducted in his place through a difficult programme which was perhaps the most academic given by the orchestra this year. "What we demand in art," said a great artist, "is beauty, charm, distinction, power." Paraphrase this in terms of music and you will have established the atmosphere of a concert which included Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Bach's Suite for flute and strings, and Beethoven's Concerto in G Minor—all three music of exceeding finesse. This impression was emphasized by the reappearance in the concerto of Mr. Godowsky, a pianist of exceptional technical powers.

That slight uneasiness that befalls even an orchestra of virtuosi under novel leadership was occasionally noticeable last night. Mr. Urack is young, earnest and intensely painstaking. His nervousness, well under control by the time the Concerto was reached, was perceptible during the first stages of the symphony. This was unfortunate, for the music, a structure at once sumptuous and severe, called for an execution as imperturably finished. Then came Bach's lovely Suite for strings and flute performed with honors by the violins and Mr. Maquarre. The flutist once more was an artist of distinction and vivacity of spirit. He well conveyed the sweet, tentative beauty of the Sarabande, while in the blithesome Badinerie, he was beyond praise for lightness of tone and technique.

Mr. Godowsky in the concerto was smooth, neat, vigorous and graceful. He has a remarkable finger facility, a certain rich sonority and a considerable range of broad tonal effects, but his playing was not marked, in this instance, by any great interpretative power. To be sure, the concerto does not lend itself graciously to the passionate philandering of the usual virtuoso. It is gay, graceful and economical of mood—except in the slow movement with the dialogue of player and strings and "the Rest is Silence" motive at the end. Here Mr. Godowsky played with exceeding delicacy. Elsewhere he was as economical of feeling as Beethoven himself.

MUSICAL AMERICA NEW YORK DECEMBER 7, 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITHOUT AN EQUAL, SAYS FIEDLER IN BERLIN

Not Even the Vienna Imperial Orchestra Can Match It in Quality of Tone, in the Opinion of Its Former Conductor—Fiedler's "Brahms Evening" with Berlin Philharmonic Evokes a Stirring Demonstration—French Newspaper Announces Free Chamber Concerts to Strengthen Musical "Entente Cordiale" with Germany

European Bureau of Musical America,
Berlin, Neue Winterfeldtstrasse 30,
November 14, 1912.

THOUGH we in Berlin may not be in a position to say how much America has been the loser by the departure of Max Fiedler, nevertheless we could not possibly be more certain than we are of the stimulus which the music-life of Berlin has experienced in his return to this city. Mr. Fiedler has not established himself in any official capacity, nor has he announced any definite plans; he is merely reintroducing himself to the Berlin public in two Brahms evenings with the Philharmonic Orchestra. However, the first of these, which took place this evening, was sufficient to make his hearers profoundly grateful for his return. A more tense and heartfelt demonstration of admiration than that of to-night I have never witnessed.

But it is needless to comment on the powers of this monarch of the orchestra; on the vitality which he imparts, even to a bloodless composition, and his absolute mastery of the material subjected to his powerful personality—all this is surely well [illegible] to the American public. Brahms as Max Fiedler presented him to us through the Academic Festival Overture and Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 2, is Brahms in the hypersuperlative degree.

That the American public is dear to Mr. Fiedler's heart was evinced in a conversation I had with him. His greeting to me, "Ah, an American"—the genuine pleasure which tinged the remark satisfied me at once that Americans retain a goodly share of his affections.

"But I have been treated to just such evidence of appreciation in America, too," remarked Mr. Fiedler, when the demonstration of the audience was mentioned to him, "though I have never attempted to give there a whole evening of Brahms."

Boston Supremacy

"Is the Berlin Philharmonic as responsive to your demands as was the Boston Symphony Orchestra?" Mr. Fiedler was asked.

"Responsive, yes, in a very great measure; but I should not like to say in so great a measure as the Boston Orchestra. As to the orchestra as a whole and in detail, especially in the woodwinds and in the strings, too, I have never found in all my varied experience the equal for tone quality of the Boston organization."

[illegible] think the superior [illegible] even the equal of the Boston Orchestra exists?"

"Candidly, I do not," was Mr. Fiedler's reply. "The one organization most closely approaching it is the Imperial Orchestra of Vienna, but even this splendid body is slightly excelled by the Amercan organization in quality of tone."

This same opinion, incidentally, has been expressed by Richard Strauss.

In connection with the Bach-Beethoven-Brahms Festival, arranged for next April by the Concert Direction Herman Wolff, Count Hülsen-Haeseler, impresario of the Royal Opera, has offered his co-operation and announces a special production of "Fidelio" for April 23, the cast of which will include the best material available from the Court Opera.

A telegram received at this office from the impresario of the Christiania Opera House announces the unprecedented triumph of the American prima donna, Edith de Lys, as Tosca. Mme. de Lys was called before the curtain twenty-five times by a frantically enthusiastic public.

Germaine Schnitzer, in her second concert, called forth from her audience a storm of approval. The musical character of this pianist includes a refined taste and an intimate acquaintance with her subjects. Her capable technic would enable her to disclose these qualities in a yet more effective manner but for insufficient physical strength, which was especially noticeable in the Bach Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue. Numbers from Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Debussy and Schumann comprised the remainder of the program which Miss Schnitzer rendered with excellent musicianship.

MONITOR.

DECEMBER 14, 1912

MME. FREMSTAD TO SING SWEDISH

Dramatic Soprano to Give Old Country Folk Songs When Appearing as Symphony Hall Sunday Recitalist

MME. OLIVE FREMSTAD, the Metropolitan opera house soprano, is to appear in the Symphony hall series of Sunday afternoon recitals with Riccardo Martin, the tenor, on Dec. 29, and it is expected that she will sing some of the folk songs of Sweden which have been enthusiastically demanded by the New York public in the Metropolitan opera Sunday night concerts. Mme. Fremstad is the next of the great artists to visit Boston after Mischa Elman, under the concert direction of L. H. Mudgett of the Symphony hall administrative department.

Should a civic historian assemble the musical annals of Boston for the last 30 years and present them to view, he would produce a record that would consist largely of the activities of the administrative department of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Symphony concert management, headed by C. A. Ellis, and given supplementary leadership by L. H. Mudgett, has from year to year, outside of carrying on the Friday and Saturday concerts, made the arrangements whereby all important singers, pianists and violinists touring America have appeared in Boston. In addition to directing the business and artistic affairs of an orchestra, which has raised the city to rank among communities of cosmopolitan musical influence, one or the other of these men has had a hand in the negotiations that brought the great recital artists of the day and the Boston musical public together.

[illegible]' judgment of an artist is [illegible] regarded as unerring. Often, [illegible] commented on as bold. The record of his work as it shows in concert reviews proves that his wisdom in refraining to push a triumph further than public interest warrants never deserts him. He has accordingly gained to an extraordinary degree the confidence of the public in whatever he undertakes. Mr. Mudgett assumes the responsibility of bringing out more artists than Mr. Ellis and necessarily his enterprises lead him at times into the field of minor musical art.

Mr. Mudgett's associates in concert management say that the plan of giving Sunday afternoon concerts which distinguishes his present season was projected long ago. Its sudden and successful development in the Kubelik and Bonci concert of last spring was one of the surprises of the season. Mr. Mudgett for 20 years has studied the concert public and has been on intimate terms with it and he has observed that a large part of it was not served by the Saturday matinees in Symphony hall. "I knew," said Mr. Mudgett in explaining his remarkable move, "that there was no reason why my concerts were attended by a larger proportion of women than of men except that I gave them at a time when the men could not get away from their work. At the Sembrich concert last Sunday there were more young people in the house than I ever saw at a concert of the kind before, and a large proportion of them were young men. We furnish a great number of cheap seats and people occupy them in parties. I never saw an audience so intersted in the program as that one, and I have seen a good many enthusiastic audiences, too. At the close of the concert, after Mme. Sembrich had sung for two hours, nobody in the house got up to leave. Mme. Sembrich had to end it by sending the people home."

On every Sunday afternoon of the winter, except in the days when one of the choral societies of the city is to use the hall in the evening for an oratorio concert, or when the Symphony orchestra is to give a pension fund concert, one or more of the greatest artists touring America will give a recital. The plan of giving the Sunday Symphony hall concerts will also be continued next season.

At the seventh popular Sunday concert in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon at 3:30 Mischa Elman will be heard in recital for the first time in two years. His first number will be Beethoven's sonata for violin and piano in F major. This will be followed by Ernst's concerto in F sharp minor and the sonata in D major by Handel. His fourth number will comprise a group of four short pieces—Wilhelmj's arrangement of Chopin's familiar nocturne No. 2; Willy Burmester's transcription of Walzes by Hummel; his own transcription of a love song by Sammartini, and Jooachim's transcription of Brahms' Hungarian dance. The last number will be Baganini's "Il Palpiti."

Other dates which have been filled are the following: Jan. 5, Mme. Clara Butt, the renowned English contralto, and her husband, Kennerley Rumford, the baritone. Jan. 12, the only Boston recital of the violinist Ysaye. Mr. Bonci, the tenor, will appear with an associate artist in March. Mme. Gadski will probably come late in the season, as well as other Metropolitan opera house artists.

Mme. Fremstad, who comes after Elman, is one of those artists who has not only the enthusiastic praise of reviewers but of the first representatives of her own profession. Mme. Sembrich is said to have pointed out Mme. Fremstad as the most accomplished dramatic artist of the day; Miss Mary Garden has spoken in her praise in terms no less significant. Mme. Clara Butt is an artist of extraordinary popular appeal in her own country, and she is remembered by many in America for her brilliant two months' work during her tour of 1902.

Among the artists who will appear under Symphony hall management but not in the Sunday series are Tina Lerner and Messrs. Godowsky and Schelling, pianists; Leon Rains, bass; Maggie Teyte, soprano, and Kitty Cheatham, reciter of children's songs and stories. There may be a piano recital by one of the major artists in a Sunday concert. Thus Mr. Galston and Mr. Pauer are scheduled for appearances in the midwniter, but the dates and places have not been fixed.

TRAVELER HERALD,

DECEMBER 14, 1912.

EXCEPTIONAL DAY AT THE SYMPHONY

Urack's Debut, Two First Numbers and Godowsky as Soloist.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The presentation of two numbers for the first time in Boston, the appearance of Leopold Godowsky, the eminent pianist, as soloist, and Otto Urack's debut as conductor at the Symphony concerts featured yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal. Mr. Urack occupied the conductor's stand in the absence of Dr. Muck, who is confined to his home with an attack of tonsilitis.

Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style is a work one would hear more of before passing judgment. It made a favorable impression notwithstanding the hand cap of nervousness both orchestra an players labored under. It was particularly pleasing in the second movement. The composer's use of a combination of instruments for solo purposes instead of the customary single instrument is interesting, all the more so from the notably fine playing of the violin and flute.

After hearing the Borodin symphony one wonders why Boston has been so long kept from it. It's original from start to finish and thoroughly Russian. It was excellently given.

Between these two notable numbers came Beethoven's great concerto in G major with that great pianist, Leopold Godowsky, to interpret it. He fairly thrilled his audience with a fine display of his exceptional artistry.

The audience recalled Mr. Godowsky several times, and also insisted upon recalling Mr. Urack at the close of the concert.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN

DECEMBER 14, 1912.

DR. MUCK ILL, URACK CONDUCTS SYMPHONY, AND CONCERTO NEW TO CITY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra obeyed a new leader yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was taken suddenly ill and Otto Urack, the newly appointed assistant conductor, led the band through the tortuous paths of Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, and Borodin's second symphony, both played for the first time in this city.

Mr. Urack's back looks very much like the back of Dr. Muck and his arm movement is not dissimilar to that of the great leader. Save for a very slight nervousness apparent in his beat there was nothing to indicate that Mr. Urack was not the regular conductor.

The orchestra played superbly as always. The Reger Concerto is a strange mixture of the simplicity of Bach and the complexity of Reger. The themes are dainty, but not original. There is a very important part for solo violin which was excellently performed by Mr. Witek. The more the concerto imitated Bach the better it sounded and when it flopped back to Reger it immediately became uninteresting.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 14, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR AND MR. GODOWSKY

Dr. Muck Ill and Mr. Urack in His Stead—Novel Pieces by Reger and Borodin and a Performance That Made Account and Judgment Difficult—The Pianist's Beautiful Playing of Beethoven's G-Major Concerto — The Master-Technician Becomes Much More MISCHANCE overtook the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, untimely and unkind. Two pieces hitherto unheard here stood on the programme. One, Reger's "Concerto in the Olden Style," seems most exacting for conductor and orchestra, needing all his insight, imagination and skill and all its answering virtuosity, if the performance is to fulfil the composer's purpose. The other, Borodin's symphony in B minor, is less arduous, but not without its demands upon conductor and band, if its waste places are to be discreetly hidden and its recurring eloquence multiplied. At the last moment Dr. Muck fell ill of the affection of the throat that occasionally beset him during his first time here. Mr. Urack, as the assistant conductor, had then to take the concerts and the programme of the week.

All this happened on Thursday, but the public received no intimation of it until the audience read the inserted slips in the programme of yesterday. Having no time for rehearsals of his own, Mr. Urack, who ordinarily sits in the orchestra as one of the first violoncellists, presumably reproduced, so far as he could, Dr. Muck's "readings" of the concerto and the symphony. At least, he conducted in them capably, painstakingly, assiduously; but inevitably it was neither his own version of the music nor exactly Dr. Muck's that the audience received, while the orchestra had had only short experience of the new conductor. In the third item of the programme, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte in G major, Mr. Urack and his audience both fared better. He had once rehearsed the concerto with Mr. Godowsky, who took the piano part, and once played it with him the evening before at Cambridge. It was, therefore, his own and Mr. Godowsky's version of the music that the audience heard and in it Mr. Urack conducted intelligently and discreetly, with due sense of his music with a just balancing of virtuoso and orchestra, with seeming control over his men. In such mishaps and in concerts for virtuosi and singers who utilize a part of the orchestra, he promises to be capable and serviceable and audiences have been well disposed to him. The final salvation, however, of the concerts, in such an emergency as that of yesterday, is the routine and the esprit du corps of the men of the orchestra. They proved it when Mr. Wendling conducted in Dr. Muck's stead during his first term and they proved it again yesterday with Mr. Urack.

Under all this clouding and perplexing circumstance, the new music of the concert may best be left undescribed and unjudged. Music is only half itself until it has been played under favoring conditions, and misapprehension and misjudgment of it, under any other, is easy. For aught any one in the audience could know, Mr. Urack and the orchestra may have "brought off" Reger's concerto and Borodin's symphony exactly as Dr. Muck intended them and with full revelation of both pieces. As little could any listener say with confidence whether the performance fell short. It was easy to suspect that it did with the concerto and that it did not with the symphony. Suffice it, then, to say that Borodin has designed, imagined and written after the manner of his "nationalistic" Russian brethren. His melodies have their tang of a semi-Oriental Russia or of the Asia just beyond. Some of them are not without penetrating force; some of them have an insinuating beauty. He tries to treat them formally after the fashion of an austere symphonist, but design and accomplishment evade his imagination and skill. He repeats oftener than he develops; he lays side by side, oftener than he interweaves and fuses. The dry places, the bare places are many in his symphony. On the other hand, it has its contrasting passages of rich orchestral color, glowing or striking harmonies and impinging rhythms, but even in these flights, Berodin's wings soon tire. No more for him than for the other "Nationalists,' is the symphony an easy medium. Less than some of them has he mastered the technical resource and pliancy that would give him freedom of expression. The more the pity, since he has much to say and could say it individually. Some of his brethren were not always so fortunate.

As for Reger and his concerto, he has written formally "in the olden style" of such seventeenth and eighteenth century pieces; but instrumentally he falls often into modern idioms, while harmonically his procedure is often and wholly his own. Time and again the music, with all its pretence to the ancient simplicity, sounds laboriously and elaborately sophisticated. Then suddenly out of this sophistication, grave or beautiful simplicity momentarily flowers. Or else, as in the Largo, Reger sings with deep, grave, almost impassioned voice and neither divides nor sub-divides his song until it loses all body and power of voice nor turns it acrid with sharp-set harmonies. Emotion, expressed in music, is ripening late in him, but by the token of this Largo, it is ripening deep.

With the concerto the clouds lifted and doubts vanished. Mr. Urack was conducting in his own right and in his own way to certain and pleasurable result and Mr. Godowsky had chosen music adroitly suited to his finest powers. Beethoven's concerto has no existence except in its own continent beauty and the beauty of the voices of the orchestra and the piano with it. There are no "great thoughts" in the music, no mighty passions, no struggling utterances. It takes no liberties with established forms and patterns. It seeks no beauty but the beauty of ordered sound. There is charm in it, not force. It is of Beethoven almost elegant and of Beethoven who knew affectionately the secrets of the piano so far as his day had penetrated them. Anyhow, he was quite sure it was not an orchestra, armed for battle with the other orchestra behind it. As truly as his violin concerto is a virtuoso piece for the violin, so is the concerto in G major a virtuoso piece for the piano. And as truly as Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler glorified the violin concerto the other day, so did Mr. Urack and Mr. Godowsky glorify the piano concerto, making it sound as not in long memory it has sounded here.

Mr. Godowsky is a master technician—not by mere agility of finger and wrist, but by subtle qualities of intellect and temperament. He can and he does display this technique so that the diversity, sureness and completeness of it make an emotion in themselves. Or he deploys it as in fascinating intellectual exercise that ends in the paradoz of luminous intricacy. There was no need of these attributes in Beethoven's concerto and Mr. Godowsky proved himself the pianist of fine and discriminating mind and spirit that he really is when he put them aside. In their stead he substituted a finesse and felicity of technical procedure that flowered in simplicity and in the beauty and emotion of pure and lovely sound. He summoned a tone of exceeding lightness and transparency. He maintained it in flawless evenness and clarity. He kept it sparkling with the brightness of the music and yet not once did he harden it. Or he softened it, without sentimentalizing it, and set it glowing with delicate reflections and half tnts. His cadenzas came rippling off his fingers in shimmers of showering tone.

His singing of the graver melody of the first movement was as chaste as it was warm. The broken phrases of the piano in the curious andante seemed like the voice of the melody and the harmony that fell out of the air upon Shakspeare's imagination in the magic island of "The Tempest." Rhythmic delicacy and rhythmic zest skipped hand in hand through the finale.

No thought of technical achievement came to the listener as he heard the concerto, and only the cold-blooded were numbering on their fingers Mr. Godowsky's technical qualities—his fleetness, crispness, fluency, evenness and so on to the end, "touch" and pedalling and all the rest. A discerning mind, a kindled and controlled imagination were using these technical attributes as their instruments and melting them into the sofe beauty of tone and arabesque, song and ornament, fancy, continence and sentiment that filled the concerto. The purely sensuous sensation, the purely musical sensation was of the distilled beauty of the music, the piano, of sound itself. Mr. Godowsky deserved the applause that rewarded Mr. Kreisler when with like outcome he played Beethoven's violin concerto on another Friday afternoon. The pianist received only a mild round or two of it. Sometimes, in these days of maturity, he must count a little ruefully the pen[illegible]

[Continued on page 4]

[Continued on page 4]

MONITOR, DECEMBER 14, 1912

REGER CONCERTO PLAYED

With Otto Urack conducting in place of Karl Muck, and with Leopold Godowsky appearing as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its eighth public rehearsal of the season in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following program: Reger, concerto in ancient style, for orchestra, Op. 123; Beethoven, concerto in G major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58; Borodin, symphony No. 2, in B minor.

Mr. Urack proved as accomplished a musician in modern symphonic styles at the Boston concert as in classic styles at the Cambridge concert of Thursday night. Evidently his training in conducting has been as comprehensive in respect to schools of composition as it has been thorough in method. He is no less at ease with late eighteenth century Mozart than with late nineteenth century Borodin; his scholarship compasses every music-maker from Bach, who carried the four-voiced system of musical philosophy as far as it could go, to Reger, who is carrying the three-choir orchestral philosophy a step farther than it is willing to go. Mr. Urack's facile reading of the "concerto in ancient style" was proof that he can make the content of a new score his own in the same short time as conductor that he can master a single instrumental line of it as 'cellist. The assistant conductor with whom the Symphony subscribers are becoming acquainted this week must be one of those men who can look upon orchestral pages and take in their thought in its completeness, just as administrative experts can glance over an industrial plant and tell at once what its workers are accomplishing and can discern the social import of their toil.

There are many men in the assemblage of virtuosi who compose the famous Symphony orchestra who know the standard solo pieces that have been written for their instruments with accompaniment of orchestra. Probably half the men on the left bank of violins could play the Beethoven concerto which Kreisler performed to such praise not long since and could make a very respectable showing with it, too. The public knows that the orchestra contains a number of artists who can do creditable conducting. But who until Friday afternoon was aware that at the front desk of the 'cellos there has been playing a man who could not only perform a concerto as Symphony soloist but could even take up Dr. Muck's baton and present on successive days a classic and a modern program? This is not a time to speak of Mr. Urack as an interpreter. Conducting programs that another man has rehearsed can not be called interpreting. But twice on immediate notice directing Dr. Muck's virtuosi, men who are proverbially intolerant of the slightest bungling, hesitancy or uncertainty on the part of him who assumes authority over them, is not far short of being an extraordinary musical feat.

With some listeners on Friday the question may have arisen whether in the Reger concerto the brass department of the orchestra in one portion of the first movement was not given its cue at a wrong time and compelled to keep a measure or two behind by the obstinacy of the conductor. But the entire orchestra was too serious over the performance of the passage to make any such state of things believable. The long and persistently discordant strain sung by the trumpeters must have been a sheer example of Regerism. It is hard to be persuaded that everybody played his part in the passage with such good countenance in private rehearsal as he did at the public performance. It was a touch of the modern that has had no counterpart in anything played in Boston since the Strauss opera "Elektra" was produced.

The solo violin episodes of the "concerto in ancient style" contained nothing of significant appeal. They did not compare in effectiveness with the moments of solo meditation that the concert master's instrument has here and there in certain of the tone poems of Strauss. They did not bring the tumult of the orchestral voices to a pause and take possession of us in the name of romance and sentiment, as do the solo moments of "Don Quixote."

The truth is that Reger is not a musical poet. And there is no reason why he should be if he does not want to be. He is an admirable prose writer. His "Variations on a Merry Theme," is one of the delightful books of essays in the library of the orchestra, and to good purpose Dr. Muck first read them to Symphony subscribers five years, ago, and to equally good purpose Max Fiedler took them down from the shelf and reread them two years ago. Prose writer, essayist—or in even more truthful description—journalist in tone, ought Reger to be called. He is not recording an epic age nor an idyllic age. Reger chooses formulas of expression that can be filled out rapidly, that will tell the story of a man whose units of meditative time are not decades or weeks, but moments. He pictures life and manners in rapid shifts of mood and purpose. He describes not the man whom we are familiar with in the music of Richard Strauss, the individualist man, the man who makes startling physical conquests, and remains a dominant figure before our imagination; he jots down items about all men as fast as they cross his light, he takes quick notes about his generation in its swift course of social expansion.

Borodin was more of a delight to the ear than Reger. In the cant of the studios he was more "musical." He told of things far off in place and in time, too. The Borodin symphony is the work of a man who struck out on the path of beauty with a simplicity of purpose that was of a century earlier than that in which he lived. He hedged his talent about with a pride of nationalism just as some present day American composers do. But the symphony No. 2 deserves a place in the repertory of the orchestra. If one Schumann or one Beethoven work has to be left out of the year's program for it, the sacrifice is well worth while.

Mr. Godowsky repeated in Boston the reserved, neatly styled interpretation of the piano part of the Beethoven G major concerto that he gave in Cambridge Thursday night. His listeners must long carry in memory his sparkling tone and tasteful phrasing of the theme of the rondo. He found he had a man at his left hand who could make the orchestra respond sympathetically to his manner of declaring Beethoven's thought and could competently sustain whatever mood he wished to induce upon any portion of the music.

Heinrich Warnke, the associate of Mr. Urack at the first desk of the 'cellists, will be the soloist at the ninth public rehearsal and concert Dec. 20 and 21. The orchestral numbers of the program will be the Mozart symphony in G minor and the Bruckner symphony No. 7.

"THAIS"

As Thais, the sinner who becomes a saint, Mary Garden at the Boston opera house was heard to better advantage last evening than she has been for several years in Boston. Miss Garden's interpretation of the role was brilliant and alluring, showing her to be an actress of insight as well as a vocalist of rare charm. With Vanni Marcoux as Athanael the performance was most notable. Mr. Marcoux was in excellent voice and portrayed his part with appreciation of its subtleties. The audience lost its usual reserve, giving the principals applause of unusual enthusiasm.

The part of Nicias was taken at the last moment by Max Lipmann, substituting for Fernand de Potter, and was carried through creditably.

The orchestra was conducted by Charles Strony, Mr. Caplet being prevented from attending. His reading of the scores was such that he was given several curtain calls with Miss Garden and Mr. Marcoux.

The cast was as follows:

Athanael	Vanni Marcoux
Nicias	Max Lipmann
Palemon	Michele Sampieri
Un Serviteur	Rene Chasseriaux
Thais	Mary Garden
Crobyle	Bernice Fisher
Myrtle	Jeska Swartz
Albine	Dorothy Wilson
La Charmeuse	Evelyn Scotney

MONITOR, DECEMBER 13,

MUSIC

MR. GODOWSKY WITH SYMPHONY

Leopold Godowsky, the pianist, appeared in Sanders theater, Cambridge, Thursday evening, playing the fourth piano concerto of Beethoven with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, directed the concert, taking for the time being the place of Karl Muck. The orchestral numbers of the program comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major; Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

Both the soloist and the conductor received the enthusiastic applause of the large academic audience. Each man in his turn and according to the requirements of his role gave a contribution to the artistic life of the university city that must have answered expectations perfectly. For some reason the orchestra has an ease and genuineness of expression in Cambridge that it never quite has in its own Symphony hall. This may be partly because it goes to Cambridge with a program which it has worked over much at home and on tour; it must be largely because it meets in Cambridge an audience of profound receptivity and sympathy and because the auditorium there is a musical instrument of rare quality, to the invitation of which a company of highly trained tone-makers can not but sensitively respond.

An account of the pianist's part in the program cannot be given out of relation to that of the conductor, for the conditions of performance were not the same as they would have been had both Mr. Urack and Mr. Godowsky been for a long time looking forward to presenting the Beethoven G major concerto together. There were doubtless many points of interpretation that the pianist prepared having in mind the principal conductor as his associate, and these had to be either given up or else adjusted to the style of the assistant conductor to such an extent as to make them lose their characteristic point. Mr. Godowsky and Mr. Urack necessarily gave as different a reading of the concerto from the one that was originally designed as the individuality of Mr. Urack is another thing from that of Dr. Muck. It became a question, therefore, of the quality of the assistant conductor's Beethoven and the agreement of that Beethoven with the solo pianist's.

Mr. Urack's Beethoven, like his Mozart and Bach, was a strictly drawn and conventionally colored portrait. It was technically a piece of work that the severest musical scholar in the audience could not pick a flaw in. It had not, however, the focal character of a master drawing. Mr. Urack in conducting did not develop that clear line of larger rhythm by which the greatest conductors hold the attention of listeners all through the reading of a cyclic work. But he knew the contents of his scores, and his men knew that he knew them. He knew what each department of the orchestra had to do in carrying out the thematic formulas of the composers, and he had ideas of his own as to the best methods for the various instrumentalists to bring out detail. In a word, Mr. Urack was a competent and a commanding substitute for Dr. Muck.

Mr. Godowsky lent himself genially to the occasion as soloist in the concerto. He put himself in accord both with the assistant conductor and with the audience. He read a Beethoven that was graciously in agreement with the academic calm of the house and with the precise, but human scholarship of the man who governed the artistic purposes of the evening. If Mr. Godowsky can be a tempestuous player he did not show it at his concert. Probably he never is, or he would not have been asked to bring the G major in his portfolio to Boston. If Mr. Godowsky is an impressionistic tone-maker, he did not show it in this work which gives him opportunity to be one if any Beethoven piece does. He was a modern man commenting on the actual Beethoven of a century ago. He regarded the composer's epoch, just as the man at the head of the orchestra did.

Mr. Godowsky is to be counted as continuing to an extreme the tendency which started with Paderewski toward light-handed piano playing. The power is not so much one of tone and of contrast as of feeling. All objective quality is taken from the instrument's expression. All pretense at outward dramatization is laid aside. The piano tells of the sentiment that picture, action and character inspire, but it does not try to make pictures, enact dramas or portray men to the life. Whatever music may accomplish as an art of representation, it does not presume to do it through the medium of the piano. Delicate harmony,

---

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 16,

Here in Boston

A pleasant little incident diversified the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Mr. Urack conducted again, with more confidence than he had naturally shown on Friday and with more just and sure imposing of his own understanding, imagination and will with the music upon his orchestra. Again his audience received him cordially, recalling him in particular at the end of Reger's new concerto. No sooner had Mr. Urack bowed once to the auditorium than he turned to the concertmaster and bade him signal the orchestra to rise. Mr. Witek smiled and shook his head. Then Mr. Urack himself motioned to the men to rise and acknowledge the applause. Not one of them budged. So Mr. Urack, as he deserved on his first appearance at a Symphony Concert—in trying emergency and with no little credit to himself—was obliged to take the applause with inclusive waves of his arms toward the orchestra behind him. Rightly do certain reviewers in New York call the orchestra "the gentlemen from Boston."

Mme. Szumowska's newly discovered talent in informal discourse about composers and their music for the pianoforte bids fair to equal her familiar talent for that music on the piano itself. At her "lesson-recital" in Steinert Hall on Saturday afternoon, she spoke of Mendelssohn, Schumann and Chopin and their music, and repeated not one of the commonplaces about them or merely wandered about in dry and unrelated detail. Instead, her little discourses illuminated the composers and the pieces she had in hand with penetrating and individual judgment, with happy assembling of essential facts and with surprising skill in the coördination and expression of her ideas. As an expositor of music, Mme. Szumowska excels most of her masculine rivals. For she has warmth, charm and original and candid judgment.

At the concert of Sunday afternoon, Dec. 29, at the Opera House, its forces, with Mr. McCormack and Mme. Gay at their head, will venture into choral music, performing Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem."

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 18,

What Does Reger Express?

The scorners of Reger at least listen to his music. Almost against their will it holds their attention. They do not invent their derisory and damning epithets as they hear. They keep that laborious exercise for their desks or their closets. The years come and the years go, and Reger's music multiplies with them. Yet oftener and oftener in Germany and in America it is heard, even where there are no "Regerites" to clamor for and over it. He is an established composer. His music would not have established him, if it were not the expression of a distinctive individuality, if it were not somehow a voice of our time to which our ears answered. If it were merely endless exercise in intricate counterpoint and in involved and acrid harmonies, if it were merely the expression of a crabbed, perverse spirit, it would have fallen upon unresponsive spirits. We like to say that Strauss expresses in his music the liking of our time for bigness in all things; that its occasional fierceness of delineation, its recurring eroticism, its dependence upon "literary" and external suggestion, its "cerebral" rather than spontaneous quality, are part and parcel of the moods and the voice of our age. Similarly, some say that the contrasting Debussy expresses its mystical and rapturous tendencies, its liking for excursion into the borderland of vision and spiritual sensation, its passion for fineness that may exist side by side with fierceness.

No one as yet, however, has said with penetration and persuasion what Reger expresses of the moods and spirit of the time. Some Germans call him a Christian mystic when they have heard two or three of his choral pieces which run in such a vein. But these are only incidental items in the sum of his work. As some say, this age of ours is hard and materialistic. Is the hardness and the acridness of many of Reger's harmonies expression and counterpart of these traits? Some say that our time would remake all things in its own image. So perhaps does Reger make his "modern" play with the old forms of music as in the concerto heard here last week, his serenade for orchestra, his variations, his almost numberless fugues and sonatas. Some again will call our time a time that has lost all sense of simplicity in its pursuit of sophisticated intricacies. Behold the analogue in Reger's super-subtle counterpoint. Our age is a bitter age, too as some believe, and even when Reger is songful, as in the largo of that same concerto and in many another slow movement, his song has its under note of bitterness. A "jumpy" music said the dowager the other afternoon when she first heard the concerto. And we can all agree, as Mr. Shaw says, that we live in a "jump[illegible]

TRANSCRIPT
DECEMBER 18

The Longy Club and Strauss

In a thirteenth series of concer[illegible]—in spite of the foreboding number—the Longy Club seems at last to be entering into its just reward. There was actually a numerous audience for it in Jordan Hall, last evening, and an audience that seemed not to consist too largely of bidden guests. Admittedly, liking for concerts of music for a wind choir is an exotic and fragile taste. Some devoted listeners to music never acquire it. Those that have it must nurture it carefully and must not indulge it too often nor for too long on any single occasion. The blended or the contrasted timbres of flutes, oboes and clarinets, of horns and bassoons are singular, piquant —and speedily cloying. Composers who write for them are inevitably hampered by the limitations that the quality and the capacities of the chosen instruments lay upon them. To play a wind instrument as the members of the Longy Club play theirs, seems to the listening layman an adroit and delicate virtuosity. To write for such a choir music that shall unite beauty and diversity of sound with fertile and happy play of fancy seems yet more a feat of ingenuity and imagination to that same layman. He takes his pleasure of both with a few grains of wonder to spice his delight.

Mr. Longy and his companions of the wind choir of the Symphony Orchestra are astute in these things. They do not undertake too many concerts—only three, at long intervals, through each season. These concerts are wisely short, so that the virtuosi on the stage shall not be wearied or the listeners in the auditorium cloyed. Three, or at most four, pieces usually make the programme and varying combinations of instruments diversify them as much as may be; while more and more in recent years the piano for a contrasting voice has had its part in these combinations. Wisely, too, Mr. Longy's choice of music has ranged widely. He has searched the classical composers—especially the masters of the eighteenth century—when writing for wind choirs was more the fashion than it is nowadays and when "noble patrons" even commanded such music. He has turned the dull and manifold pages of the secondary and tertiary composers of the last century on the chance, usually fulfilled, that he might find one or another piece for wind instruments that deserved performance. And he has been open-eyed and open-eared for music from contemporary hands, returning to old fashions, venturing new experiments or writing with some individual predilection and aptitude for wind choir. More than one Frenchman and here and there a German does so.

The pieces played yesterday were happy instances of this fruitful research. The first was a quintet of Mozart for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano—pleasurable to hear for the ingenuity of fancy that kept the music weaving gracefully lined patterns in tone, while oboe or piano multiplied the Mozartean brightness; horn or bassoon mellowed the Mozartean suavity; or the clarinet bore light or melancholy Mozartean song. Next followed a sonata by Reinecke for flute and pianoforte, with the decorative title, "Undine," and Mr. Maquarre's mingling of beauty of tone, sense of song and ornament and rare virtuosity to make it sound as rarely. Reinecke was no inventor of remarkable melodies, but he had an endless fertility and a happy adaptative skill with them. Accordingly he could make his flute ripple through bravura passages or sing in warm or melancholy song. All of which was the more appropriate since Undine was a water sylph, who loved a mortal and was grievously betrayed. No more was she human than is the flute quite a human-voiced instrument.

Last, and for the first time here, stood Strauss's suite for thirteen wind instruments with multiplied horns and even a double bassoon, written in youth but, as some say, retouched when it was published in maturity. Perhaps; but it is hard to believe that such a revising Strauss would have left unrepaired the limping fugue that makes the finale. On the other hand, the mature Strauss might read or hear without shame the warmly imagined, richly expanding, largely modulated song of the slow movement, feel anew the full, strong, propulsive march of the prelude, smile with a touch of gratification over the quirking humor with which he decorated the scherzo, or the assembled skill with which he makes the large-voiced introduction to the finale both summary and anticipation. Even in those early eighties in which Strauss wrote the suite, he was already "thinking in instruments" and feeling for and with them. Already his instrumental song had its depths and breadths, and already he was capable of musical humor and irony.

ADVERTISER.
[illegible]MBER 21,

NINTH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

SCHUMANN, MOZART AND A NEW CONCERTO

Mr. Urack Conducts in the Absence of Dr. Muck—Orchestra Below Top Form.

By S. C. Williams.

The ninth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony season was given in Symphony hall, Friday afternoon, Otto Urack conducting in the absence of Dr. Muck, who is still indisposed. The programme follows:—

Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
I. Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
Klughardt—Concerto for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 59. First time in Boston.
Massig bewegt; Sehr langsam; Lebhaft; Schwer (massig bewegt); Langsam; Sehr langsam.
Schumann—Symphony in D minor, No. 4, Op. 120.
I. Ziemlich langsam; Lebhaft.
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam.
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft; Trio.
IV. Langsam; Lebhaft.

Substitution of Schumann's D minor Symphony for Bruckner's No. 7, which was originally announced for this week's concerts, imparted to the programme agreeable continuity in music that does not startle but often enchants. In his programme notes Mr. Hale quotes an interesting letter Brahms wrote to his friend, Heinrich von Herzogenberg, regarding the original scoring of Schumann's symphony, which he instrumented afresh after a first rehearsal that went badly. Describing the original score as "bright and spontaneous," he comes to comparison: "It reminds me (without comparing it in other respects) of Mozart's G minor, the score of which I also possess. Everything is so absolutely natural that you cannot imagine it different. There are no harsh colors, no forced effects," and so on. The two symphonies are thus happily associated through the substitution above noted.

As well as any of his symphonies the G minor illustrates Mozart's serene beauty and refinement that is never juiceless or thin. Yesterday's performance did not exhibit the orchestra at its best. The soft brightness of the Allegro was slightly blurred and articulation of the Andante made too conspicuous. The Menuetto was now and then rather heavy-footed. The best playing was in the fantasia of the finale, given with true abandon.

The concerto for violoncello by Klughardt, a prolific German who died at Rosslau in 1902, was played for the first time in Boston with Heinrich Warnke as soloist. Not long, it is in one movement and in the old classical style. Though finely orchestrated, it has been played but little, doubtless owing to the fact that it is not really remarkable music. There is neither true brilliancy nor subduing beauty of melodic thought. The resources of Mr. Warnke, a highly accomplished 'cellist, were not severely tested.

The first movement of the D minor Symphony was somewhat marred by a slight roughness in the violins. Again, the trio of the Scherzo was not played with full realization of its peculiar beauty.

This was the second concert conducted by Mr. Urack. To compare him with Dr. Muck, who is at once poetic and intellectual, a masterful conductor of fusing personality, would be unjust. He is an excellent musician and a well schooled conductor. Under him the orchestra is still a band of virtuosi. Its shortcomings are somewhat matters of comparison with its own best.

The programme for next week's concerts embraces Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ; Sinding's concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, and Saint Saens's Symphony in C minor, No. 3, for orchestra and organ. The soloists will be Sylvian Noach, violinist, and John P. Marshall, organist, both of the orchestra.

DECEMBER 19, 1912
MONITOR,

'Cellist Who Presents Unfamiliar Concerto as Symphony Soloist

(Photo by Chickering, Boston)
HEINRICH WARNKE

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will present a work by Klughardt, a German minor composer and conductor whose period of activity coincided in the main with that of Wagner. The selection is described in the composer's title as a concerto for violoncello with accompaniment of orchestra.

Agreeable to its definition as an accompanied solo, the music is said to be largely of a flowing, melodic character. It is written so that it can be played without any break in the divisions. The Klughardt work is understood to have been chosen for presentation by the soloist himself. The remaining numbers on the ninth program are the Mozart symphony in G minor and the Bruckner symphony No. 7. For the concerts of Christmas week Dr. Muck is expected to be back at his post. Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor will direct the program of the ninth pair of concerts.

JOURNAL-
DECEMBER 21.

SYMPHONY 'CELLIST APPEARS AS SOLOIST

Klughardt Concerto Is Given First Performance in Boston.

For the second time since the season began the Symphony soloist this week is a member of this orchestra of virtuosos. Heinrich Warnke, the principal 'cellist, is the chief figure in the first Boston performances of the Klughardt concerto. His playing yesterday, at the matinee, was enthusiastically applauded. The piece is largely lyrical, and one of the oft-repeated tunes is oozy with sweetness and sentiment; so that the concerto should prove a popular importation in spite of the resounding nothings with which it is padded. It has taken the work 20 years to reach this musical center. Klughardt's name has not been on a Symphony program since 1891, when the German's third symphony was introduced by Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. Warnke's playing was remarkable for its brilliancy and for a reticence that held the sentimentalism of the composition well in check. So instead of being cloyed, the audience had just enough of the dear-old-homestead music.

The art of the soloist fairly adorned the concerto and earned for him one of the most complimentary receptions of the season.

Dr. Muck's absence caused the substitution of Schumann's fourth symphony for Bruckner's seventh, and this must have pleased those who prefer the old masters to the new. By an odd coincidence the other number on the program this week is Mozart's G minor symphony, which Brahms regarded as very much like Schumann's fourth. The G minor symphony is one of Mozart's greatest works. It has always been a favorite here. But Schumann was not as well liked in Boston 50 years ago as he is today.

Mr. Urack conducted with spirit and understanding. It appears that Dr. Muck got an assistant just in time, and an able one. Mr. Urack will conduct again tonight, but it is expected that Dr. Muck will have recovered from his attack of tonsilitis before the next pair of concerts comes around.

Another member of the orchestra, Sylvain Noack, who shares the first violin desk with Cencertmaster Witek, will be the soloist next week. He will play the Sinding concerto in A major. The Bach toccata and fugue in D minor for organ will be played by John P. Marshall. The organ is not often heard at Symphony concerts. The symphony will be Saint-Saens's third, in C minor.

GLOBE-
DECEMBER 21,

MR URACK CONDUCTS.

Increasing Authority in Second Appearance.

Mr Warnke Soloist in a New Work of No Marked Inspiration.

In Dr Muck's continued illness, Otto Urack, his assistant, conducted his second Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, symphony in G minor; Klughardt, concerto for violoncello, op 59 (first time in Boston). Heinrich Warnke soloist; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4, op 120.

Schumann's symphony was the second of the three which sprang from his brain in one fertile year. It followed almost breathless upon the first, the symphony of 'Springtime," and reechoes its freshness, exuberance and true spontaneity. Added to these there is a rigor, a pervading and upmounting sturdiness, which is yet essentially lyric and born of the gift of song.

The presence of the two symphonies upon the program was a strange coincidence in view of the letter of Brahms quoted in the program book in which he says that Schumann's symphony reminds him of Mozart's G minor in its absolute naturalness, the absence of harsh colors or forced effects, but questions the advisability of the revision of the orchestration.

Schumann learned first to think in terms of the piano. To it and the voice he confided his most intimate and characteristic music. Nor was he considered by those who performed under him a great or inspired conductor. The orchestra was for him an acquired province, and there are passages in the first symphony, as there are yet in this, in which the orchestral workmanship obscures his probable intent; but it is likely that the cool reception given to the first performance of the work in 1853, after the revision, was due primarily to its daring in form and originality of thought, and possibly to Schumann's lack of executive ability as a conductor properly to interpret his work.

Brahms' comparison in the common traits of freshness, spontaneity and naturalness of this symphony of the apostle of romanticism with that of the classic Mozart, which preceded it by 53 years, also includes certain distinctions. Within the narrower bounds of an age of artificial and formal elegance in thought, manner, dress, Mozart's melodies and harmonic progressions had spontaneity and freshness, even as the exquisite design of a Grecian frieze in which the smallest figure has the utmost clarity; while the lyric and impetuous ardor of Schumann's muse broke the shackles of form and discovered a new spontaneity and freedom fed by the glow and rapture of a new imagination.

To conduct Reger's new piece in an old style a week ago was more or less a mathematical task, but yesterday there was a demand for variety in interpretation. Mr Urack grew in authority as the program advanced. The Mozart did not quite have the patrician polish, ease and inevitability in the first two movements which was its due, although the precise and pompous minuet had character; but in the Schumann the young conductor began to show the stuff he is made of. There was a new impetus and a new confidence, which increased as the spirited work progressed, and came to a splendid and exuberant climax in the finale. The orchestra responded well to Mr Urack's efforts, and there was sincere and emphatic applause after the number.

Klughardt's concerto for 'cello does not relieve materially the paucity of good music for that noble instrument. Mr Warnke could perform yet other excisions to advantage, as in the songful section marked "very slowly." Even playing it less slowly hardly would save it. Here there is a respectable, well-made melody, but it runs too long. There is a theme heard much in the other portions which inspires hope, only to bring disappointment. All told, there is more evidence of labor than of inspiration.

Mr Warnke strove valiantly to make all possible of the piece. His intonation at first was not altogether secure, but in the measures of sustained song his bowing had a fine breadth and repose and his tone an ample sonority. His style in the other portions was no less effective. Mr Warnke was warmly applauded.

The program next week will be as follows: Bach, toccata and fugue in D minor for organ; Sinding, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major; Saint-Saens, symphony in C minor No. 3 for orchestra and organ.

[Continued on page 4]

[Continued on page 4]

HERALD.
DECEMBER 21.

OLD SYMPHONIES PLEASE HEARERS

Beautiful Works by Mozart and Schumann Are Performed at Rehearsal.

MR. URACK CONDUCTS ABLY

Concerto for 'Cello Played by Mr. Warnke Arouses Audience to Enthusiasm.

By PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck is still unable to leave the sick-chamber and Mr. Urack again conducted in his place. There was a smaller audience than is customary except in the holiday season. The program of the ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550)....Mozart
Concerto for 'cello op. 59........Klughardt
Symphony in D minor, No. 4....Schumann

Perfection in art irritates some persons, especially when they have been told from childhood to admire a poem, picture or musical composition because it has been pronounced flawless by the dead and the living to whom authority is attributed. The revolt is natural. The Athenian who, bored by hearing Aristides called "the Just," voted on his oyster shell for banishment, was hardly to be blamed. In his heart he no doubt admired Aristides. The protest was against boredom rather than against the man.

The symphony in G minor will be 125 years old next year. Long ago it was declared a wonder in the world of art. There have been rebellious souls moved by the demon of perversity to pooh-poohing. Not so many years ago a New York writer of reputation boldly declared that this symphony had then only historical interest.

This symphony may be played in a manner to persuade the lover of Mozart to this opinion.

The Andante is often dragged and sentimentalized. The Minuet is not sharply rhythmed. The Finale is a scramble. It is so easy for even skilful players to be slovenly when the music is by Mozart.

Yesterday, as played by the orchestra under Mr. Urack's direction, the symphony was a thing of wondrous beauty. It had freshness, perfection in structure and outlines; vitalization of form through the character of the poetic thought, now tender, now melancholy; graceful even in the sterner minuet; never cloying in sweetness; firmly proportioned without rigidity. And again there was the conviction that in this symphony spontaneous and exquisite poetry expressed with consummate art smiles at the passing of the years.

And what has not been said against Schumann's symphonies? How often we have been told that the themes are too slender or formed of little phrases; that melodic and rhythmic repetitions lead to monotony; that the heavy, gray instrumentation is at war against the expressiveness of the melodic lines and prevents contrasts and nuances in the interpretation! Has not Mr. Weingartner said that Schumann's symphonies are composed for the piano, "and arranged—unfortunately, and not well at that—for the orchestra?" Has not M. Vincent d'Indy declared that Schumann found himself out of his element whenever he attempted to rear a musical monument; that he was then guided only by sentiment and, with ideas often of high value, could only inprovise works of mediocre importance? These are hard sayings from men, who gladly acknowledge the genius of Schumann, the composer of piano pieces and songs, and they are all true. Yet who can escape the romantic charm of the Romanze, the spell cast by the trio of the Scherzo? Nor are the other movements free from haunting or compelling pages.

Mr. Warnke introduced the 'cello concerto by Klughardt, a busy conductor in theatres and opera houses, a fertile composer in every field from opera to chamber music. There is a long list of his works—and who remembers 10 measures written by him? This concerto is a composition that has obvious claims for the popularity that ends with one hearing. It is frankly tuneful; it is varied in sentiment; there is a slow melody of the sort that might be included among "Gems for the Heart and the Home." There is not too much of exasperating floridity. The concerto has this crowning merit: it is short. Mr. Warnke gave a fine performance. His tone was rich and warm, his technic sure and facile, his taste unimpeachable. Seldom has any violoncellist in Symphony Hall been so heartily applauded.

Mr. Urack conducted with author and also as a sensitive interpreter romantic music; for Mozart's Symphon in spite of the formulas of his period, charged with romanticism. The city fortunate in having an assistant co ductor of this marked talent.

The program of the concerts nex week will be as follows: Bach, Toccat with Fugue, D minor (Mr. Marshall, or ganist); Sinding, violin concerto in major (Mr. Noack, violinist); Saint Saens, Symphony in C minor for orches tra and organ.

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 21.

URACK LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Conducts Great Orchestra With Success

BY OLIN DOWNES

Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a symphony concert for the second time yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, during Dr. Muck's illness, and conducted with distinguished success. The programme consisted of the Mozart G minor symphony, the Schumann fourth symphony in D minor, and a concerto for 'cello by August Klughard, heard for the first time here. A 'cellist conducted an accompaniment for a 'cellist, for Mr. Urack and Mr. Warnke sit side by side in the orchestra.

The concerto is agreeable music, somewhat saccharine, well written for the solo instrument, engagingly scored for a small orchestra. Mr. Warnke played the piece exceedingly well, with a full and vibrant tone, a thorough technical equipment, a refined taste. The concerto is unpretentious and diverting, when it does not fall into a rut of workmanship or reiterated phrases which pall on one through lack of fresh ideas in the treatment. Mr. Warnke won deserved applause. The composition, which professes to be nothing more than it is, was much enjoyed. The skilful and economical orchestration materially increased its effect.

Mr. Urack conducted two symphonies, the one a model of classic form, the other pulsing with the warmth, the ardor, the ideality of one of the most individual and appealing of all the romaticists. Mr. Urack made on this occasion what was practically his debut. For the first time, he had had opportunity of working with the men and obtaining the expression of his own ideas. It is not easy to make headway with one's colleagues; it is not a small thing for a young man of Mr. Urack's years to take command of an orchestra of the type of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Urack went to his task manfully, and then it was seen that a young man with something to say was among us. Mr. Urack's interpretation of the music of Mozart was commended by all. Mr. Urack then turned to music that contrasted in every possible way with Mozart's, and gave this music a splendidly effective and sympathetic performance. His beat seems modelled a trifle on Dr. Muck's, and Mr. Urack might have a worse model before him, and this beat is decisive, yet not stiff or inelastic. Nor was the lovely and melancholy introduction taken at the customary snail's pace. The intimacy, the lack of largeness in this symphony with the symphony in C major, ranks as the composer's most personal expression in this form. The poetic lyricism and the romantic fire which were alike properties of the Schumann of the D minor symphony, were felt and successfully expressed. And Mr. Urack had his orchestra in control. He knew his own intentions, and he knew how to carry them out. Not a detail in the orchestra was lost sight of, yet there was the greatest freedom and spontaneity. The colors of the instrumental tone, the expressive phrasing of the melodies, were all admirable in taste, and proportionate. The performance was poetical, passionately idealistic, and through young music there was felt the enthusiasm and the contagion of the enthusiasm of a young man. The symphony was much enjoyed, as well it might have been, and Mr. Urack was recalled repeatedly.

MONITOR,
DECEMBER 21,

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting the fourth symphony Schumann and a concerto for violoncell by Klughardt with Heinrich Warnke soloist, the assistant conductor of t Boston symphony orchestra, Otto Ura led the ninth symphony rehearsal Frid afternoon to the applause of a la audience. The program was as follow Mozart, symphony in G minor (K. 550 Klughardt, concerto for violoncello wi orchestral accompaniment, op. 59 (fir time in Boston); Schumann, symphon in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

With a week's opportunity of prepa ing his own program, Mr. Urack cou show just what his ability as an orche tral interpreter is. And he proved th Dr. Muck's judgment in picking ou assistant conductors is very reliable i deed. Mr. Urack was so pointedly su cessful as an independent reader of the Schumann score as to raise the question whether the Boston public is not displaying great affectation in confining the work of its famous orchestra to 24 pairs of subscription concerts a year. What could not a man like Mr. Urack do with the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts in which the classic repertory was thoroughly exploited for the benefit of the pay-as-youenter [illegible]

If Mr. Urack is as good an organizer, drill-master and program-maker as he is interpreter, it is not improbable that a career of orchestral leadership will develop for him in America. Useful artist as he is at the first desk of the Symphony 'cellos, his place is at the head of an orchestra. He has the gift for making a symphonic score communicate its meaning to an audience. He has a talent for winning instant and hearty response from the men under his baton; he has the secret of bringing out the characteristic expression of the instrumental groups. He makes each department speak in its own idiom. He never compels violins out of their legitimate course of tone-making, never compels the wood tone to surge nor the brass tone to roar. He likes agreeable sound. He also likes eloquent and broadly styled phrasing.

The assistant conductor knows his music, there is the sum of the case. He not only has opinions about Schumann; he has sympathy with Schumann's style and with his subject. His reading shows him to have made the thought of the romantic epoch his own, shows that he appreciates the value of a mid-nineteenth piece of German music in its documentary character. Mr. Urack's interpretation of the Symphony in D minor revives vividly the picture of manners there drawn and does it in a way that relates that age to ours, that explains us to ourselves by putting our social motives and those of a half-century ago in comparison.

With less shrewd insight Mr. Urack read his Mozart. The symphony in G minor was played, not interpreted. The assistant conductor has gone far ahead in his experience as a reader of the master music makers' records, but he has not gone so far "forward," in the Weingartner phrase, as to have found Mozart.

The four movements of first number on the program were presented as so much tone, with no communication about yesterday, today or tomorrow.

Happily chosen was the violoncello work by means of which Mr. Warnke, as soloist, addressed himself to the rehear sal subscribers and to the transient listeners of the second balcony of Sym phony hall. Mr. Warnke won great ap plause from the top of the house, th part that is the hardest to move by me A string sentimentality and the part tha is the quickest to respond to genuin musical expression. The Klughardt co certo is an admirable composition bot for soloist and listener; for it allows hi to play just about the whole time and gives them a constant supply of pleasin melody. It speaks a message of rathe neutral significance, though one tha glows with human feeling. Klughardt i one of those minor poets who gleane some straws in the field that Brahm harvested.

American Tenor Will Sing in Sunday Recital With Mme. Olive Fremstad

(Copyright by A. Dupont, New York)
RICCARDO MARTIN

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 21,

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

TWO SYMPHONIES AND A 'CELLO CONCERTO

Mr. Urack Conducts Again at the Symphony Concerts and Mr. Warnke Plays a Pleasant, Routine Concerto—"The Tales of Hoffmann" with Two Changes in the Cast—A German Reviewer Retorts Upon Dr. Muck—Mr. Dippel and the Metropolitan

CHRISTMAS preoccupations and weariness, the absence of Dr. Muck and two symphonies and a concerto for violoncello to make the programme, united yesterday to reduce the audience at the Symphony Concert much below the usual dimensions. From the beginning of the season, soloists have been plentiful at the Symphony Concerts, and only two of them—Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Godowsky—have been of the first rank and of wide celebrity. Perhaps the public of the concerts would be glad, for once in a way, to hear the orchestra and Dr. Muck by themselves. Similarly, two symphonies in one concert, even when they are as short and relatively light as Mozart's in G minor and Schumann's in D minor, played yesterday, still raise doubts and scruples in the average American concert-goer. He—or oftener she—longs for more variety, and our audiences lack patient Teutonic assimilation. Finally, an assistant conductor, though he is as able as Mr. Urack and as curiously reproductive of the ways of his chief, remains in the average eye and ear only an assistant conductor, filling an unhappy emergency. And to say these things is not a whit to lessen the excellent qualities that Mr. Urack clearly showed. He had his men well in hand; he was heedful of balance and quality of tone; he was discreet in his choice of pace and his manipulation of shading; he made no distorting "effects," as young conductors are prone to do, but through him and his orchestra Mozart's symphony spoke in free, running, unclouded and sensitive voice and Schumann's was as open of beauty and romantic mood as it can be unless some rare conductor divines and releases the composer's half-articulate symphonic speech.

Voices have been raised against the violoncello concerto, partly in complaint of the limitations of the instrument in solo work and partly for the meagreness of the repertory. Hence, perhaps, Mr. Warnke's excursion into the relatively unknown. In retort to the first one needs only to oppose such playing as Mr. Warnke's; to the second a sufficient retort is the mention of three names—Volkmann, Saint-Saëns and Lalo. So long as these three gracious and elegant concertos survive in the literature of the instrument and so long as there are suave and polished "stylists" of the 'cello to play them, the 'cello concerto need not be obsolete.

The first impulse is to view Klughardt's concerts as a questionable addition to this goodly company. Among the great concertos it cannot appear otherwise than as rather slight. It begins by dutifully going through the paces of the cello's fingerboard, octaves in the high registers, mellow sonorities on the lower strings, flowing (and not very significant) arpeggii in recitative, and passage work ornamented with somewhat meaningless frills. Almost the Goltermann sort of thing. But just as you have begun to wonder what it is all about comes a gorgeous winding of Wagnerian horns, and the skilful workmanship of the concerto begins—in general, a deftness in the assorting of accompanying instruments; the other cellos are given subdued comment on the solo voice; there are weavings of the other strings muted against a recurrence of the legato theme. And that part which, in a more formal concerto, would be the slow movement, contains a melody certainly of a melting sweetness. All of which obliges you to relent against the concerto as a whole, especially when the two deliberate themes are combined at the end, for alternate deep breaths, phrase by phrase, one for cello, the other for orchestra, up to a plaintive fading note in the treble. A concerto which ends in this benediction of melody is a merciful release from those scratchy scramblings which, even in such cellofied music as Böelmann's Symphonic Variations, suggests that someone has rung for the ambulance and that it is coming at its usual clatter.

However, the concerto had, as we say, every chance: a cellist to keep the orchestra in due subordination, and a solo player whose finesse, whose polish, whose refinements of bowing and inflections of tone transfigure whatsoever music he plays. It was difficult to say where Klughardt left off and where Mr. Warnke began. His tone hypnotizes. There is a grave suspicion that he could play one of the old Romberg concertos some afternoon at these concerts and get away with it.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Retorting Upon Dr. Muck

IN one of the published conversations with Dr. Muck upon his return to Boston last autumn, he praised American reviewers of music, saying:

> The men who write seriously here are fully as well informed as those in Europe, and they have this inestimable advantage over the critics in Germany—they do not assume so much that they are the teachers or final judges. Their writings are free from useless technicalities. They have literary skill, charm, ease of style. All this must work for the public good, for then we interest the greater public in music, as well as the musicians only. The press, in fact, is far more influential in such matters in America than in Europe. Criticism is read more and more honestly.

Reading these sayings in Berl viewer of music for the Vossich became very angry, seized his wrote:

> Whoever is informed on condi the United States knows that onl four or five music critics there be taken into serious consid Evidently Herr Dr. Muck pre porters who record box office and count the number of curta and encores to æsthetically, educated judges in art matters. such remarks as these he a tends to increase our sympa him.

The accuracy with which the the Vossische Zeitung describes t ual procedure of the reviewers in Boston, New York and Chica witness to his knowledge of then

HERALD,
DECEMBER 21.

OLD SYMPHONIES PLEASE HEARERS

Beautiful Works by Mozart and Schumann Are Performed at Rehearsal.

MR. URACK CONDUCTS ABLY

Concerto for 'Cello Played by Mr. Warnke Arouses Audience to Enthusiasm.

By PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck is still unable to leave the sick-chamber and Mr. Urack again conducted in his place. There was a smaller audience than is customary except in the holiday season. The program of the ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550)....Mozart
Concerto for 'cello op. 59........Klughardt
Symphony in D minor, No. 4....Schumann

Perfection in art irritates some persons, especially when they have been told from childhood to admire a poem, picture or musical composition because it has been pronounced flawless by the dead and the living to whom authority is attributed. The revolt is natural. The Athenian who, bored by hearing Aristides called "the Just," voted on his oyster shell for banishment, was hardly to be blamed. In his heart he no doubt admired Aristides. The protest was against boredom rather than against the man.

The symphony in G minor will be 125 years old next year. Long ago it was declared a wonder in the world of art. There have been rebellious souls moved by the demon of perversity to pooh-poohing. Not so many years ago a New York writer of reputation boldly declared that this symphony had then only historical interest.

This symphony may be played in a manner to persuade the lover of Mozart to this opinion.

The Andante is often dragged and sentimentalized. The Minuet is not sharply rhythmed. The Finale is a scramble. It is so easy for even skilful players to be slovenly when the music is by Mozart.

Yesterday, as played by the orchestra under Mr. Urack's direction, the symphony was a thing of wondrous beauty. It had freshness, perfection in structure and outlines; vitalization of form through the character of the poetic thought, now tender, now melancholy; graceful even in the sterner minuet; never cloying in sweetness; firmly proportioned without rigidity. And again there was the conviction that in this symphony spontaneous and exquisite poetry expressed with consummate art smiles at the passing of the years.

And what has not been said against Schumann's symphonies? How often we have been told that the themes are too slender or formed of little phrases; that melodic and rhythmic repetitions lead to monotony; that the heavy, gray instrumentation is at war against the expressiveness of the melodic lines and prevents contrasts and nuances in the interpretation! Has not Mr. Weingartner said that Schumann's symphonies are composed for the piano, "and arranged—unfortunately, and not well at that—for the orchestra?" Has not M. Vincent d'Indy declared that Schumann found himself out of his element whenever he attempted to rear a musical monument; that he was then guided only by sentiment and, with ideas often of high value, could only inprovise works of mediocre importance? These are hard sayings from men, who gladly acknowledge the genius of Schumann, the composer of piano pieces and songs, and they are all true. Yet who can escape the romantic charm of the Romanze, the spell cast by the trio of the Scherzo? Nor are the other movements free from haunting or compelling pages.

Mr. Warnke introduced the 'cello concerto by Klughardt, a busy conductor in theatres and opera houses, a fertile composer in every field from opera to chamber music. There is a long list of his works—and who remembers 10 measures written by him? This concerto is a composition that has obvious claims for the popularity that ends with one hearing. It is frankly tuneful; it is varied in sentiment; there is a slow melody of the sort that might be included among "Gems for the Heart and the Home." There is not too much of exasperating floridity. The concerto has this crowning merit: it is short. Mr. Warnke gave a fine performance. His tone was rich and warm, his technic sure and facile, his taste unimpeachable. Seldom has any violoncellist in Symphony Hall been so heartily applauded.

Mr. Urack conducted with authority and also as a sensitive interpreter of romantic music; for Mozart's Symphony, in spite of the formulas of his period, is charged with romanticism. The city is fortunate in having an assistant conductor of this marked talent.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Bach, Toccata with Fugue, D minor (Mr. Marshall, organist); Sinding, violin concerto in A major (Mr. Noack, violinist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor for orchestra and organ.

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 21.

URACK LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Conducts Great Orchestra With Success

BY OLIN DOWNES

Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a symphony concert for the second time yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, during Dr. Muck's illness, and conducted with distinguished success. The programme consisted of the Mozart G minor symphony, the Schumann fourth symphony in D minor, and a concerto for 'cello by August Klughard, heard for the first time here. A 'cellist conducted an accompaniment for a 'cellist, for Mr. Urack and Mr. Warnke sit side by side in the orchestra.

The concerto is agreeable music, somewhat saccharine, well written for the solo instrument, engagingly scored for a small orchestra. Mr. Warnke played the piece exceedingly well, with a full and vibrant tone, a thorough technical equipment, a refined taste. The concerto is unpretentious and diverting, when it does not fall into a rut of workmanship or reiterated phrases which pall on one through lack of fresh ideas in the treatment. Mr. Warnke won deserved applause. The composition, which professes to be nothing more than it is, was much enjoyed. The skilful and economical orchestration materially increased its effect.

Mr. Urack conducted two symphonies, the one a model of classic form, the other pulsing with the warmth, the ardor, the ideality of one of the most individual and appealing of all the romaticists. Mr. Urack made on this occasion what was practically his debut. For the first time, he had had opportunity of working with the men and obtaining the expression of his own ideas. It is not easy to make headway with one's colleagues; it is not a small thing for a young man of Mr. Urack's years to take command of an orchestra of the type of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Urack went to his task manfully, and then it was seen that a young man with something to say was among us. Mr. Urack's interpretation of the music of Mozart was commended by all. Mr. Urack then turned to music that contrasted in every possible way with Mozart's, and gave this music a splendidly effective and sympathetic performance. His beat seems modelled a trifle on Dr. Muck's, and Mr. Urack might have a worse model before him, and this beat is decisive, yet not stiff or inelastic. Nor was the lovely and melancholy introduction taken at the customary snail's pace. The intimacy, the lack of largeness in this symphony with the symphony in C major, ranks as the composer's most personal expression in this form. The poetic lyricism and the romantic fire which were alike properties of the Schumann of the D minor symphony, were felt and successfully expressed. And Mr. Urack had his orchestra in control. He knew his own intentions, and he knew how to carry them out. Not a detail in the orchestra was lost sight of, yet there was the greatest freedom and spontaneity. The colors of the instrumental tone, the expressive phrasing of the melodies, were all admirable in taste, and proportionate. The performance was poetical, passionately idealistic, and through young music there was felt the enthusiasm and the contagion of the enthusiasm of a young man. The symphony was much enjoyed, as well it might have been, and Mr. Urack was recalled repeatedly.

If Mr. Urack is as good an organizer, drill-master and program-maker as he is interpreter, it is not improbable that a career of orchestral leadership will develop for him in America. Useful artist as he is at the first desk of the Symphony 'cellos, his place is at the head of an orchestra. He has the gift for making a symphonic score communicate its meaning to an audience. He has a talent for winning instant and hearty response from the men under his baton; he has the secret of bringing out the characteristic expression of the instrumental groups. He makes each department speak in its own idiom. He never compels violins out of their legitimate course of tone-making, never compels the wood tone to surge nor the brass tone to roar. He likes agreeable sound. He also likes eloquent and broadly styled phrasing.

The assistant conductor knows his music, there is the sum of the case. He not only has opinions about Schumann; he has sympathy with Schumann's style and with his subject. His reading shows him to have made the thought of the romantic epoch his own, shows that he appreciates the value of a mid-nineteenth piece of German music in its documentary character. Mr. Urack's interpretation of the Symphony in D minor revives vividly the picture of manners there drawn and does it in a way that relates that age to ours, that explains us to ourselves by putting our social motives and those of a half-century ago in comparison.

With less shrewd insight Mr. Urack read his Mozart. The symphony in G minor was played, not interpreted. The assistant conductor has gone far ahead in his experience as a reader of the master music makers' records, but he has not gone so far "forward," in the Weingartner phrase, as to have found Mozart.

American Tenor Will Sing in Sunday Recital With Mme. Olive Fremstad

(Copyright by A. Dupont, New York)

RICCARDO MARTIN

MONITOR,
DECEMBER 21,

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting the fourth symphony Schumann and a concerto for violoncell by Klughardt with Heinrich Warnke soloist, the assistant conductor of t Boston symphony orchestra, Otto Ura led the ninth symphony rehearsal Frid afternoon to the applause of a la audience. The program was as follow Mozart, symphony in G minor (K. 550 Klughardt, concerto for violoncello wit orchestral accompaniment, op. 59 (fir time in Boston); Schumann, symphon in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

With a week's opportunity of prepa ing his own program, Mr. Urack cou show just what his ability as an orche al interpreter is. And he proved th Dr. Muck's judgment in picking ou assistant conductors is very reliable in lead. Mr. Urack was so pointedly suc ful as an independent reader of the [illegible] score as to raise the question [illegible] er the Boston public is not [illegible] great affectation in confin- [illegible] ork of its famous orchestra [illegible] of subscription concerts a [illegible] at could not a man like Mr. [illegible] with the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts in which the classic repertory was thoroughly exploited for the benefit of the pay-as-you-enter [illegible]

The four movements of first number on the program were presented as so much tone, with no communication about yesterday, today or tomorrow.

Happily chosen was the violoncello work by means of which Mr. Warnke, as soloist, addressed himself to the rehearsal subscribers and to the transient listeners of the second balcony of Symphony hall. Mr. Warnke won great applause from the top of the house, the part that is the hardest to move by mer A string sentimentality and the part tha is the quickest to respond to genuin musical expression. The Klughardt concerto is an admirable composition bot for soloist and listener; for it allows hir to play just about the whole time and gives them a constant supply of pleasin melody. It speaks a message of rathe neutral significance, though one tha glows with human feeling. Klughardt i one of those minor poets who gleane some straws in the field that Brahm harvested.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 21.

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

TWO SYMPHONIES AND A 'CELLO CONCERTO

Mr. Urack Conducts Again at the Symphony Concerts and Mr. Warnke Plays a Pleasant, Routine Concerto—"The Tales of Hoffmann" with Two Changes in the Cast—A German Reviewer Retorts Upon Dr. Muck—Mr. Dippel and the Metropolitan

CHRISTMAS preoccupations and weariness, the absence of Dr. Muck and two symphonies and a concerto for violoncello to make the programme, united yesterday to reduce the audience at the Symphony Concert much below the usual dimensions. From the beginning of the season, soloists have been plentiful at the Symphony Concerts, and only two of them—Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Godowsky—have been of the first rank and of wide celebrity. Perhaps the public of the concerts would be glad, for once in a way, to hear the orchestra and Dr. Muck by themselves. Similarly, two symphonies in one concert, even when they are as short and relatively light as Mozart's in G minor and Schumann's in D minor, played yesterday, still raise doubts and scruples in the average American concert-goer. He—or oftener she—longs for more variety, and our audiences lack patient Teutonic assimilation. Finally, an assistant conductor, though he is as able as Mr. Urack and as curiously reproductive of the ways of his chief, remains in the average eye and ear only an assistant conductor, filling an unhappy emergency. And to say these things is not a whit to lessen the excellent qualities that Mr. Urack clearly showed. He had his men well in hand; he was heedful of balance and quality of tone; he was discreet in his choice of pace and his manipulation of shading; he made no distorting "effects," as young conductors are prone to do, but through him and his orchestra Mozart's symphony spoke in free, running, unclouded and sensitive voice and Schumann's was as open of beauty and romantic mood as it can be unless some rare conductor divines and releases the composer's half-articulate symphonic speech.

Voices have been raised against the violoncello concerto, partly in complaint of the limitations of the instrument in solo work and partly for the meagreness of the repertory. Hence, perhaps, Mr. Warnke's excursion into the relatively unknown. In retort to the first one needs only to oppose such playing as Mr. Warnke's; to the second a sufficient retort is the mention of three names—Volkmann, Saint-Saëns and Lalo. So long as these three gracious and elegant concertos survive in the literature of the instrument and so long as there are suave and polished "stylists" of the 'cello to play them, the 'cello concerto need not be obsolete.

The first impulse is to view Klughardt's concerts as a questionable addition to this goodly company. Among the great concertos it cannot appear otherwise than as rather slight. It begins by dutifully going through the paces of the cello's fingerboard, octaves in the high registers, mellow sonorities on the lower strings, flowing (and not very significant) arpeggii in recitative, and passage work ornamented with somewhat meaningless frills. Almost the Goltermann sort of thing. But just as you have begun to wonder what it is all about comes a gorgeous winding of Wagnerian horns, and the skilful workmanship of the concerto begins—in general, a deftness in the assorting of accompanying instruments; the other cellos are given subdued comment on the solo voice; there are weavings of the other strings muted against a recurrence of the legato theme. And that part which, in a more formal concerto, would be the slow movement, contains a melody certainly of a melting sweetness. All of which obliges you to relent against the concerto as a whole, especially when the two deliberate themes are combined at the end, for alternate deep breaths, phrase by phrase, one for cello, the other for orchestra, up to a plaintive fading note in the treble. A concerto which ends in this benediction of melody is a merciful release from those scratchy scramblings which, even in such cellofied music as Böelmann's Symphonic Varrations, suggests that someone has rung for the ambulance and that it is coming at its usual clatter.

However, the concerto had, as we say, every chance: a cellist to keep the orchestra in due subordination, and a solo player whose finesse, whose polish, whose refinements of bowing and inflections of tone transfigure whatsoever music he plays. It was difficult to say where Klughardt left off and where Mr. Warnke began. His tone hypnotizes. There is a grave suspicion that he could play one of the old Romberg concertos some afternoon at these concerts and get away with it.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Retorting Upon Dr. Muck

IN one of the published conversations with Dr. Muck upon his return to Boston last autumn, he praised American reviewers of music, saying:

> The men who write seriously here are fully as well informed as those in Europe, and they have this inestimable advantage over the critics in Germany—they do not assume so much that they are the teachers or final judges. Their writings are free from useless technicalities. They have literary skill, charm, ease of style. All this must work for the public good, for then we interest the greater public in music, as well as the musicians only. The press, in fact, is far more influential in such matters in America than in Europe. Criticism is read more and more honestly.

Reading these sayings in Berl viewer of music for the Vossich became very angry, seized his wrote:

> Whoever is informed on condi the United States knows that onl four or five music critics there be taken into serious consid Evidently Herr Dr. Muck pre porters who record box office and count the number of curta and encores to æsthetically educated judges in art matters. such remarks as these he tends to increase our sympa him.

The accuracy with which the the Vossische Zeitung describes ual procedure of the reviewers in Boston, New York and Chica witness to his knowledge of then

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York
Date

ROOSEVELT PICTURES THE GREAT HISTORIAN

Must Have Genius to Reconstruct Immense Panoramas of the Past, He Declares.

ADDRESSES SIX SOCIETIES

Those Who Write of Americans of To-day Will Have Much to Tell That Is Unpleasant, He Says.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Theodore Roosevelt, speaking on "History of Literature" in Symphony Hall to-night, addressed members of six national associations now holding conventions here. He is president of one of these societies—the American Historical Association. The other organizations are the American Association for Labor Legislation, the American Sociological Society, the American Statistical Association, the American Economic Association and the American Political Science Association.

Mr. Roosevelt discussed the art of the historian from the point of view of science, poetry, mythology and literature. He argued that history should welcome the entrance on its domain of every science, and that future historians should make use of material from every possible source to convey vivid and lifelike pictures to others of the past whose secret they lay bare.

Historian Must Have Imagination.

Mr. Roosevelt declared the great historian must be able to paint the life of the plain people, the ordinary men and women of the time in which he writes, to do which requires him to be possessed of the highest kind of imagination. Continuing, he said in part:

The great historian will in as full measure as possible present to us the everyday life of the men and women of the age which he describes. Nothing that tells of this life will come amiss to him. The instruments of their labor and the weapons of their warfare, the wills that they wrote, the bargains that they made and the songs that they sang when they feasted and made love—he must use them all. He must tell us of the toil of the ordinary times, and of the play by which that ordinary toil was broken. He must never forget that no event stands out entirely isolated. He must trace from its obscure and humble beginnings each of the movements that in its hour of triumph has shaken the world.

Yet he must not forget that the times that are extraordinary need especial portrayal. In the revolt against the old tendency of historians to deal exclusively with the spectacular and the exceptional, to treat only of war and oratory and government, many modern writers have gone to the opposite extreme. They fail to realize that in the lives of nations as in the lives of men there are hours so fraught with weighty achievement, with triumph or defeat, with joy or sorrow, that each such hour may determine all the years that are to come thereafter, or may outweigh all the years that have gone before. In the writings of our historians, as in the lives of our ordinary citizens, we can neither afford to forget that it is the ordinary, everyday life which counts most; nor yet that seasons come when ordinary qualities count for but little in the face of great contending forces of good and of evil, the outcome of whose strife determines whether the nation shall walk in the glory of the morning or in the gloom of spiritual death.

The historian must deal with the days of common things, and deal with them so that they shall interest us in reading of them as our own common things interest us as we live among them. He must trace the changes that come almost unseen, the slow and gradual growth that transforms for good or for evil the children and grandchildren so that they stand high above or far below the level on which their forefathers stood. He must also trace the great cataclysms that interrupt and divert this gradual development. He can no more afford to be blind to one class of phenomena than to the other. He must ever remember that while the worst offence of which he can be guilty is to write vividly and inaccurately, yet that unless he writes vividly he cannot write truthfully; for no amount of dull, painstaking detail will sum up as the whole truth unless the genius is there to paint the truth.

Truths of To-day Unpleasant.

Concluding, Mr. Roosevelt stated that those who tell the Americans of the future what the Americans of to-day and of yesterday have done perforce tell much that is unpleasant.

"Nevertheless, when the tale is finally told, I believe that it will show that the forces working for good in our national life outweigh the forces working for evil, and that, with many blunders and shortcomings, with much halting and turning aside from the path, we shall yet in the end prove our faith by our works and show in our lives our belief that righteousness exalteth a nation."

The American Association for Labor Legislation was the first to begin its work to-day. "Factory Inspection and Law Enforcement" was the subject of discussion. Edward F. Brown, of New York, special investigator for the National Child Labor Committee, made an address on the subject, saying in part:

Human beings, through lack of proper [illegible] and improper enforcement [illegible] laws, are stunned, crippled [illegible] ated. That we have [illegible] small number of 435 in- [illegible] whole country to care for [illegible] mechanical [illegible] justice.

[Continued on page 4]

The need of a new federal employes accident compensation law was urged by Charles Earl, solicitor for the Department of Commerce and Labor. He proposed a new act covering industrial diseases, as well as industrial accidents, in the case of all federal employes, and granting compensation during incapacity, instead of for only one year, as at present.

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 23 1912

Music News of Interest.

At the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Carl Muck, at Carnegie Hall, which fall on January 9 and 11, the soloists will be Mme. Margarete Matzenauer and Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programmes for these concerts will be announced shortly.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programme will be announced later.

1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 22 1912

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 10, at 8:1 5o'clock. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression. She is regarded by many as the foremost representative German concert singer of our time. For several years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and also in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protege she was. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with the orchestra accompanying.

1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1912
Date

Elena Gerhardt, the celebrated lieder singer, is due to arrive from Europe on Saturday next on the steamer Campania, to open her second American tour. Her first concert will be in Providence, R. I., with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 31, after which she sings with the orchestra in Brooklyn, Boston, Providence, Hartford, Philadelphia and Wash-

1884

From VOGUE.
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1 - 1913

MASCULINE SINGERS AND PIANISTS

Reinhold von Warlich, the Russian-German basso, returns to New York early in January to be the soloist with the Philharmonic Society. Herr von Warlich, while on his recent Canadian tour, was the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, and one of his most successful concerts was that given in Ottawa under royal auspices.

At his January concert in New York he expects to sing, as his first number a Mozart aria, and for his second, a dramatic balled, "Ein Music Bilt," which was written by Gretchaninoff for Chaliapine.

The many admirers of Mr. John McCormack will be interested in the announcement that he is to give one more recital in New York this season. This will take place on January 5th at Carnegie Hall.

Another soloist who has recently won laurels with the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris is Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, whose first American appearance this season will be with the Philharmonic Orchestra, December 29th. After filling his engagements in this country, M. Lhevinne will leave for a three months' tour of Australia.

Max Pauer, the pianist of Stuttgart, who comes to this country to tour with the Boston Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestra, is sailing from Europe on December 31st. The dates for his appearance with the Philharmonic are January 16th and 17th; on both of these occasions he will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven.

1884

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9 and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. It will be Miss Farrar's only concert appearance of the season.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. There will be a soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date DEC 22 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9 and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solist will be Margarethe Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, her only concert appearance of the season.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

songs.

The January pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme Matzenauer, and on Saturday afternoon Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programme will be announced later.

1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1912
Date

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 10. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression upon all those who heard her. Elena Gerhardt is regarded as the foremost German concert singer of the time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protege she was. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with orchestra.

1884

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 21

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 10. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano whose appearance in America last year made a profound impression on all those that heard her. She is regarded as the foremost German concert singer of our time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protegee she was.

1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these.

On Thursday evening the soloist will [illegible] politan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date DEC 22 1912

The next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, Jan. 10, at 8:15. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 22 1912

MUSIC NOTES

—The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Margarete Matzenauer.

1884

From PROVIDENCE
Address
Date DEC 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been disabled the past fortnight by an attack of acute tonsilitis, is sufficiently recovered to resume his work the coming week and there will be no question about his conducting the third Boston Symphony orchestra concert which will be given in Infantry hall on a week from Tuesday evening, New Year's eve. Owing to his illness, however, there has been some delay in arranging finally the program.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. In Miss Gerhardt the management of the Symphony orchestra believes that it is presenting to Providence one of the most interesting singers of our time. Miss Gerhardt is the possessor of a more than usually beautiful soprano voice and although German by birth and training she has been brought up in the old Italian school and is one of the most skilled vocalists now before the public.

It is outlined that she will sing an old classical Italian air and three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Richard Strauss. Tickets for this concert go on sale at Steinert's next Saturday morning, Dec. 28.

188

[119]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

ROOSEVELT PICTURES THE GREAT HISTORIAN

Must Have Genius to Reconstruct Immense Panoramas of the Past, He Declares.

ADDRESSES SIX SOCIETIES

Those Who Write of Americans of To-day Will Have Much to Tell That Is Unpleasant, He Says.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Theodore Roosevelt, speaking on "History of Literature" in Symphony Hall to-night, addressed members of six national associations now holding conventions here. He is president of one of these societies—the American Historical Association. The other organizations are the American Association for Labor Legislation, the American Sociological Society, the American Statistical Association, the American Economic Association and the American Political Science Association.

Mr. Roosevelt discussed the art of the historian from the point of view of science, poetry, mythology and literature. He argued that history should welcome the entrance on its domain of every science, and that future historians should make use of material from every possible source to convey vivid and lifelike pictures to others of the past whose secret they lay bare.

Historian Must Have Imagination.

Mr. Roosevelt declared the great historian must be able to paint the life of the plain people, the ordinary men and women of the time in which he writes, to do which requires him to be possessed of the highest kind of imagination. Continuing, he said in part:

The great historian will in as full measure as possible present to us the everyday life of the men and women of the age which he describes. Nothing that tells of this life will come amiss to him. The instruments of their labor and the weapons of their warfare, the wills that they wrote, the bargains that they made and the songs that they sang when they feasted and made love—he must use them all. He must tell us of the toil of the ordinary times, and of the play by which that ordinary toil was broken. He must never forget that no event stands out entirely isolated. He must trace from its obscure and humble beginnings each of the movements that in its hour of triumph has shaken the world.

Yet he must not forget that the times that are extraordinary need especial portrayal. In the revolt against the old tendency of historians to deal exclusively with the spectacular and the exceptional, to treat only of war and oratory and government, many modern writers have gone to the opposite extreme. They fail to realize that in the lives of nations as in the lives of men there are hours so fraught with weighty achievement, with triumph or defeat, with joy or sorrow, that each such hour may determine all the years that are to come thereafter, or may outweigh all the years that have gone before. In the writings of our historians, as in the lives of our ordinary citizens, we can neither afford to forget that it is the ordinary, everyday life which counts most; nor yet that seasons come when ordinary qualities count for but little in the face of great contending forces of good and of evil, the outcome of whose strife determines whether the nation shall walk in the glory of the morning or in the gloom of spiritual death.

The historian must deal with the days of common things, and deal with them so that they shall interest us in reading of them as our own common things interest us as we live among them. He must trace the changes that come almost unseen, the slow and gradual growth that transforms for good or for evil the children and grandchildren so that they stand high above or far below the level on which their forefathers stood. He must also trace the great cataclysms that interrupt and divert this gradual development. He can no more afford to be blind to one class of phenomena than to the other. He must ever remember that while the worst offence of which he can be guilty is to write vividly and inaccurately, yet that unless he writes vividly he cannot write truthfully; for no amount of dull, painstaking detail will sum up as the whole truth unless the genius is there to paint the truth.

Truths of To-day Unpleasant.

Concluding, Mr. Roosevelt stated that those who tell the Americans of the future what the Americans of to-day and of yesterday have done perforce tell much that is unpleasant.

"Nevertheless, when the tale is finally told, I believe that it will show that the forces working for good in our national life outweigh the forces working for evil, and that, with many blunders and shortcomings, with much halting and turning aside from the path, we shall yet in the end prove our faith by our works and show in our lives our belief that righteousness exalteth a nation."

The American Association for Labor Legislation was the first to begin its work to-day. "Factory Inspection and Law Enforcement" was the subject of discussion. Edward F. Brown, of New York, special investigator for the National Child Labor Committee, made an address on the subject, saying in part:

Human beings, through lack of proper labor legislation and improper enforcement of existing laws, are stunned, crippled and incapacitated. That we have the ridiculously small number of 425 inspectors in the whole country to care for 8,491 manufacturing and mechanical establishments is a challenge to the sincerity of the communities engaged in [illegible] attempt to secure industrial justice.

[Contin

Esta

884

More Protection for Employes

The need of a new federal employes' accident compensation law was urged by Charles Earl, solicitor for the Departmtnt of Commerce and Labor. He proposed a new act covering industrial diseases, as well as industrial accidents, in the case of all federal employes, and granting compensation during incapacity, instead of for only one year, as at present.

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

Music News of Interest.

At the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Carl Muck, at Carnegie Hall, which fall on January 9 and 11, the soloists will be Mme. Margarete Matzenauer and Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programmes for these concerts will be announced shortly.

Est

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programme will be announced later.

1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 10, at 8:1 5o'clock. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression. She is regarded by many as the foremost representative German concert singer of our time. For several years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent ,and also in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protege she was. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with the orchestra accompanying.

, 1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Elena Gerhardt, the celebrated lieder singer, is due to arrive from Europe on Saturday next on the steamer Campania, to open her second American tour. Her drst concert will be in Providence, R. I., with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 31, after which she sings with the orchestra in Brooklyn, Boston, Providence, Hartford, Philadelphia and Wash-

E

1884

From
Address: New York City
Date

MASCULINE SINGERS AND PIANISTS

Reinhold von Warlich, the Russian-German basso, returns to New York early in January to be the soloist with the Philharmonic Society. Herr von Warlich, while on his recent Canadian tour, was the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, and one of his most successful concerts was that given in Ottawa under royal auspices.

At his January concert in New York he expects to sing, as his first number a Mozart aria, and for his second, a dramatic balled, "Ein Music Bilt," which was written by Gretchaninoff for Chaliapine.

The many admirers of Mr. John McCormack will be interested in the announcement that he is to give one more recital in New York this season. This will take place on January 5th at Carnegie Hall.

Another soloist who has recently won laurels with the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris is Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, whose first American appearance this season will be with the Philharmonic Orchestra, December 29th. After filling his engagements in this country, M. Lhevinne will leave for a three months' tour of Australia.

Max Pauer, the pianist of Stuttgart, who comes to this country to tour with the Boston Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestra, is sailing from Europe on December 31st. The dates for his appearance with the Philharmonic are January 16th and 17th; on both of these occasions he will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven.

Est

, 1884

[Continued on page 4]

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9 and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. It will be Miss Farrar's only concert appearance of the season.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

***

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. There will be a soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

Estal

34

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9 and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solist will be Margarethe Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, her only concert appearance of the season.

E

k, 1884

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

songs.

The January pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme Matzenauer, and on Saturday afternoon Miss Geraldine Farrar. The programme will be announced later.

Es

, 1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 10. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression upon all those who heard her. Elena Gerhardt is regarded as the foremost German concert singer of the time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protege she was. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with orchestra.

Esta

1884

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 10. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano whose appearance in America last year made a profound impression on all those that heard her. She is regarded as the foremost German concert singer of our time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England, where her popularity is firmly established. Miss Gerhardt owes not a small part of her art to the training she has received from Arthur Nikisch, whose protege she was.

k, 1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

E

1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date DEC 22 1912

The January pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. There will be a distinguished soloist at each of these.

On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

Est

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date DEC

The next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and on Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose only concert appearance of the season this will be. The programme will be announced later.

E

, 188

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date

***

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, Jan. 10, at 8:15. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MUSIC NOTES

—The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Margarete Matzenauer.

Es

, 1884

From Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been disabled the past fortnight by an attack of acute tongilitis, is sufficiently recovered to resume his work the coming week and there will be no question about his conducting the third Boston Symphony orchestra concert which will be given in Infantry hall on a week from Tuesday evening, New Year's eve. Owing to his illness, however, there has been some delay in arranging finally the program.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. In Miss Gerhardt the management of the Symphony orchestra believes that it is presenting to Providence one of the most interesting singers of our time. Miss Gerhardt is the possessor of a more than usually beautiful soprano voice and although German by birth and training she has been brought up in the old Italian school and is one of the most skilled vocalists now before the public.

It is outlined that she will sing an old classical Italian air and three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Richard Strauss. Tickets for this concert go on sale at Steinert's next Saturday morning, Dec. 28.

Es

188

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE

Date DEC 22 191

Established

MUSICAL MENTION

The coming week in local musical circles will be a comparatively quiet one owing to the fact that the holiday season will take precedure over all things else. Music lovers, however, especially those who delight in sacred music and oratorio will find no difficulty in satisfying their tastes in this particular class of music to-day since all the larger churches offer elaborate programmes of sacred music at the morning and evening services while several of the larger services are to have a special musical service at vespers at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been disabled the past fortnight by an attack of acute tonsilitis, is sufficiently recovered to resume his work the coming week and there will be no question about his conducting the third Boston Smyphony Orchestra concert which will be given in Infantry Hall on a week from Tuesday evening, New Year's Eve. Owing to his illness, however, there has been some delay in arranging finally the programme.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. In Miss Gerhardt the management of the Symphony Orchestra believes that it is presenting to Providence one of the most interesting singers of our time. Miss Gerhardt is the possessor of a more than usually beautiful soprano voice and although German by birth and training, she has been brought up in the old Italian school and is one of the most skilled vocalists now before the public. It is outlined that she will sing an old classical Italian air and three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Richard Strauss. Tickets for this concert go on sale at Setinert's next Saturday morning, Dec. 28.

The National Conservatory of Music of America, 126 West Seventy-ninth street, New York city, gives more free scholarships to pupils of talent without means than any other music school in this country, following the example of Paris Conservatorie. Nine were granted at the annual entrance examinations in September and more scholarships for voice, piano and violin will be given at the semi-annual examinations to be held Saturday,

Wire Rope.
Special agents for the Amer. Steel & Wire Co. Low prices, prompt delivery. Headquarters for Hemp Rope and Chain.
THE CONGDON & CARPENTER CO.,
Elizabeth and North Main Streets.

From EVG. SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

SYMPHONY JANUARY 8

Soloist With Boston Orchestra Will Be Elena Gerhardt.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will be given in the Lyric January 8 at 8.15 o'clock.

Elena Gerhardt will be the soloist. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England

Establi 4

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 8, at 8:15. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression upon all those that heard her. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with orchestra.

Establish 4

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, who is regarded as one of the foremost German concert singers of the time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England. Dr. Carl Muck will direct.

ork, 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Mme. Matzenauer Coming

The Boston Symphony is to bring here one of the supreme artists of the day in Margarete Matzenauer at its next concert in the Academy of Music on the evening of Monday, January 6. The great German contralto, who is a member of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's organization, has not been heard in Philadelphia this season. New York has recently been rejoicing over her triumps as Venus in "Tannhaeuser" and Bruennhilde in "The Walkuere," both, oddly enough, soprano roles.

Madame Matzenauer's voice is [illegible] range, and certain parts within [illegible] are denied to other contral[illegible]

Estab 4

TO BE HEARD HERE WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Margarete Matzenauer, one of the most distinguished lyrico-dramatic artists of the day, will make her first appearance here this season at the Boston symphony concert, to be given in the Academy on January 6. Mme. Matzenauer is a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVERTISER,
DECEMBER 28.

THE 10TH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A BRAHMS SYMPHONY AND LOCAL SOLOISTS

Mr. Marshall Plays Bach's Toccata in D Minor, and Mr. Noack Sinding's Concerto.

By S. C. Williams.

Brahms bulks largest in the 10th concert of the Boston Symphony season. The public rehearsal was given in Symphony hall, Friday afternoon, Mr. Urack conducting. The programme:—

Beethoven—Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62.
Bach—Toccata in D minor for Organ.
Sinding—Concerto in A major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 45. Allegro energico. Andante. Allegro giocoso.
Brahms—Symphony No. 3, in F major. Op. 90. I. Allegro con brio. II. Andante. III. Poco allegretto. IV. Allegro.

The soloists, Mr. Sylvian Noack, violinist, and Mr. John P. Marshall, organist, are both members of the orchestra. In talent assembled the concert is thus purely domestic.

Brahms's Third symphony is characteristic of the composer at his best. It is both robust and tender, with vitality sustained. Dr. Hanslick, an acute critic where Wagner was not concerned, said of it succinctly: "Its fundamental note is proud strength that rejoices in deeds. The heroic element is without any warlike flavor; it leads to no tragic action, such as the Funeral march in Beethoven's 'Eroica.' It recalls . . . . the health and full vigor of Beethoven's second period, and nowhere the singularities of his last period; and every now and then in passages quivers the romantic twilight of Schumann and Mendelssohn."

Conducting his third concert since tonsilitis made Dr. Muck its prey, Mr. Urack read the symphony with judicious freedom and revealing insight which made the performance his finest with the baton. The orchestra particularly excelled in the romantic third movement.

Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus" was not written as a prelude to Shakespeare's tragedy, but to a drama by the German poet, Heinrich von Collin, and dedicated to him. Hence Wagner's parallel between Shakespeare and Beethoven with this overture as a basis was a trifle far-fetched. It is, however, sufficiently graphic and apt for illustrative purposes. It is surmised that Beethoven took but a single scene, that between Coriolanus, his wife, and his mother on the battlefield before the gates of his native city. Manly strength and womanly tenderness are contrasted and dramatically opposed. Dignity and strength were manifest in yesterday's performance, with a few instances of overemphasis in Mr. Urack's anxiety to point the motive sharply.

The Bach Toccata in D minor gave pleasure to many that would gladly hear the noble organ of Symphony Hall and the orchestra's accomplished organist more frequently. It is a virtuoso piece and Mr. Marshall played it with due appreciation of its brilliant and rhapsodic qualities.

The Sinding concerto, which has been described as a fantasia in three sections, is not one of the greatest, but it has charm and the composer is more mindful of limitations of the instrument than some makers of violin concertos renowned. Mr. Noack's playing gave pleasure without exciting enthusiasm. He was most persuasive in the Andante.

The programme for next week's concerts is not yet announced. Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano whose first American tour made her an established favorite, will be the soloist.

POST,
DECEMBER 28.

SYMPHONY MEN THE SOLOISTS

Marshall, Organist, and Noack, Violinist, Heard

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the soloists at the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: John P. Marshall, organist, and Sylvian Noack, second concertmeister. The orchestral compositions were the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture, and the third symphony of Brahms. Mr. Marshall played the Bach Toccata and fugue in D minor (Peters Vol. IV. no. IV.), and Mr. Noack played Sinding's remarkable violin concerto in A major. Owing to the continued illness of Dr. Muck, Otto Urack again conducted.

The music of Bach, familiar to all, once more towered high, an almost unparalleled manifestation of genius. The work is dramatic, romantic, amazingly free in its form, rhapsodic in style, and it has a biblical grandeur of utterance. For the final measures of the introduction could well bear this caption: "And God said, Let there be light; and there was light." The final cadence is one of the greatest in all music.

Mr. Marshall gave a carefully prepared and effective performance of the piece. Its proportions were thoughtfully carried out, although an accident of the moment resulted in half instead of the full force of the organ being brought to bear in the opening measures. Technically the performance was estimable, and the organist did not follow slavishly the traditions in interpretation. His tempi were his own and his regard for the music evident, and the audience responded with unmistakable sincerity.

[illegible] and authoritative reading of the Sinding concerto. There are in the piece moments of astonishing originality and power. The three movements connect and the method of connecting is unhackneyed and very individual. At the end of the first movement the time for the customary cadenza is felt approaching. Behold an unexpected modulation, a sudden thundering forth of empty fifths, and from the depths of the orchestra the 'cellos and basses creep forward with a dark and powerful theme. In this piece the orchestra, and not the soloist, is the hero.

Sinding is, or has been, one of the two men who can summon the epic mood, speak with the voice of the early gods. Yet the later Sinding has not carried out the promise of the earlier man. But this concerto ranks among his very best works, and Mr. Noack is much to be credited for his initiative and self-sacrifice in playing the piece—a very difficult solo part—and for his skill in performance.

Mr. Urack gave a performance of the Brahms symphony which placed that work in an almost unprecedented light. Was this the Brahms, the opposing camp asked themselves, whom they had hooted for long seasons as crabbed, pedantic, thickly colored, a formalist? The symphony was virile, brilliant, poetical, having a thousand hues. It was heroic, or it was as the great blue lake of Lucerne. Mr. Urack further distinguished himself by an individual, highly impressive and wholly legitimate reading.

BOSTON HERALD,
DECEMBER 28,

TWO SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY

Mr. Noack, Second Concert Master Plays Sinding's Concerto in A Major for Violin.

MR. URACK AGAIN CONDUCTS

Bach's Toccata in D Minor Played on the Organ by Mr. Marshall.

By PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the concert of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, and Mr. Urack again took his place. Dr. Muck expects surely to conduct the concerts of next week.

The program of the 11th public rehearsal was as follows:

Overture to "Coriolanus"..........Beethoven
Toccata in D minor for organ..........Bach
Concerto in A major for violin..........Sinding
Symphony in F major, No. 3..........Brahms

There were two soloists yesterday—Mr. Noack, the second concert master, and Mr. Marshall, the organist of the orchestra. Sinding's concerto is not well known to the general public. Mr. Winternitz played it here seven years ago, and in the course of seven years a man, according to tradition, changes his skin, also his ears and taste, unless he be a hidebound conservative and a creature of prejudices. But Mr. Noack's performance, excellent as it was in certain ways, did not materially alter the opinion of those who remembered this concerto.

The orchestral portion of it is much more effective than the solo part. Nothing is given to the solo instrument so striking as the orchestral opening with its pompous stride and genuine fire; nor has the solo violin any page so impressive as the measures for 'cellos and double basses at the beginning of the second section. Too often the entrance of the violin seems an unwarrantable interruption. There is no need of alluding to real or fancied deminiscences in this music. The well-schooled violinist may find a little Brahms, Dvorak, Bruch, in the thematic material; the average hearer may be led occasionally to think of Grieg; but there is no flagrant or fragrant plagiarism. There are pages admirably worked for the orchestra, passages with marked vitality. The wonder is that the solo part is generally so uninteresting.

The program was agreeably varied by the inclusion of Bach's Toccata with the fugue in D minor, the toccata that is known to pianists by Tausig's transcription. The toccata is dramatic and in the better style of Buxtehude, who was singularly imaginative in the structure and the harmonic coloring of his organ pieces. It showed he played dramatically, with full appreciation of significant holds and long pauses. Mr. Marshall gave an interesting performance, although the toccata might have been read with more eloquence and the pace of the fugue should have been a little faster and more steadily maintained.

The overture to "Coriolanus" was well played with the exception of one of those unaccountable slips that occur sometimes even in a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was not so happy in his interpretation of the Symphony by Brahms as in that of Schumann's last week. He was inclined to turn the first movement into mosaic work after the exposition of the emblematic figure, the boldest stroke of invention in the whole Symphony. The reading of the second movement and of the finale was mannered, but Mr. Urack was more fortunate in the third movement which was charmingly played.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Holbrooke, [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE
Date DEC 22 1912

Established

MUSICAL MENTION

The coming week in local musical circles will be a comparatively quiet one owing to the fact that the holiday season will take precedure over all things else. Music lovers, however, especially those who delight in sacred music and oratorio will find no difficulty in satisfying their tastes in this particular class of music to-day since all the large churches offer elaborate programmes of sacred music at the morning and evening services while several of the larger services are to have a special musical service at vespers at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been disabled the past fortnight by an attack of acute tonsilitis, is sufficiently recovered to resume his work the coming week and there will be no question about his conducting the third Boston Smyphony Orchestra concert which will be given in Infantry Hall on a week from Tuesday evening, New Year's Eve. Owing to his illness, however, there has been some delay in arranging finally the programme.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. In Miss Gerhardt the management of the Symphony Orchestra believes that it is presenting to Providence one of the most interesting singers of our time. Miss Gerhardt is the possessor of a more than usually beautiful soprano voice and although German by birth and training, she has been brought up in the old Italian school and is one of the most skilled vocalists now before the public. It is outlined that she will sing an old classical Italian air and three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Richard Strauss. Tickets for this concert go on sale at Setinert's next Saturday morning, Dec. 28.

The National Conservatory of Music of America, 126 West Seventy-ninth street, New York city, gives more free scholarships to pupils of talent without means than any other music school in this country, following the example of Paris Conservatorie. Nine were granted at the annual entrance examinations in September and more scholarships for voice, piano and violin will be given at the semi-annual examinations to be held Saturday,

Wire Rope.
Special agents for the Amer. Steel & Wire Co. Low prices, prompt delivery. Headquarters for Hemp Rope and Chain.
THE CONGDON & CARPENTER CO.,
Elizabeth and North Main Streets.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

SYMPHONY JANUARY 8

Soloist With Boston Orchestra Will Be Elena Gerhardt.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will be given in the Lyric January 8 at 8.15 o'clock.

Elena Gerhardt will be the soloist. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in Engl

Establi 4

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 8, at 8:15. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose appearances in America last year made such a profound impression upon all those that heard her. She will probably be heard in an aria and in a group of songs with orchestra.

Establish 4

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, who is regarded as one of the foremost German concert singers of the time. For a number of years she has been giving concerts and song recitals on the Continent and in England. Dr. Carl Muck will direct.

ork, 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Ther

Mme. Matzenauer Coming

The Boston Symphony is to bring here one of the supreme artists of the day in Margarete Matzenauer at its next concert in the Academy of Music on the evening of Monday, January 6. The great German contralto, who is a member of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's organization, has not been heard in Philadelphia this season. New York has recently been rejoicing over her triumps as Venus in "Tannhaeuser" and Bruennhilde in "Die Walkuere," both, oddly enough, soprano roles.

Madame Matzenauer's voice is range, and certain parts within are denied to other contra

Estab 4

TO BE HEARD HERE WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Margarete Matzenauer, one of the most distinguished lyrico-dramatic artists of the day, will make her first appearance here this season at the Boston symphony concert, to be given in the Academy on January 6. Mme. Matzenauer is a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVERTISER,
DECEMBER 28,

THE 10TH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A BRAHMS SYMPHONY AND LOCAL SOLOISTS

Mr. Marshall Plays Bach's Toccata in D Minor, and Mr. Noack Sinding's Concerto.

By S. C. Williams.

Brahms bulks largest in the 10th concert of the Boston Symphony season. The public rehearsal was given in Symphony hall, Friday afternoon, Mr. Urack conducting. The programme:—

Beethoven—Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62.
Bach—Toccata in D minor for Organ.
Sinding—Concerto in A major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 45. Allegro energico. Andante. Allegro giocoso.
Brahms—Symphony No. 3, in F major. Op. 90. I. Allegro con brio. II. Andante. III. Poco allegretto. IV. Allegro.

The soloists, Mr. Sylvian Noack, violinist, and Mr. John P. Marshall, organist, are both members of the orchestra. In talent assembled the concert is thus purely domestic.

Brahms's Third symphony is characteristic of the composer at his best. It is both robust and tender, with vitality sustained. Dr. Hanslick, an acute critic where Wagner was not concerned, said of it succinctly: "Its fundamental note is proud strength that rejoices in deeds. The heroic element is without any warlike flavor; it leads to no tragic action, such as the Funeral march in Beethoven's 'Eroica.' It recalls . . . . the health and full vigor of Beethoven's second period, and nowhere the singularities of his last period; and every now and then in passages quivers the romantic twilight of Schumann and Mendelssohn."

Conducting his third concert since tonsilitis made Dr. Muck its prey, Mr. Urack read the symphony with judicious freedom and revealing insight which made the performance his finest with the baton. The orchestra particularly excelled in the romantic third movement.

Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus" was not written as a prelude to Shakespeare's tragedy, but to a drama by the German poet, Heinrich von Collin, and dedicated to him. Hence Wagner's parallel between Shakespeare and Beethoven with this overture as a basis was a trifle far-fetched. It is, however, sufficiently graphic and apt for illustrative purposes. It is surmised that Beethoven took but a single scene, that between Coriolanus, his wife, and his mother on the battlefield before the gates of his native city. Manly strength and womanly tenderness are contrasted and dramatically opposed. Dignity and strength were manifest in yesterday's performance, with a few instances of over-emphasis in Mr. Urack's anxiety to point the motive sharply.

The Bach Toccata in D minor gave pleasure to many that would gladly hear the noble organ of Symphony Hall and the orchestra's accomplished organist more frequently. It is a virtuoso piece and Mr. Marshall played it with due appreciation of its brilliant and rhapsodic qualities.

The Sinding concerto, which has been described as a fantasia in three sections, is not one of the greatest, but it has charm and the composer is more mindful of limitations of the instrument than some makers of violin concertos renowned. Mr. Noack's playing gave pleasure without exciting enthusiasm. He was most persuasive in the Andante.

The programme for next week's concerts is not yet announced. Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano whose first American tour made her an established favorite, will be the soloist.

POST,
DECEMBER 28.

SYMPHONY MEN THE SOLOISTS

Marshall, Organist, and Noack, Violinist, Heard

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the soloists at the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: John P. Marshall, organist, and Sylvian Noack, second concertmeister. The orchestral compositions were the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture, and the third symphony of Brahms. Mr. Marshall played the Bach Toccata and fugue in D minor (Peters Vol. IV. no. IV.), and Mr. Noack played Sinding's remarkable violin concerto in A major. Owing to the continued illness of Dr. Muck, Otto Urack again conducted.

The music of Bach, familiar to all, once more towered high, an almost unparalleled manifestation of genius. The work is dramatic, romantic, amazingly free in its form, rhapsodic in style, and it has a biblical grandeur of utterance. For the final measures of the introduction could well bear this caption: "And God said, Let there be light; and there was light." The final cadence is one of the greatest in all music.

Mr. Marshall gave a carefully prepared and effective performance of the piece. Its proportions were thoughtfully carried out, although an accident of the moment resulted in half instead of the full force of the organ being brought to bear in the opening measures. Technically the performance was estimable, and the organist did not follow slavishly the traditions in interpretation. His tempi were his own and his regard for the music evident, and the audience responded with un-

---

[illegible] ding concerto. There are in the piece moments of astonishing originality and power. The three movements connect and the method of connecting is unhackneyed and very individual. At the end of the first movement the time for the customary cadenza is felt approaching. Behold an unexpected modulation, a sudden thundering forth of empty fifths, and from the depths of the orchestra the 'cellos and basses creep forward with a dark and powerful theme. In this piece the orchestra, and not the soloist, is the hero.

Sinding is, or has been, one of the two men who can summon the epic mood, speak with the voice of the early gods. Yet the later Sinding has not carried out the promise of the earlier man. But this concerto ranks among his very best works, and Mr. Noack is much to be credited for his initiative and self-sacrifice in playing the piece—a very difficult solo part—and for his skill in performance.

Mr. Urack gave a performance of the Brahms symphony which placed that work in an almost unprecedented light. Was this the Brahms, the opposing camp asked themselves, whom they had hooted for long seasons as crabbed, pedantic, thickly colored, a formalist? The symphony was virile, brilliant, poetical, having a thousand hues. It was heroic, or it was as the great blue lake of Lucerne. Mr. Urack further distinguished himself by an individual, highly impressive and wholly legitimate reading.

BOSTON HERALD,
DECEMBER 28,

TWO SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY

Mr. Noack, Second Concert Master Plays Sinding's Concerto in A Major for Violin.

MR. URACK AGAIN CONDUCTS

Bach's Toccata in D Minor Played on the Organ by Mr. Marshall.

By PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck was unable to conduct the concert of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, and Mr. Urack again took his place. Dr. Muck expects surely to conduct the concerts of next week.

The program of the 11th public rehearsal was as follows:

Overture to "Coriolanus"..........Beethoven
Toccata in D minor for organ..........Bach
Concerto in A major for violin..........Sinding
Symphony in F major, No. 3..........Brahms

There were two soloists yesterday—Mr. Noack, the second concert master, and Mr. Marshall, the organist of the orchestra. Sinding's concerto is not well known to the general public. Mr. Winternitz played it here seven years ago, and in the course of seven years a man, according to tradition, changes his skin, also his ears and taste, unless he be a hidebound conservative and a creature of prejudices. But Mr. Noack's performance, excellent as it was in certain ways, did not materially alter the opinion of those who remembered this concerto.

The orchestral portion of it is much more effective than the solo part. Nothing is given to the solo instrument so striking as the orchestral opening with its pompous stride and genuine fire; nor has the solo violin any page so impressive as the measures for 'cellos and double basses at the beginning of the second section. Too often the entrance of the violin seems an unwarrantable interruption. There is no need of alluding to real or fancied deminiscences in this music. The well-schooled violinist may find a little Brahms, Dvorak, Bruch, in the thematic material; the average hearer may be led occasionally to think of Grieg; but there is no flagrant or fragrant plagiarism. There are pages admirably worked for the orchestra, passages with marked vitality. The wonder is that the solo part is generally so uninteresting.

The program was agreeably varied by the inclusion of Bach's Toccata with the fugue in D minor, the toccata that is known to pianists by Tausig's transcription. The toccata is dramatic and in the better style of Buxtehude, who was singularly imaginative in the structure and the harmonic coloring of his organ pieces. It showed he played dramatically, with full appreciation of significant holds and long pauses. Mr. Marshall gave an interesting performance, although the toccata might have been read with more eloquence and the pace of the fugue should have been a little faster and more steadily maintained.

The overture to "Coriolanus" was well played with the exception of one of those unaccountable slips that occur sometimes even in a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was not so happy in his interpretation of the Symphony by Brahms as in that of Schumann's last week. He was inclined to turn the first movement into mosaic work after the exposition of the emblematic figure, the boldest stroke of invention in the whole Symphony. The reading of the second movement and of the finale was mannered, but Mr. Urack was more fortunate in the third movement which was charmingly played.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Holbrooke;

GLOBE—

DECEMBER 28.

ILLNESS YET HOLDS DR MUCK A PRISONER

Urack Gives Good Reading of Brahms' Symphony.

Messrs Noack and Marshall Both Appear as the Soloists.

The program of the 10th Symphony rehearsal yesterday was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolanus"; Bach, Toccata in D minor for organ, John P. Marshall, organist; Sinding, Concerto in A major, for violin and orchestra, Sylvian Noack, soloist; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, in F major.

As Dr Muck is still confined to his home, Mr Urack conducted.

The feature of the concert was the playing of the symphony. Mr Urack obtained what appeared to approach more nearly an individual expression of his own purposes and musical taste than he has been able to do heretofore.

He was particularly fortunate in the second or slow movement, and in that which followed it. There was a more [illegible] graduation in the transition from one thought or passage to another, a more pervading repose, and a clearer sense of that intangible but easily appreciable quality which, when present, affords impressiveness and conviction, but when wanting, leaves uncertainty and incoherence.

It may be said that the striking chief theme of the first movement—one of a peculiar and uncommon emotional force in Brahms—was lacking in keenness of accent, and hence of impetus. The balance was not good here, for the trombones predominated, and Mr Urack's beat needs something more of precision and authority to be effective in this rhythm, but the movement gained headway as it progressed.

The closing allegro began with its due suppression as of apprehension and rose to suggest the increasing shocks of battle. The orchestra played splendidly, and Mr Urack was recalled, even at the end of the program, and applauded heartily. It was a performance in which he well may take pride.

Sinding's concerto contains a plentiful dearth of ideas, and these are scattered economically through its pages. The orchestra is for the greater part out of proportion to the character of the solo part, and the violinist is asked to play passages which contain only dry or at best idly decorative figuration, or measures for a broad bow that lack inherently lyric impetus. Tedious sequence oftenest takes the place of true invention. Mr Noack atoned for this in part. His musicianship was excellent, his quality of tone always a source of pleasure, and his treatment of the more favorable passages admirable. The accompaniment was not always in his favor, and the first movement was taken at too fast and flurried a pace.

The prospect of an organ solo without orchestral accompaniment or participation in a symphony concert program was an unusual one yesterday, but there were many who apparently welcomed the chance to hear the noble instrument. Mr Marshall was warmly applauded.

It is believed that Dr Muck will be able to conduct the concert next week. Elena Gerhardt will be the soloist.

JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 28,

TWO SOLOISTS ARE HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Noack and Marshall Applauded Vigorously by Large Audience.

Thirty-third degree mus.. lovers waited outside Symphony Hall for hours yesterday to get a chance to hear two home soloists, Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra, and John P. Marshall, the organist.

In Mr. Marshall's case the interest was exceptional, for the orchestra's organist is a native of Rockport, one of the comparatively small number of native musicians who have found a place in the celebrated band. Besides, an organ solo is a rare feature of a Symphony concert.

Mr. Noack, a native of Rotterdam, has been a member of the orchestra for several years. He was a violin virtuoso of considerable note before Dr. Muck induced him to come to Boston, and here he has held his own among the prominent artists.

Mr. Marshall played Bach's Toccata in D minor. This is a famous work, but it appeals chiefly to those who have studied the organ, and so does the soloist's style, even though it be as polished as Professor Marshall's, in a number like this. Mr. Noack appeared as soloist in the Sinding Concerto in A major, a brilliant work, with fine passages for orchestra as well as solo violin; and the modest Hollander was applauded vigorously for his virile, graceful performance, which was on a scale worthy of a virtuoso of high rank.

[Contin

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture and Brahms's third Symphony are the other numbers on this week's program, which, as usual, will be performed again tonight. Mr. Urack conducted yesterday with satisfactory effects. It is expected that Dr. Muck will be able to conduct next week.

A Symphonic Poem, "Queen Mab," by Joseph Holbrooke, will be the novelty on next week's program. The principal feature will be Bruckner's seventh Symphony, the performance of which has been postponed while Dr. Muck was combating tonsolitis. Brahms's "Academic Festival," Overture will be the other orchestral number. Elena Gerhardt, the soloist, will sing an old Italian aria and several songs by Richard Strauss, including the popular "Cecilia."

DECEMBER 28,

TRANSCRIPT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BRAHMS, SINDING, MR. URACK AND MR. NOACK

An Organ Piece Besides—Brahms's Third Symphony in a Performance That Keeps It Music for the Mind—Sinding's Pretty Concerto Felicitously Played—Mr. Urack Increases in Skill and Understanding

THOSE estimable and no doubt sincere people who lift their hands at the mention of Brahms are urged to remember two things: First, that those who look to music as an emotional debauch, exempt from depressing consequences, will find no such food from this fiery-minded Teuton; and, second, that he is almost as little in sympathy with the purely sensuous appeal of music—that of the Polly-want-her-head-scratched variety. There is a mental laziness quite as discreditable as physical sloth, and it is this which most often recoils from the wholesome exertions exacted by the music of Brahms.

At no concert while Mr. Urack has been wielding the baton for Dr. Muck has a more ambitious task been presented to him, and at no time has he met the test more creditably. There had been moments during Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," which opened the programme, when the tempi sounded a shade slack; when the rhythms lacked incisiveness, when the broad sweep, the "schwung" of the phrase was missed; but Mr. Urack's expertness increases, apparently, in proportion to the exactions of the music, for he marshalled the instrumental groupings of this Third symphony of Brahms, clarified its form, and shaped its climaxes with an arm which was as deft with the leader's stick as it is limber with the bow of his violoncello. Especially in the structurally intricate first movement with its Wagnerian hints, its heraldry of horns, and its fading of shapes and colors at the close, the leading was that of a hand at once confident and discriminating.

Let the heathen rage; this is music of the mind. It is intense, dispassionate, concentrated thinking—the rejoicing of an intellectually strong man to run a race. There is a mastery of the resources of the orchestra that is a study in itself. Here it is felt that for the announcement of a theme, the violoncellos have not quite enough body, and the horns are used to add the requisite color and background; elsewhere it is the antiphonal passages between strings and wood wind, or that jealous economy of means by which figurations which are, perhaps, merely suggested by violins or 'cellos, are more expressive than they would have been in complete statement. It is the art of the great prose stylist who told an admirer, "The thing is to know what to leave out." And yet in the midst of this music of sinew; thinking ,this play of a powerful mind over the stuff of experience, we have, like a strain from an old poet in a page of splendid prose, the slow-swinging song which opens the third movement, a momentary peep at the softer side of an austere nature. If those great thinkers who were also masters of form could have been composers too, they would have written music like this symphony: Platonic poetry and idealism—orchestrated.

It was an afternoon generous of soloists, Mr. Marshall, the organist, to play Bach's Toccata with fugue in D minor; and Mr. Noack, the polished leader of the second violins, to play Sinding's concerto in A major. Under the hands of Mr. Marshall, Bach's thunderous Toccata gave off its sonorous ejaculations with impressiveness and thereto a certain cleanness of enunciation which is by no means common among even the masters of the instrument. The organists who can pile the tonal masses of its rich, warm coloring are many: the organists who can give the fleet, running passages the distinctness of line-drawing are few, and Mr. Marshall is of them; and very finely did he build the cloud architecture and tint the sumptuous fading of modulations at the end.

Sinding's concerto was happily chosen by Mr. Noack. He is a violinist of polished phase, of not a large but a smooth, a silken tone, and of a certain gift for revealing the subtleties of the instrument. It is a pleasure to watch his elegant bowing with the "high wrist," and the oily, almost imperceptible transitions from one stroke to the next. His tone is as a soft, shining gloss; it shimmers with lights and half lights; pale tints come and go in it with discreet and reticent loveliness. The flourish which opens the first movement of the concerto was tossed off with a brilliancy which had nevertheless a quality of reserve; a shout of double notes, but a most genteel shout. In the graceful embellishment given to the solo instrument in the rather loosely woven first movement, and in the lyric moments of the Andante, Mr. Noack's bow exerted all its suavity, its finesse, and a suppleness of inflection which can dispense with the left-hand tremolo which so besets the newer generation of virtuosi. There was, as to Sinding, just a suspicion at times during some of the sumptuous orchestral interludings of the first two movements that he suffered from a tendency to forget that he was writing not an orchestral fantasia but a concerto for the violin. In the finale, however, the solo instrument assumes its rightful leadership, and there are, particularly in the middle section, passages not only of distinguished beauty in the soloist's playing of them, but of exceptional felicity as writing for instrument as well—a succession of flexible figurations, often bursting into double-stops as if from the sheer exuberance of the song as birds shake out their trills, and this over a pulsing of the harp and softly choiring strings. And to end these felicities came a shimmering cascade of notes in the soloist's brittle and sparkling staccato; a pleasing concerto, pleasingly played.

[Continued on Page

L. P.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 28,

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

At the eleventh rehearsal and concert on the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the name of Josef Holbrooke will appear on the Symphony program for the first time. Dr. Muck has elected to play "Queen Mab," his poem for full orchestra.

Josef Holbrooke is one of the boldest and most original spirits of the younger school of English composers. He was born in Croyden, July 6, 1878 He studied at the Royal Academy of Music, his principal teachers being F. Corder for composition and Frederick Westlake for the pianoforte. Leaving the academy in 1898 he devoted himself entirely to composition and has come frequently before the public principally as a composer of orchestral music of pronounced modern tendencies.

His first important work to be performed was a tone poem entitled "The Raven," after Poe, which was played at the Crystal Palace concerts in 1900. This was the first of a series of symphonic poems of unusual interest. It was followed by the "Ode to Victory" (Byron), "The Skeleton in Armor" (Longfellow), "Ulalume" (Poe), and "Queen Mab" (Shakespeare). His other orchestral works include an overture entitled "The New Renaissance" and three fantastic sets of variations on the following popular melodies: "The Three Blind Mice," "The Girl I Left Behind Me" and "Auld Lang Syne." Of his choral works the most important is a setting of "The Bells." Last spring Oscar Hammerstein produced in London his opera, "The Children of Don."

The Symphony soloist next week will be Elena Gerhardt, who will make her first appearance of the season here. She will sing an old Italian aria and three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia," which have been orchestrated by Strauss himself. Dr. Muck will end the program with Bruckner's seventh symphony.

HERALD.

DECEMBER 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The most interesting personality in British music today is Josef Holbrooke, whose name will appear on a Symphony program for the first time this week. Dr. Muck will play Holbrooke's tone poem for full orchestra, "Queen Mab." The composer has been much of a figure in English music for the last 12 years, but curiously enough none of his music has been played in Boston and very little of it in America. It is in his orchestral music that Holbrooke has asserted himself as a thoroughly characteristic and independent member of the younger group of British composers. He possesses a vivid imagination, which is readily stimulated by the intensely tragic and occasionally drifts into that debatable territory which divides the morbid from the grotesque. He has won fame of a certain sort by demanding the use in one of his compositions of concertinas and the use of colored lights to emphasize various moods in another of his compositions. He was born in Croydon on July 6, 1878. He studied at the Royal Academy of Music under Corder and Westlake. The first composition which brought him into public notice was his tone poem entitled "The Raven," after Poe, played at the Crystal Palace concerts in 1900. This was the first of a series of symphonic poems of unusual interest. It was followed by the "Ode to Victory" (Byron), "The Skeleton in Armour" (Longfellow) "Ulalume" (Poe), "Queen Mab" (Shakespeare) and "The Masque of the Red Death" (Poe) His other orchestral works include an overture entitled "The New Renaissance" and three fantastic sets of variations on the following popular melodies: "Three Blind Mice," "The Girl I Left Behind Me" and "Auld Lang Syne." Of his choral works the most important is a setting of "The Bells" and last spring Oscar Hammerstein produced in London his opera, "The Children of Don." "Queen Mab" was first performed at the Leeds festival in 1904.

Dr. Muck is well on the road toward recovery and will unquestionably conduct these concerts. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt.

Holbrooke — Symphonic Poem "Queen Mab."
Old Italian Aria.
Brahms—"Academic Festival" overture.
Strauss—Three songs with orchestra. "Morgen," "Weigenlied," "Cecilia."
Bruckner—Symphony No. 7.

FREMSTAD-MARTIN CONCERT

The concert this afternoon at Symphony Hall, the eighth of the popular series that have had such success, will be given beginning at half past three by Mme. Olive Fremstad, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Riccardo Martin, tenor of the same institution. Both of these artists are well known here in opera by their several appearances with the Metropolitan Opera Company, as well as with the Boston Opera Company, but neither of them has been heard here in concert; at least, in a concert of this character. Several years age Madame Fremstad was soloist with the Symphony orchestra, but that was her only appearance here as a concert singer. A particularly interesting number of the program will be a group of Scandinavian songs to be sung by Madame Fremstad. She has had much success with these songs throughout the country. The program in full is as follows:

Songs—
Sospiri niei.......................A. Bimboni
Als die alte Mutter.....................Dvorak
J'ai pleure en reve...........................Hue
Mr. Martin.
Aria, "Dich theure Halle" (Tannhaeuser) Wagner
Mme. Fremstad.
Songs—
To Dasies...................Roger Quilter
Oh, Let Night Speak of Me.........Chadwick
Before the Dawn.....................Chadwick
Mr. Martin.
Songs—
Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen.Robert Franz
Stille Sicherheit..................Robert Franz
Fischermaedchen..........................Schubert
Wenn die Linde bluht..............Max Reger
Es blinkt der Thau..................Rubinstein
Mme. Fremstad.
Aria, "Vesti la Giubba" (Pagliacci)...... Leoncavallo
Mr. Martin.
Four Scandinavian songs—
Saterjenten's Sondag.............Ole Bull
a janta a ja..................Swedish Folk-song
Med en Primula Veris........................Grieg
Et Syn.................................Grieg
Mme. Fremstad.
Duet, "Zu neuen Thaten" (Goetterdaemmerung) ....Wagner
Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin.

BUTT-RUMFORD CONCERT

When Clara Butt, the English contralto, appeared in Boston a dozen years ago, she was a tall, graceful woman, whose height of over six feet was offset by the ease of her carriage, and she possessed a voice of true organ-like quality. At that time Clara Butt was comparatively unknown. Today she is by all odds the most popular English singer of our time, the idol of the British public as Sims Reeves was before her. In Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon she will give her first concert of an extended tour of this country and will be assisted by her husband, Kennerley Rumford, baritone.

Madame Butt's career has been extraordinary in every sense of the word. The daughter of a poor English farmer, friends discovered her voice and sent her to London, where she took the prizes of the Royal Academy of Music. Today in the course of a year she sings to larger audiences than any other artist. On each Good Friday in Crystal Palace, London, she has an audience of 25,000. Each season she sings to over 8000 people in Albert Hall, London; this in addition to her concerts in Queen's Hall. She has recently made a tour of Australia, South Africa and New Zealand, where her takings averaged $3000 a concert. She has also sung with success recently in Vienna, Berlin and Paris.

At her concert here next week she will sing some classical arias, some classical German songs, some modern English songs, and what will appeal to the great masses will be Sullivan's "The Lost Chord" and Liddle's "Abide With Me," with organ and harp accompaniment. Mr. Rumford will sing songs by Strauss, Wolf, Williams, MacDowell, Grieg, Stanford and Davies.

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 29,

Josef Holbrooke

Dr. Muck, as Mr. Fiedler before him, has interested himself in the compositions of the modern English school, with the result that Josef Holbrooke's love poem, "Queen Mab," will be played for the first time in America at the Symphony concert of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Holbrooke has been much of a figure in English music for the last 12 years, but curiously enough none of his music has been played in Boston and very little of it in America. It is in his orchestral music that he has asserted himself as a throughly independent member of the younger group of British composers. His itch to compose is readily stimulated by the intensely tragic and by that debatable territory which divided the morbid from the grotesque.

He has won fame of a certain sort by demanding the use in one of his compositions of concertinas, and also the use of colored lights to emphasize various moods in another of his compositions. He was born in Croydon on July 6, 1878. He studied at the Royal Academy of Music under Corder and Westlake. The first composition which brought him into public notice was his tone poem entitled "The Raven," after Poe, played at the Crystal Palace Concerts in 1900. This was the first of a series of symphonic poems of uncommon character. It was followed by the "Ode to Victory" (Byron), "The Skeleton in Armor" (Longfellow), "Ulalume" (Poe), "Queen Mab" (Shakspere) and "The Masque of the Red Death" (Poe). His other orchestral works include an overture entitled "The New Renaissance" and three fantastic sets of variations on the following popular melodies: "Three Blind Mice," "The Girl I Left Behind Me" and "Auld Lang Syne." Of his choral works the most important is a setting of "The Bells," and last spring Oscar Hammerstein produced in London his opera "The Children of Don." The "Queen Mab" was first performed at the Leeds Festival in 1904.

Dr. Muck is well on the road toward recovery and will unquestionably conduct these concerts. He has put on the programme Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, which he proposed to play a fortnight ago.

GLOBE- DECEMBER 30.

MME FREMSTAD SINGS WITH ADMIRABLE ART

Gives Pleasure in Group of Scandinavian Songs.

Riccardo Martin's Tones Show More Smoothness Than Sentiment.

Mme Olive Fremstad and Riccardo Martin, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company, gave a joint recital at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was a large and enthusiastic one.

The distinguished dramatic soprano from New York has been heard all too infrequently in Boston. Her Isolde is a superb achievemnt in lyric tragedy. It is promised this season at the Boston Opera House. As Venus she has been admired for the surpassing loveliness of her embodiment of the goddess. At the last visit of the Metropolitan Company to Boston her Elsa was a singularly beautiful impersonation, notwithstanding the vocal indisposition against which she contended.

The choice of Elizabeth's rapturous air of greeting to the hall of song from "Tannhauser" was not wholly a fortunate one for the soprano's first number yesterday. The upper voice was not at once equal to its high range, particularly that of the closing measures, and there were traces of nervousness. But the group of songs brought the singer into more intimate and charming relation with her hearers and disclosed her versatility in the perception and treatment of a series of moods.

It is not generally the custom with recitalists to sing the songs of Robert Franz, and it was good to see two of them upon the program, both exquisite in thought and feeling, the tender grief of the "Aus Meinen Grossen Schmerzen" in contrast to the lightness of the "Stille Sicherheit." Mme Fremstad, commonly thought of as a mistress of dramatic song in its heroic forms, gave these songs their due proportion and character as miniatures, establishing clearly the spirit of each and making the thought luminous by her increasing plasticity and responsiveness of voice. Of this group were Schubert's "Fischermaedchen," "Wenn die Linde blueht," a song of mystifying refinement of humor when Max Reger is noted as the composer, and finally Rubenstein's "Es blinkt der Thau."

In the superb insolence of the song by Delibes of Spanish characteristics which Mme Fremstad added to this group, she excited lively anticipation of her Carmen, a role she has eagerly coveted at the Metropolitan, where for a number of seasons it has been out of the actual repertory.

A beautifully fashioned woman, with an instinctive grace upon the concert platform as in the various guises of opera, Mme Fremstad is enchanting in the artless simplicity and spontaniety of her manner in the degree to which she employs variety of facial expression and even of pose, and in the suggestion of coquetry with which she can highten the flavor of a song, yet not to the sacrifice of her dignity as an artist.

ment of personal charm, in vivacity, archness or in droll humor, that made the group of Scandinavian songs of uncommon interest, particularly the glib patter of the Scandinavian folk song. Nor should the quaint and characteristic color of the two songs by Grieg be overlooked. Mme Fremstad sat down to the piano and added another Swedish song to the group.

Ere this the soprano's voice had become more free and flexible, especially the upper tones when used softly. It is a magnificent instrument, abounding in the color, which betrays its kinship to the contralto voice, yet possessing the clarion timbre in the head tones that makes it dramatically expressive.

In his appearance at the opera Mr Martin has made known repeatedly the suavity and smoothness which characterize his tones when he is in good voice. Yesterday, with the exception of the highest notes of Canio's oft-heard air from "Pagliacci," he sang with ease and in a style marked by fluency and evenness of the melodic line, rather than by any wide variety or depth of expression. Dvorak's "Songs My Mother Taught Me" has less of the composer's sentimentality than some of his works in larger forms; it deserved more intimacy of feeling, as did Hue's "J'ai pleure en reve." The second group was in English, by Quilter and Chadwick. Mr Martin was insistently recalled. The program closed with the duet of Siegfried and Brunnhilde from the prologue of "Goeterdaemmerung."

ADVERTISER, DECEMBER 30,

MME. FREMSTAD AND MARTIN SOLOISTS

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Programme Ranged From Wagner to Lightest of Songs, With No Clash of Effect.

Mme. Olive Fremstad and Riccardo Martin delighted an audience that filled Symphony hall yesterday afternoon in one of the most delightful of the admirable series of Sunday afternoon performances at this hall. Beyond providing the distinct novelty to Boston of hearing both or either one of these excellent artists in recital, they presented a programme of extraordinary scope and unusual merit.

Mme. Fremstad has sung as soloist with the Symphony orchestra, but not otherwise in concert in this city. Both Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin have been heard here in opera, but here was a new glimpse of them, and a most gratifying one.

The range of the programme carried the audience from Wagner to the lightest of songs, and so wisely arranged were the numbers that there was no clash of effect.

Interest centered in Mme. Fremstad's group of Scandinavian songs, of which four were on the programme and two were added in response to the insistent demand for encores. Of the four announced, the "a janta a ja," a Swedish folk song, particularly pleased. Ole Bull's "Saterjenten's Sondag" and two songs of Grieg, "Med en Primula Veris" and "Et Syn" were exquisitely sung. A Norwegian song and a Swedish song (Mme. Fremstad playing the accompaniment herself for the latter), were charming.

Mr. Martin was particularly effective in the "Vesta la Giubba" aria, Leoncavallo, from Pagliacci. This was encored, of course, and Mr. Martin sang "Martinata" of the same composer, repeating this in response to the demand for a second encore.

Mme. Fremstad scored also in Schubert's "Fischermadchen" and Max Reger's "Wenn die Linde bluht" and in an encore from Delibes. There were two selections from Wagner—the "Dich theure Halle," from Tannhauser, which Mme. Fremstad sang, and the duet, "Zu neuen Thaten," from Gotterdammerung, with which Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin closed the problem. This duet was begun raggedly, but worked up finely to a very splendid conclusion.

Mme. Fremstad also sang two songs by Robert Franz—"Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen" and "Stille Sicherheit"—and Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau." Mr. Martin, in addition to numbers above named, sang Bimboni's "Sospiri miei," Dvorak's "Als die alte Mutter," Hue's "J'ai pleure en reve," "To Daisies," by Roger Quilter, and two pleasing songs by Chadwick—"Oh, let night speak of me," and "Before the Dawn."

HERALD, DECEMBER 30,

MME. FREMSTAD HERE

Gives Concert at Symphony Hall, with Riccardo Martin.

Symphony Hall was well filled yesterday afternoon at the concert of Mme. Olive Fremstad, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Riccardo Martin, tenor, of the same company. This was the program:

Songs—Sospiri miei, A. Bimboni; Als die alte Mutter, Dvorak; J'ai pleure en reve, Hue; Mr. Martin.

Aria, "Dich theure Halle" (Tannhaeuser), Wagner; Mme. Fremstad.

Songs—To Dasies, Roger Quilter; Oh, Let Night Speak of Me, Chadwick; Before the Dawn, Chadwick; Mr. Martin.

Songs—Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen, Robert Franz; Stille Sicherheit, Robert Franz; Fischermaedchen, Schubert; Wenn die Linde bluht, Max Reger; Es blinkt der Thau, Rubinstein; Mme. Fremstad.

Aria, "Vesti la Giubba" (Pagliacci), Leoncavallo; Mr. Martin.

Four Scandinavian songs—Saterjenten's Sondag, Ole Bull; a janta a ja, Swedish Folk-song; Med en Primula Veris, Grieg; Et Syn, Grieg; Mme. Fremstad.

Duet, "Zu neuen Thaten" (Goetterdaemmerung), Wagner; Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin.

The audience gave every evidence of keen satisfaction with the efforts of the singers, Mme. Fremstad rousing special enthusiasm with her four Scandinavian songs. In response to frequent recalls she sang other melodies of the northland, and finally sat down at the piano, accompanying herself as she gave another of those naively characteristic ditties. She introduced an innovation that her hearers highly appreciated by announcing the titles and composers of songs that she sang on recalls.

From an artistic point of view the most succcessful number on the program was [illegible] Mr. Martin was heard to the best advantage in the "Pagliacci" aria.

MONITOR, DECEMBER 30,

FREMSTAD-MARTIN RECITAL

Maybe it is because America has not yet any of that kind of music classed as folk songs that it appeals so greatly to an American audience. Such was the case yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall when Olive Fremstad and Riccardo Martin of the Metropolitan opera company gave a joint recital. Mme. Fremstad was on the program for a group of Swedish and Norwegian songs, to which she added another, sitting down at the piano and playing her own accompaniment in an informal sort of way that added to the effectiveness of the song.

Just a glance at certain Norwegians in the audience showed that Mme. Fremstad's art in these songs was convincing. The spirit of the music reached out to the audience, and though the words were to most of us unintelligible, the idea and feeling were plain. She was most likable in these songs. Her more ambitious numbers showed her range and power, her breath control and the varied qualities of her voice. A group of five songs brought the singer into the first intimate relations with her hearers. Her first number was the "Dich Theure Halle" from "Tannhaeuser," and the feeling of strangeness had not worn off sufficiently for her to do it justice.

Mr. Martin and Mme. Fremstad sang the last number, "Zu neuen Thaten" from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" together and called forth much applause by the rendition. Mr. Martin has been heard here and liked as visiting artist at the Boston opera house. His voice has a smoothness and ingratiating quality that is especially pleasing.

The program follows: "Sospiri miei," A. Bimboni; "Als die alte Mutter," Dvorak; "J'ai pleure en reve," Hue, Mr. Martin. Aria, "Dich theure Halle" (Tannhaeuser), Wagner, Madame Fremstad. "To Daisies," Roger Quilter; "Oh, let night speak of me," Chadwick; "Before the dawn," Chadwick, Mr. Martin. "Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen," Robert Franz; "Stille Sicherheit," Robert Franz; "Fischermadchen," Schubert; "Wenn die Linde bluht," Max Reger; "Es blinkt der Thau," Rubinstein, Madame Fremstad. Aria, "Vesti la Giubba" (Pagliacci), Leoncavallo, Mr. Martin. Scandinavian songs, "Saterjenten's Sondag," Ole Bull; "a janta a ja," Swedish folk-song; "Med en Primula Veris," Grieg; "Et Syn," Grieg, Madame Fremstad. Duet, "Zu neuen Thaten" (Goetterdaemmerung), Wagner, Madame Fremstad and Mr. Martin.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 30,

THE CONCERTS OF SUNDAY

CHORAL MUSIC AND TWO OPERA SINGERS

Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin in Songs and Operatic Fragments—Her Varied Skill and Accomplishment from Wagner to Folk-Pieces—The Changeless Tenor—Verdi's Requiem Mass at the Opera House in Creditable Performance—The Mighty Music

THE two Sunday concerts ran a contrasting course yesterday. At Symphony Hall, interest lay more in the singers—Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin of the Metropolitan—than in the songs and the operatic fragments that they sang. At the Opera House, it lay more in the music, Verdi's Requiem Mass, than in the singers. Almost alone among choral music of our time, the mass has established itself in the liking of the miscellaneous public, and in the admiration of those that judge as they hear. Once more, in creditable performance, it stirred one audience, while another was as engrossed in Mme. Fremstad's singing and as responsive to it.

Symphony Hall: Mme. Fremstad and Mr. Martin

TO transplant a singer from opera house to concert hall is not an easy task in musical and managerial horticulture. Of course, the transplanted are quite sure that they will flourish in the new soil even as they have in the old luxuriant operatic garden. Are not their voices always with them? May they not [illegible] their song? Is not their reputation like a fresh, life-giving wind blowing about them? Will not a public, the public of the hinterland that can hear them only seldom in opera flock to hear them in concert? They reason shrewdly, but the moment of difficulty, the moment of hesitation comes when they must decide what shoots and new leaves, as it were, they will put forth in their new environment. In other words, what shall they sing?

Being known and expected as singers of opera, they must bear operatic fragments into the concert-hall though there is only a piano to accompany them and though the histrionic action and the dramatic quality of the song be all in the tones of the singer. At the Metropolitan Opera House Mme. Fremstad sings most often and has made her largest reputation in the music-dramas of Wagner. She comes to Symphony Hall, as she did yesterday, and without an orchestra or any of the paraphernalia of the theatre sings Elisabeth's ecstatic salutation to the Hall of Song in "Tannhäuser" and Brünnhilde's farewell to Siegfried by the Valkyrs' rock in "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Martin comes with her and similarly elects to sing the monologue of Cánio, when all his little world in "Pagliacci" has gone previously black and red before his eyes. There must be songs, besides. Seemingly, Mr. Martin has not too many in his repertory; they are not too distinguished pieces and they tend to be sentimental. (The comfort was that Mr. Chadwick, the American, wrote quite the best of the six or eight that he sang yesterday.) Mme. Fremstad, however, though she goes seldom into the concert-hall, was in better case. She keeps her German songs by her still, and she could sing out of Franz, Schubert and Reger, and she has a store of Scandinavian folk-songs for the lighter and more playful artistry. So, between them, the two singers made a programme that was pleasantly diversified and that disclosed as many of their virtues as they could carry from stage to concert platform.

As for Mr. Martin, he is nearly the same singer in the concert hall that he is in the opera house, even to the contracted brows that make him seem almost always to be scowling, though he is really and obviously pleased at the applause he is receiving. Perhaps he sets his face so because he concentrates himself so closely upon all that he does. Seemingly, Mr. Martin would like always to be singing at the top of his powers, pouring out a big tone, sending it up and up in long sweeps, charging and recharging it with the emotions of the song or, in opera, of the character. Not willingly, is he gentle with his music, but when he is so, as he had to be in two or three pieces yesterday, his singing gives most pleasure. Then it has the charm of smooth phrasing, of unforced tone and pleasant sentiment. There is no throatiness or roughness in his voice as there almost always is when he tries to make his tone biggest and most expressive. Singing quietly and reflectively, he escapes the vocal faults that beset him when he tries to be most impassioned. With a voice of less natural power, with discretion to temper his temperamental zeal, he would have been a much more artistic and pleasurable singer than he actually is. With all his experience, he has never gone far in the finer ways of song nor turned aside from the easy and obvious effects of the theatre. Big tone, even if it is rough tone, has obsessed him.

The finer and the sharper was the contrast of Mme. Fremstad, mingling and differentiating, as she did yesterday, the arts of the "dramatic singer" of the opera house and the singer of pure and intimate song who at last had the grateful opportunity of the concert room. Gloveless and hatless, simple of dress, without a trace of the "grand manner"—or, as some say, the grand pose—she came as one who would sing intimately to the company about her, even though it was a numerous audience and though the room was the big and tunnel-like Symphony Hall. In this fashion, at ease in the corner of the piano, she sang her Scandinavian folk-tunes. One or two were light and playful, one or two fell away into melancholy, in nearly all the music had its under-note of wistfulness, its glint of the pale sunshine of the north that runs through this Scandinavian folk-song. Mme. Fremstad's artistry hid itself in these pieces. She phrased them as carefully as she had phrased the "art songs" that had preceded them; she was solicitous over the mood of each piece and the play of it in the coloring of her tones. She did not calculate and contrive simplicity. Yet a peasant girl, trooping gayly along the road under the spring leafage, or sitting in solitary musing, could hardly have sung the pieces more spontaneously, more sincerely —did she have the voice of Mme. Fremstad. Tone and mood were as one.

Matter and manner, end and means were as completely blended in the "art-songs." From the soft beauty of Franz's two songs of still and ecstatic mood, Mme. Fremstad turned as readily to the lyric lightness of her song from Schubert, to Reger, playful in spite of himself; to Rubinstein, all sentiment; to Delibes, all capricious fancy. There was not a hint of the opera house and its works in her singing of these songs. Instead were the niceties of delicate artistry, the refinements of intimate feeling, the imparting of the mood and not the making of the effect, the charm of the tone and the beauty of its shadings, and not the voice that is the voice of power. Then, of a sudden, came the magnificance of Mme. Fremstad's declamation of Brunnhilde's farewell, all splendor of tone and large intensity of feeling. Even in the concert-room and with a piano at her back, Brunnhilde farewelled Siegfried in high and devoted affection. As ecstatically, an hour before, the Elisabeth of "Tannhäuser" had sung her young ecstasies, as a vision released, at hand. Mme. Fremstad's Wagnerian singing has now the utmost of distinctions. There is deep and thrilling splendor in it.

H. T. P.

From JOURNAL

Address DEC 29 1912

THE musical event of the week will be the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening. Dr. Muck's illness, an attack of tonsilitis, has kept him from the orchestra for the past two or three weeks, and so the organization will be under the leadership of Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, who has wielded the baton with much success during Dr. Muck's absence. Mr. Urack was engaged by Dr. Muck in Berlin last summer to take the place of Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellos and to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. A man of 28, he had a most enviable reputation as 'cellist, conductor and composer and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is said by Boston critics to have discovered another young man who is going to make a name in the world. The work of the orchestra under him has been brilliant and his appearance here Tuesday night will have special interest for those who like to see new talent revealed.

Another debut here will be the first American appearance for this season of Elena Gerhardt, the German concert soprano, whose first American tour was made last year. Although German by birth and training, Miss Gerhardt has been brought up in the old Italian school and her numbers here will be an old Italian aria. She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the London conductor.

The programme will begin with Beethoven's eighth symphony. The second part will comprise the aria sung by Miss Gerhardt, Schumann's seldom heard but lovely overture to his opera, "Genoveva;" three songs by Richard Strauss, orchestrated by himself — "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia," and finally Glazounoff's pompous composition, "Ouverture Solennelle."

k, 1884

Otto Urack.

Who Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dr. Muck's Absence.

From

Address PROVIDENCE

Date DEC 29 1912

A lecture on the Boston Symphony programme will be given by Hans Schneider to-morrow evening in Manning Hall, Brown University, under the auspices of the Rhode Island Federation of Musical Clubs.

Estal 84

Elena Gerhardt.

Soloist This Week at Symphony Concert.

From

Address PROVIDENCE

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston Symphony Concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.

Dr. Muck, who has been ill for the past three weeks with a very severe attack of tonsilitis, is not yet sufficiently recovered to resume his work and, therefore, Providence will have the interesting experience of hearing the Symphony Orchestra at the concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who has made such a favorable impression in Boston with his conducting. Mr. Urack was engaged by Dr. Muck last summer take the place of Alwin Schroeder among the 'cellos and also to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. He is of German birth and Hungarian descent, is 28 years old, and has successively held the post of first 'cello in the orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, of solo 'cellist in the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth and has had much experience in conducting in the Lower Rhine cities. In Mr. Urack the Boston Symphony seems to have discovered a man of extraordinary talent if not of genius. Certainly the orchestra has played most brilliantly under him.

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer of songs whose first appearance in Providence this will be. Miss Gerhardt, who has just arrived in this country, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times, this being her first appearance in this capacity. Last year she came to America for the first time and made a profound impression in Boston, New York and other cities where she sang as a most skilled singer of concert music.

Es 1884

ELENA GERHARDT.

The programme is of more than ordinary interest. It begins with Beethoven's delightful Eighth Symphony. In the second part will come an old Italian aria to be sung by Miss Gerhardt; Schumann's rarely heard but ever lovely overture to "Genoveva;" three songs by Richard Strauss, orchestrated by himself, "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia" and finally Glazounoffs gorgeously pompous composition, the "Ouverture Solennelle."

From TIMES

Address: New York

Date

Boston has dicovered a new conductor. This is Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the last three weeks. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. He is but 28 years old.

Dr. Muck, however, has nearly recovered from his illness, and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. Mme. Matzenauer will be the soloist Tuesday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

Est 884

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date JAN 1 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Announcement of Orchestra Concert Program for Next Monday.

Owing to the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, from which, however, he has quite recovered, there has been a delay in announcing the program of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert is to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening with Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House as soloist. The program will comprise Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, which will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia; Brahm's "Academic Festival" Overture and Borodin's Second Symphony. Madame Matzenauer will sing the Sextus aria from Mozart's "Titus" and the "Abscheulicher" aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Es 1884

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established:

Elena Gerhardt Will Be Symphony Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its third concert in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 8, has been trying out its assistant conductor, Otto Urak, called suddenly to this desk by the illness of Dr. Muck. Once more Boston seems to have discovered a genius, for Mr. Urak, although a young man of only 28, has had extraordinary success at his concerts in Boston. Dr. Muck, however, will conduct the Baltimore concert as usual.

The soloist will be the distinguished German singer Elena Gerhardt, whose concerts last season were among the sensations of the winter in New York and Boston.

GRACE HARVARD
EMPIRE
ANN SWINBURNE
ACADEMY

From SUN

Address: New York

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston has had the pleasing sensation of having discovered a new conductor of extraordinary worth. This is Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the past three weeks. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. Although but 28 years old, he has given some very remarkable performances. The feeling is that the young man has a very remarkable future before him. Dr. Muck, however, is about recovered from his illness and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Madame Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

k, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Boston has had the pleasing sensation of having discovered a new conductor in Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsillitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the last three weeks. Mr. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. Dr. Muck, however, is about recovered

Establ

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York.

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston has discovered a new conductor of marked worth in Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during tae past three weeks. Although but twenty-eight years old, Urack has given some very remarkable performances, and the feeling is that the young man has a brilliant future before him.

Dr. Muck, however, has quite recovered from his illness and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Madame Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

Estab 34

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From JOURNAL

Address DEC 29 1912

THE musical event of the week will be the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening. Dr. Muck's illness, an attack of tonsilitis, has kept him from the orchestra for the past two or three weeks, and so the organization will be under the leadership of Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, who has wielded the baton with much success during Dr. Muck's absence. Mr. Urack was engaged by Dr. Muck in Berlin last summer to take the place of Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellos and to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. A man of 28, he had a most enviable reputation as 'cellist, conductor and composer and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is said by Boston critics to have discovered another young man who is going to make a name in the world. The work of the orchestra under him has been brilliant and his appearance here Tuesday night will have special interest for those who like to see new talent revealed.

Another debut here will be the first American appearance for this season of Elena Gerhardt, the German concert soprano, whose first American tour was made last year. Although German by birth and training, Miss Gerhardt has been brought up in the old Italian school and her numbers here will be an old Italian aria. She is a protege of Arthur Nikisch, the London conductor.

The programme will begin with Beethoven's eighth symphony. The second part will comprise the aria sung by Miss Gerhardt, Schumann's seldom heard but lovely overture to his opera, "Genoveva;" three songs by Richard Strauss, orchestrated by himself — "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia," and finally Glazounoff's pompous composition, "Ouverture Solennelle."

k, 1884

Otto Urack.
Who Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dr. Muck's Absence.

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date DEC 29 1912

A lecture on the Boston Symphony programme will be given by Hans Schneider to-morrow evening in Manning Hall, Brown University, under the auspices of the Rhode Island Federation of Musical Clubs.

Estal '84

Elena Gerhardt.
Soloist This Week at Symphony Concert.

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston Symphony Concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.

Dr. Muck, who has been ill for the past three weeks with a very severe attack of tonsilitis, is not yet sufficiently recovered to resume his work and, therefore, Providence will have the interesting experience of hearing the Symphony Orchestra at the concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who has made such a favorable impression in Boston with his conducting. Mr. Urack was engaged by Dr. Muck last summer to take the place of Alwin Schroeder among the 'cellos and also to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. He is of German birth and Hungarian descent, is 28 years old, and has successively held the post of first 'cello in the orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, of solo 'cellist in the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth and has had much experience in conducting in the Lower Rhine cities. In Mr. Urack the Boston Symphony seems to have discovered a man of extraordinary talent if not of genius. Certainly the orchestra has played most brilliantly under him.

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer of songs whose first appearance in Providence this will be. Miss Gerhardt, who has just arrived in this country, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times, this being her first appearance in this capacity. Last year she came to America for the first time and made a profound impression in Boston, New York and other cities where she sang as a most skilled singer of concert music.

Est 1884

ELENA GERHARDT.

The programme is of more than ordinary interest. It begins with Beethoven's delightful Eighth Symphony. In the second part will come an old Italian aria to be sung by Miss Gerhardt; Schumann's rarely heard but ever lovely overture to "Genoveva;" three songs by Richard Strauss, orchestrated by himself, "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia" and finally Glazounoffs gorgeously pompous composition, the "Ouverture Solennelle."

From TIMES

Address: New York

Date

Boston has dicovered a new conductor. This is Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the last three weeks. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. He is but 28 years old.

Dr. Muck, however, has nearly recovered from his illness, and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. Mme. Matzenauer will be the soloist Tuesday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

Est 884

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 1 1913

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Announcement of Orchestra Concert Program for Next Monday.

Owing to the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, from which, however, he has quite recovered, there has been a delay in announcing the program of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert is to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening with Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House as soloist. The program will comprise Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, which will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia; Brahm's "Academic Festival" Overture and Borodin's Second Symphony. Madame Matzenauer will sing the Sextus aria from Mozart's "Titus" and the "Abscheulicher" aria from Beethoven's "Fidello."

Es 1884

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established:

Elena Gerhardt Will Be Symphony Soloist

Boston Symphony Orchestra, ...ive its third concert in ...Wednesday even- ...ut its ...d ...of ...ms Mr. ...nly ...at ...uck, ...more ...uished ...hardt, were ...inter in

...ng.
John M.
...the Pas-
...uesday night.
...ng.
...COME.
E. CHURCH.
Harlem Park.
WRIGHT, Pastor.
...eting.
...ar's sermon by the Pastor.
...g by the Pastor; subject, of the World." Special music by the Temple Quartet, 2.30
-school missionary day program.
worth League. Tuesday, 10 to ...tch-night service. Wednesday,

GRACE HARVARD
EMPIRE
ANN SWINBURNE
ACADEMY

From SUN

Address: New York

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston has had the pleasing sensation of having discovered a new conductor of extraordinary worth. This is Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the past three weeks. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. Although but 28 years old, he has given some very remarkable performances. The feeling is that the young man has a very remarkable future before him. Dr. Muck, however, is about recovered from his illness and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Madame Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

k, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Boston has had the pleasing sensation of having discovered a new conductor in Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsillitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the last three weeks. Mr. Urack was engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder in the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. Dr. Muck, however, is about recovered

Establ

...the world

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York.

Date DEC 29 1912

Boston has discovered a new conductor of marked worth in Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the past three weeks. Although but twenty-eight years old, Urack has given some very remarkable performances, and the feeling is that the young man has a brilliant future before him.

Dr. Muck, however, has quite recovered from his illness and will conduct as usual the January concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Madame Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

Estab 34

TRAVELER HERALD,

JANUARY 4,

DR. MUCK AGAIN LEADS SYMPHONY

Elena Gerhardt Charms as Soloist; Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' Given.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

One of the most pleasing features about yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as gauged by the enthusiasm of the audience, was the reappearance of Dr. Muck at the conductor's stand. Evidently the orchestra shared the enthusiasm of the audience, for seldom have the players given such pleasure. Additional pleasure was afforded by the appearance of Mme. Elena Gerhardt as soloist. A third item and by no means least, the program was a happily chosen one, a trifle long, perhaps, but of such general excellence that few noticed its length.

Dr. Muck's illness has left no traces. He conducts with all his familiar grace and finish and gets a response from the players that no other conductor has been able to secure.

Mme. Gerhardt sang delightfully, ever giving her songs their true significance, always bearing in mind that the singer is to interpret the composer and not seek to improve upon his intentions. Would that other singers could sit at the foot of this artist and appreciate the real art of singing. Recall upon recall followed her numbers.

The hearing of the Holbrooke tone poem "Queen Mab" leads one to appreciate his skill in the employment of instruments rather than enthuse over his ability as a composer. Dr. Muck was thoroughly at home in the Brahms "Academic" overture and gave an exceptionally interesting reading of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7.

There will be no concerts the coming week, as the orchestra will be away on one of its trips.

MONITOR, JANUARY 4,

MISS GERHARDT WITH SYMPHONY

With Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano, as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its eleventh program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon before an audience that filled the house. The program was as follows: Brahms "Academic" overture, op. 80; arias with orchestra: Marcello, "Il mio bel foco;" Gluck, air from "Paris and Helen;" Holbrooke, "Queen Mab" poem (three movements), op. 45; Strauss, songs with orchestral accompaniment: "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Caecilie;" Bruckner, symphony in E major, No. 7.

Points in the program of unusual brilliancy were the singing of Miss Gerhardt in the two works of the eighteenth century opera school and the performance of the "Queen Mab" poem.

The praise of Miss Gerhardt's work may be summed up in the comment that the old formal music with all its repetitions kept going without monotony or drag to the end. This apparently negative merit of her performance is in point of fact a summary of many positive merits. For with every new phrase the singer invigorated the music with the emotion. Successive statements added to the original idea but gave notice of still more to be said. Thus the music progressed from point to point, fulfilling much but always promising more. And when the final cadence occurred the listener could well believe that the singer could tell a new and equally informing message, were she to repeat the aria from the beginning.

That word which terminated the third line of the Italian piece of versification and bore the heaviest rhythmic stress of the poem, kept returning with new vocal color, with the most delicate variations of syllabic accent. An element of speech was lifted by vocalization far above its everyday significance, exalted away beyond its meaning as an ordinary workaday verb in the future tense. Yet it was held steadfastly in the realm of the poetic; it was never forced over into the realm of the fantastic and absurd. Miss Gerhardt has found the secret of interpreting the eighteenth century music as surely as have the men of the Flonzaley quartet. This reader of German songs, this declaimer in the modern style, is one of the most successful artists in reviving the art of early opera singing who has approached the problem. With a vocal technique of perfect finish and with vocal coloring of the richest variety, she can [illegible] the writing of Marcello and of Gluck musically plausible with a generation that is beginning to put Wagne himself in the classic past.

The interpretation of "Queen Mab" was one of Dr. Muck's happy excursions into the modern field. He put this strange and attractive piece of music at once safely into the Symphony repertory. He made the work an expression of the hour, revealed it as a study of twentieth century society. He held his interpretation constantly in hand in that wonderful manner that characterizes him when he is at his best.

It was another Karl Muck who directed the Bruckner symphony. Either there was not sufficient practise time for mastering this ponderous work, or else Dr. Muck was carrying out some theory of artistic conservation and was not pushing his men to the best of their powers, or else he does not care for Bruckner. At all events he made a record of interpretation inferior to that which his predecessor, Max Fiedler, made with this symphony. The performance of Friday was perhaps the first in which Dr. Muck has fallen below Mr. Fiedler. His work must have recalled to many listeners the figure of the former conductor driving the Symphony battalions to success in this great piece, and doing so against the will of many an instrumentalist, too. The Fiedler enthusiasm for Bruckner was something by itself in the history of the orchestra.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

JANUARY 5,

Clara Butt and Mr Rumford at Symphony Hall Today

Reviewers of music in Boston will do well to treat with due respect the appearance of Mme Clara Butt, the English contralto, and Kennerley Rumford, the English baritone, at Symphony Hall this afternoon. Mr Rumford is the husband of the contralto. If he does not exceed her in hight, for she is a woman of stately and composing presence, he is nevertheless tall, muscular and athletic in build.

It may be recalled by some that Mme Butt sang at a concert in London Nov 27, 1909, and that because of his umbrage at the review of the same which appeared in the London Times, Mr Rumford boxed the critic's ears in the vestibule of Queen's Hall.

At this concert a new symphony by Dukas was coolly received. Mr Collis, the music critic of the paper commented as follows: "No doubt the apathy of the reception partly was due to the fact that the audience was largely made up of admirers of Mme Clara Butt, who are not generally interested in symphonies or other forms of serious music." The manager of the Times requested an apology of Mr Rumford for so summarilly taking justice into his own hands. The baritone replied that he "should not dream of apologizing to Mr Collis," that the critic's notice was "not criticism at all, but an impertinence."

It would appear to the aloof and dispassionate mind that Mr Rumford's uxorial chivalry was unduly excited to take offense at a notice of this character. If lines containing so mild an aspersion—if indeed any at all—are to him provocative of violence, it were well to ponder seriously any comment to be made upon the concert this afternoon. It might be the part of wisdom to withhold the notice until Tuesday morning, for it is said that Mr Rumford and his wife contemplate an extensive tour.

The ending of the original incident is not without interest. The case was called in a Police Court the Dec 14 following. The plaintiff's attorney stated that his client "deprecated the interpretation put upon the criticism complained of, which was not in any way meant to reflect upon Mme Butt's standing as a singer. Counsel for Mr Rumford accepted the statement, offered an apology for the incident in which Mr Rumford had assaulted the critic's ears as an athlete, and the case was withdrawn.

This tour is Mr Rumford's first visit to America. The baritone was born in London Sept 2, 1870. He has been a pupil of Henschel, Beume and Sfriglia. He made his debut in London in 1893. Mme Butt sang in Boston at the Symphony concerts of Oct 27 and 28, 1899, and appeared here in two recitals the following month. She was born in Southwick, near Brighton, Eng, Feb 1, 1873. She made her debut in London Dec 7, 1892, in Sullivan's "Golden Legend." She had a scholarship at the Royal College of Music in London, studied in Paris with Bouhy and in Berlin with Gerster. Elgar inscribed his "Sea Pictures" to her. She was married to Mr Rumford June 26, 1900. The pair have recently made a tour of Australia, where they sang to great and enthusiastic audiences.

The program of the concert this afternoon, beginning at 3:15, is as follows: Strauss, Allerseelen, Traum durch die Daemmerung; Grieg, Mit Einer Primula Veris, Zwei Braune Augen, Mit Einer Wasserlilie, Zur Johannisnacht; Mr Rumford; Handel, Rend'il Sereno, Lusinghe piu care; Brahms, Von ewiger Liebe; Schumann, Der Nussbaum; Schubert, Der Wanderer, Mme Butt; MacDowell, Thy Beaming Eyes; Parry, Why so Pale and Wan; Vaughan Williams, The Roadside Fire; arr by Stanford, The Gentle Maiden and Molleen Oge; Walford Davies, I Love the Jocund Dance, Mr Rumford; L'Angelus (old Breton air), Debussy, Mandoline; Graham Peel, The Early Morning; Raymond Loughboroug, Women of Inver; Franco Leoni, The Leaves and the Wind; S. Liddle, Abide with Me (by request, with organ and harp accompaniment) Mme Butt; Goring Thomas, duet, Night Hymn at Sea, Mme Butt and Mr Rumford.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 4.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK AGAIN, WITH A STRIKING PROGRAMME

Audience, Orchestra and Conductor—Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in Unusually Revealing Performance—Mr. Holbrook's Tone-Poem of Fantastic Imagination and Melodic Power—Miss Gerhardt Returns in Old Airs and Songs by Strauss—Brahms, the Interloper

THE Symphony Concerts almost began anew yesterday afternoon. It was a month and more since Dr. Muck had conducted at them, and the audience, realizing at last the difference that his absence makes in the amount and the quality of its pleasure, applauded him, when he took his place, quite as heartily as it did at the first concert of the year. If his face was still pale with an exhausting illness, not a trace of it dulled his alertness of mind and spirit toward his music or weakened his variously commanding hand over his men. In any and all circumstance the orchestra is a remarkable orchestra and it does not lack esprit de corps when its chief is absent; but it is one thing in sensuous quality of tone, plasticity of expression and instant responsiveness when he conducts it and another thing when he does not.

A notable new piece stood, moreover on the programme—Josef Holbrook's "Queen Mab," the first of his tone-poems or of any of his music in the larger forms to be performed in America. Not novel in chronological fact, but still novel to most ears was the symphony of the day—the seventh of Bruckner, the symphony of the dirge-like slow movement inspired by the faithful disciple's thought that even Wagner, like other mortals, must die. Learned exposition and zealous advocacy cannot do much for Bruckner's music. From the old Viennese days of the rivalry between the partisans of Brahms and Bruckner, men have argued long, loudly and vainly about it. The hearer either feels Bruckner's music—in spite of all the obstacles the composer has put in its way—sympathizes with it, even cherishes it. Or else he is quite deaf to it—and departs as many a hearer did yesterday at the first moment of escape from weariness of listening and futility of impression. Bruckner's symphonies exact an alternately submissive and responsive state of mind in those that hear them. Audiences must be schooled to them, and so the conductors, like Dr. Muck, who "hold by" Bruckner, play one of them annually. When they are as eloquent and revealing as Dr. Muck, the schooling is often pleasure. Finally, the "assisting artist" was of the first rank in her kind—not too frequent an experience in the Symphony Concerts of the current season—Miss Gerhardt, the singer of songs and concert-pieces, in the full possession of her powers. And so, a concert two hours and ten minutes long did not seem tedious, except to the deaf to Bruckner, and applause flowed plentifully, especially for the singer and for Mr. Holbrook's piece.

If ever two composers were remote from each other, it is the simple-souled and highly emotional Bruckner and the sophisticated and "cerebral" Strauss. Yet in one respect they are akin: discussion of their technical procedure only darkens understanding and appreciation of their music. Debate the methods of Strauss, and the debaters soon lose all sense of the substance, the passion, the picture, the expressive qualities of his music in a welter of details of polyphony, harmony and instrumental combinations. Discuss the technical procedure of Bruckner, and soon all concerned are standing about the chosen symphony like the anatomists in Rembrandt's picture, while one of their number is dissecting "inversions," "imitations," "characteristic counterpoint," "great crescendi" and the like. Meanwhile the symphony lies lifeless—body and soul. None so hinder appreciation of Bruckner's music as the devoted analysts of it. None so foster that appreciation as conductors who, like Dr. Muck, make their hearers forget form and manner in revelation of the music as singular and rare emotion in tones.

For Bruckner welled with feeling so intense that he seems always to be strugging for full utterance of it. Consider the slow movement of this seventh symphony, the Adagio of the tenor tubas, inspired by grieving thought of Wagner's mortality—an anticipatory requiem, as it were, with its reiterated melody of deep and solemn lamentation and its answering melody, as of memory that cherishes, though it mourn. To what lengths of dirge-like song does not Bruckner carry his lamentation, and how at every repetition he deepens and solemnizes it by every instrumental voice, by every means of tonality and harmony that he can command. He would mourn as with the grief of a lamenting universe, finding voice in his tones. Across all this grave and insistent majesty of lamentation runs the other melody of intimate consolation of the heart that forgets its grief as it cherishes and idealizes a memory. With the gentlest of hands, in instrumental and harmonic device, Bruckner irradiates its gentle intensities. He does not even suspect his lengths of utterance, his mannerisms of means, in the effort to fill his music with the feeling that floods so full in him. Sometimes, as by a flash of inspiration, he attains his goal, and the heart that listens—for the heart and not the mind hears Bruckner—swells or melts with the music. Faltering or attaining, it is all emotion, and the conductor best reveals it when, as Dr. Muck did, he makes this emotion overwhelm all other sensations.

It is the custom to label Bruckner's Scherzi boisterous, rushing rudely along to prancing rhythms and abrupt and clanging instrumental voices. They do sound so; but what is this sounding but the bounding quest for another sort of intensity, for the release to the utmost of another sort of feeling? It was not in Bruckner's temperament to imagine the light, flickering, fantastic, sophisticated Scherzi contrived by many a contemporary symphonist. He must be robust, rugged, forthright, but always to his utmost of feeling in its kind. The discerning conductor, like Dr. Muck, lets him stamp about and clang about to his fill, and then sets Bruckner down to tranquil song that in this particular Scherzo of the seventh symphony is soft and plaintive, half sun-lit, half shadowed, but all feeling. Up go the "great crescendi" of the first Allegro and the Finale, around come the "inversions"; here is Bruckner taking breath in contrapuntal "imitation"; there he is breaking off abruptly and starting afresh as one who had found a new trail through a jungle of structural bewilderment. Heard so, the music wearies, exasperates. But heard as so much emotion struggling to release itself to the utmost, it begins to have a passion of its own — a passion of intense longing and heroic resolution. It becomes, in spite of all its gropings and stammerings the quest of an ideal beauty and intensity in tones. The radiant vision possesses Bruckner's soul. He cannot think of it or measure it because he feels it so deeply. He stumbles about, waiting for the heavens to open, conjuring them by every magic of modulation and instrumentation in his power. The skies part; for an instant he gains his beauty, ideal, ineffable, like that of no other music. And then he gropes again. Almost eye to eye, and heart to heart with Bruckner. Dr. Muck seemed to see and feel these visions. It was as though he made the orchestra the body of Bruckner's spirit.

Mr. Holbrook's tone-poem required no state of listening mind and no attuned sympathies. What he wishes to do in "Queen Mab," what he can do and the means by which he does it, seem clear enough and make readily the desired impression. As almost always with Mr. Holbrook's music, there is a literary source behind—Mercutio's speech about Queen Mab in the first act of "Romeo and Juliet." She comes in dreams, elf-life, fantastic, prankish. She piti-pats across the sleeping lover's brain and deep are his dreams of love. She tickles the sleeping soldier, and he wars in sleep-chasings and half-wakes in muttering nightmare. Day and life come again, tear these night-whimsies to tatters, whistle and whirl them away.

Accordingly "Queen Mab" begins darkly, mysteriously, tremulously. The music sounds uncanny, shivery. Suspense is in it. Then out of it twitches the fairy of dreams, teetering along her lightsome way. The music is of prankish fantasy. Quickly Mab is in the lover's brain and the music expands into deep and flowing song, a rich and flooding melody, richly amplified. It is Straussian in its breadth of curve, its sustained and mounting intensity, its irresistible suspense. But never is it quite a love song of human voice in the warmth and brightness of day. It is a love-song of dream, unreal and uncanny, that now and again almost flickers away until Mab recalls it. She frets its rhythms, flecks its tonal colors, has her sport with it, until she is content to let it rise in great climax to possess the lover's soul. . . . And now she slips away to the soldier and again his music is music of sleep-chasings. To and fro in his dream he goes in fantastic marchings, hears trumpets grotesquely clanging, awakes with a start and a squeak. To the lover's music of mystery, succeeds the soldier's music of bizarrerie. There is pause and then Mr. Holbrook wreaks himself upon his orchestra. He tears his night-visions to tatters and blows them helter-skelter away. The music ends as in a great gust of clear, bright air.

The tone-poem affirms much of Mr. Holbrook, even though now in his rather sterile and freakish thirties, he is hardly the composer that he seemed in the twenties of "Queen Mab," the sets of variations and the pieces after Poe. It affirms the invention that can—or could—pour forth spontaneously and surely such a flooding, possessing, transporting melody as that of the lover's dream. The ear bathes luxuriously in it; the imagination thrills to it; the sheer sweep and intensity of it are magnificent to hear. The bigness of the handling (as the painters say) matches the bigness of the melody. Invention is a tame word for the creative faculty behind. Again "Queen Mab" affirms unusual qualities in Mr. Holbrook's imagination. Until, at the end, he tears to shreds the whole fabric of dream and whimsey the music is of sleep-chasings, night-visions, prankish fantasy, unreal, uncanny, of the slumber in which the human faculties are inert or else perverse and distorted as in the haunting phrase of the soldier's dream. Mr. Holbrook knows and can put into tones the mystery and the freakishness of night and sleep, dream and half-wakings. They are normal to him who writes, abnormal to us that listen. Only at the end does he fall away into freakish sound and fury. Furthermore, he is precocious master of the rhetoric of music. Whatever he would say, he says vividly and surely in telling stroke. The apt harmony, the enforcing rhythm, the eloquent instrumental timbre, the pointing figure, the tingling suspense or the long outspread climax are at his command. Mr. Holbrook's sheer sureness and spontaneity with such intricate music are overwhelming. His command of musical rhetoric is as freakish as the uncanny range of his musical imagination. He seems a kind of Poe in tones—by which token it is unwise to search his music too deeply.

Beside Bruckner and Holbrook, Brahms's "Academic Overture" and the two eighteenth-century airs and the three songs by Strauss that Miss Gerhardt sang seemed strangely tranquil music. Marcello's music in one of those airs seemed pure line, flowing from serene phrase to serene phrase, warmed by the singer's tones, speaking its longing gravely, chastely. The music, by the token of the words, was about emotion, but it had none save in its own beauty and the beauty of Miss Gerhardt's tones. She sustained them artfully in long-breathed periods. She never over-colored them. Music of line still was the succeeding air from Gluck's "Paris and Helen," but of more varied line, touched with warmer feeling. The beauty was softer, tenderer, more human, alike in the music and in the singer's tones. Gluck had the secret of these melodies of gentle longing and of the artfully simple accompaniment that seems to echo them wistfully. The soft richness of Miss Gerhardt's half-voice, her sense of sustained song and sustained mood, her justness of style meet such music halfway.

So far the singer had subdued the sensuous depth and glow that she can summon in her tones, but next she could let them flood through the vague erotic vision of Strauss's "Morgen" or the mother's caressing of her dream rather than her child in his "Wiegenlied." These are songs of static and ecstatic mood, low-voiced and deep-voiced. Miss Gerhardt's tones and temperament are at one with them. They keep clear of her limitations of voice, as she kept clear yesterday of her occasional shortcomings in song. But the streaming, climacteric passion of "Cäcilie" and its whirl and heat of phrase are not for her voice or her imagination. She could bring it off but lamely. Outside that ill-chosen piece, it is hard to remember when she has sung here with such richness of tone, discerning artistry and freedom from vocal flaw.

And what did Brahms do in this galley, freighted so heavily with the aspiring, uncertain and magniloquent Bruckner; the big, bizarre and restless Holbrook modulating at every breath; the Strauss of these ecstatic, sensuous, nervous melodies; the grave and tender men of the eighteenth century, singing their relatively simple and serene song? Perhaps he was there with his "Academic Overture," because it was so different from the other pieces—homely with its student tunes, usual in its choice and treatment of them, easily formal and workmanlike throughout, good-naturedly human, self-possessed music, doing its job well—the golden mean with which to begin the concert on an even keel. Beginning temperately with it, Dr. Muck led it in long, clear, supple crescendo to its stately and sonorous end. H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,
JANUARY 4.

ELENA GERHARDT AT THE SYMPHONY

NOT AT HER BEST IN ITALIAN NUMBERS

Dr. Muck, Well on Way to Recovery, Leads in an Exhaustive Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—"Academic" Overture.
Marcello—Aria, "Quella Fiamma."
Gluck—Aria, "O del mio Dolce ardor."
Soloist, Miss Elena Gerhardt.
Holbrooke—Symphonic Poem. "Queen Mab."
Richard Strauss—Three Songs with Orchestral accompaniment. Miss Gerhardt.
Bruckner—Symphony No. 7.

The reappearance of Dr. Muck from his tonsilitian sick-bed was hailed with much applause, and it was also signalized by a programme of most ambitious and modern character grandly carried out. Josef Holbrooke was, on this occasion, introduced to a Boston audience. We doubt whether the acquaintance is to be altogether a pleasant one. We recall a "Queen Mab," written by one Berlioz, which presented Shakespeare's tricksy fairy in more attractive guise. Holbrooke has immersed himself in the stream of ultra-modern bizarrerrie and has introduced everything from concertinas and real bells to colored lights, in his symphonic poems. He is a type of modern eccentricity, of that restlessness that is ever seeking and never finding much that is worth while. We are flattered that he tends towards American poets in his choice of subjects, even if we sometimes object to the manner in which he treats them.

"Queen Mab" is, of course, scored for a very heavy orchestra. Your true modern demands more than a hundred musicians to picture the hum of a mosquito or the dream of a fairy. But we must add that he uses this large orchestra with great skill, and gives tone-coloring that ranks him even with Strauss. The tinkling Glockenspiel passages and even the Xylophone obbligato were effective. The picture of lover's dreams had some beauty, and the martial effects spoken of by Shakespeare were the best of all, even if there was kinship to "Tristan and Isolde" in the first and close relationship to "Till Eulenspiegei" in the last-named—in the odd augmented intervals of the trumpet figure.

The fourth division (for chorus) was omitted, this having the composer's sanction. In the dainty touches of the Shakespearian picture, Berlioz has done infinitely better than Holbrooke. The performance was something superb, and we advise Mr. Holbrooke to come to Boston to hear his tone-poem at its very best. No wonder that it won great applause even though many may have been mystified by some of

(Continu

Elena Gerhardt is a true artist. She does not endeavor to put more into a song than the composer dreamed of; she does not exaggerate or distort. Yesterday's rehearsal proved that she has more strings to her bow than merely the German Lieder, in which she was heard here before, for her singing of the Old Italian school was an exhibition of that broad legato which is seldom called upon in Lied-singing. Yet we are obliged to say that she was not at her best in the old Italian numbers, and "O del mio dolce ardor" lacked the true "Conto Spianato" which many of its phases demand. In the Strauss "Lieder," however, her foot (or her larynx) was on its native heath, and she sang gloriously. It was a treat to hear "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilia" with orchestra, even though the modulations of the Cradle Song suggested a Boston babe, brought up on Browning and Emerson. Miss Gerhardt's "Lieder" aroused very great enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck seldom gives us the modern intoxicants in music but what he immediately hands us an antidote. On this occasion the corrective to Josef Holbrooke was Johannes Brahms and was administered before the more indigestible number. The "Academic Overture" shows that even the phlegmatic Brahms had his vein of humor. How those student's songs ring out! What a mock-serious to do the bassoons make over the "Fuchslied" which every German student has roared out to the words of "What comes there from above?" In the domain of figure development we consider Brahms the equal of Beethoven. Had his emotional power only balanced his intellectual prowess he would rank beside any of the masters. But, as already intimated, his serenity forms a good contrast to the everlasting effort and excitement of the radicals in music. The overture was much appreciated. When the American composer tries to write a college symphony, he will have more trouble than Brahms had, for one of his themes is of the loftiest description, yet is actual students' music. The "piece de resistance" of the afternoon was, of course, the Bruckner symphony. It is not new to Boston, Gericke and Fiedler, and Dr. Muck himself having given it before. The work belongs to the Brahms category in spite of the fact that Brahms belittled Bruckner. There is the same ease in the handling of figures, the same wonderful power of development. But Brahms is more melodic than Bruckner. It is musician's music. We doubt whether any auditor can grasp all of the augmentations, inversions, diminutions, expansions and contractions of the figures which Bruckner spins out so easily. One can see many things in the score that do not reach the ear.

Dr. Muck read the first movement in a manner that made many things clear that were but muddy before. To interest a general audience in such a complicated movement is a seeming impossibility, yet it was accomplished. The symphony was, however, a heavy task to the average auditor, coming after the intricacies of Holbrooke, and there was a marked exodus before the end.

The second movement is the tribute to Wagner, although it has been debated as to whether Bruckner thought of Wagner when he first sketched out this movement. Grandeur and sweetness are here in contrast, and the solemnity is in vivid contrast with such emotional wailing as one gets in Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. It is a most lofty movement even if many, from Brahms down to the Symphony girl cannot understand it.

In the Scherzo there is an omnipresent trumpet theme of six notes which is somewhat akin to Richard Strauss's use of the trumpet in "Also sprach Zarathustra." It ends in an exciting gallop and is the most vehement part of the symphony. The trumpeters had their work to do and deserve credit for the way in which they did it. The tempo here might have been a trifle quicker to advantage.

On the whole we like the Scherzo as being the most intelligible, but we rank the Adagio as a masterpiece. Bruckner is not ugly, in the sense that D'Indy becomes crabbed in his intricate moods, but his ability to "develop" figures leads him too far. The symphony is too long, and, coming at the end of a programme that was considerably over two hours in length, it became too much of a task to unravel. During the Finale, when figures were juggled about with phenomenal skill, we found ourselves wishing that Bruckner had been less of a contrapuntist; he might then have been a more pleasing composer. In tone-coloring we do not find Bruckner much better than Brahms or even Schumann. Some of the experimental combinations do not please, and there is a degree of reiteration that only a genius can allow himself.

Such a concert was an exhausting test for a man just recovering from an illness, but Dr. Muck carried out the herculean task in a manner that went far to prove that he is no longer an invalid. Mr. Urack has not been as spirited as arrack, but we cannot expect a Dr. Muck to grow on every bush. Boston is happy in the recovery of its great conductor.

GLOBE
JANUARY 4,

HOLBROOKE'S TONE POEM IMPRESSIVE

"Queen Mab" Shows Marked Creative Gift.

Miss Gerhardt Sings Gluck Aria and Songs—Bruckner Played.

Dr Muck reappeared as conductor at the 11th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, after his absence of three weeks through illness, and received a spontaneous and hearty welcome. The length of the program was unusual, being well over two hours to the conclusion of the Bruckner symphony.

Josef Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" was played for the first time in Boston. It is entitled "Poem No. 7 for grand orchestra and chorus (ad lib) op 45." Holbrooke's name appeared for the first time on a Symphony program; indeed, this is apparently the first of his music to be heard in this city, although he has composed songs and has shown a fancy of late for chamber music in the unusual combinations for wind instruments which are cultivated by the Longy Club.

Those who heard the brilliant performance of the new work yesterday afternoon should be eager to hear more of the music of this gifted young Englishman. It is one of the half dozen most interesting novelties played at these concerts in recent seasons. It has a note of arresting, dominating originality, not a species of nervous eccentricity, but of impressive individuality of thought. There are evidences of a vital and spontaneous imagination, and at times of something akin to genius.

Holbrooke is now 32. He began this piece 10 years ago. It is said that his opera, "Children of Don," written to the libretto of Lord Howard de Walden, which Mr Hammerstein produced in London last June, shows that the composer has fallen under the spell of the unwieldly and extraneous orchestral apparatus in common with other young men of this epoch, and has sacrificed clarity and beauty to a turgid and inflated speech.

If this be the result of the annual subsidy now granted him by the Lord de Walden, and the necessity of providing a musical setting for the profound mythology of his librettos, it belies his promise of a decade ago. Ernest Newman, whose patriotism as a British seer of music has sanity as well as enthusiasm, then praised him warmly, even unqualifiedly, naming him as the rising star of Briton, and appointing him an ultimate seat with the immortals.

Holbrooke's boyhood was one of privation. Betwen the ages of 14 and 17 he studied at the Royal Academy in London, where his teachers discovered budding heresy in his compositions. Then he had to earn his own living. He "arranged" band parts for a traveling company. He played piano in an orchestra of three, which dwindled to himself alone, until he was supplanted by an actor, who it was discovered could play. Holbrooke went to see Sir August Manns, who had shown an interest in him, and later proved it by producing at Crystal Palace his tone poem, "The Raven."

The morbidity of Poe has found a peculiar correlation in Holbrooke's mentality. Others of the tales have been taken by him as a program for his tone poems, for the basic inspiration of a text appears a necessary creative impulse to him, even as Mercutio's fanciful lines upon Queen Mab have called forth the novelty of yesterday.

For a young man of 24 this score shows surprising maturity of mind in creative faculty, in continuity and coherence of development and in technical acquaintance with the orchestra. There are passages that in character remind of Berlioz, and others in which the profile of phrases from "Tristan" may be traced, but a salient impression of the work is its well-defined individuality in authorship.

It is true there are meager passages, those in which the musical idea seems unduly expanded, or of feeble propulsive power, either through lack of vitality, contrast or of contrapuntal embellishment, but these are few in number compared to others which are rich in fertility, which declare a creative gift quite uncommon among the men of Holbrooke's nationality, and a skill of no mean order in graphic and illuminating characterization.

There are three movements, the last two to be played without interruption. The first, which typifies the caprices of Shakspere's sprite, has character and atmosphere. The slow movement, which celebrates the amorous dreams, contains appropriately poetic sentiment without the sentimentality of youth. The approach to the last movement, which discourses of the soldier's dreams of ambuscade and battle, is amazing in its quiet, dramatic significance.

The music for chorus, omitted yesterday, which takes up the lovely theme announced at the beginning of the slow movement, has some interesting material. The occasion again points the need for a choral body available for collaboration with the orchestra in such concerts.

The last pages are superb in their sheer abandon. Wildly fantastic in the most rhapsodical spirit of fantasy, they lead the hearer on at a furious pace, trapping him in several moments of surprise and suspense, only to end with the more breath-taking exhilaration. Holbrooke's rhythmic formula here makes an unceasing nervous bombardment. Dr Muck and the orchestra gave a brilliant performance, replete both with emotional sensibility and with virtuosity.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, as soloist, sang the recitative and aria "Quella fiamma," by Benedetto Marcello; the aria of Paride from the first act of Gluck's "Paride ed Elena," and these songs by Strauss, with orchestra; "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Gaecilie." Unfortunately the rare beauty of part of Miss Gerhardt's singing was marred by mannerisms, by the pose of abstraction which she affects when immersed in serious thought and by the unnecessarily audible labor accompanying her breathing.

Marcello's air from the early part of the 18th century is interesting historically, but without great significance, nor is it well suited to the singer. Gluck's noble aria on the contrary was sung with admirable repose and with just regard for the long sustained curve of its phrases. Mr Longy's art added pleasure to the number. The orchestration of songs, often detrimental to their atmosphere, is happily written in the case of these by Strauss, unless exception be made to the "Caecilie," whose exultant lyricism speaks more direct from the piano. Miss Gerhardt exhibited again her remarkable purity of tone, her great skill in mezza voce, with the most artistic effect in the "Morgen" and the cradle song. Both were sung with a superior vocalism employed to express exquisite sentiment. The singer was enthusiastically applauded.

Bruckner's seventh symphony, which closed and unduly prolonged the program, again compels wonder that any man could combine pages which contain the beauty and impressiveness of certain of those in the slow movement and parts of the first with others of such emptiness and bombast. The inherent commonness [illegible]

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 4,

BIG WELCOME TO DR. MUCK

Notable Programme Delights Audience

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Dr. Muck stepped on the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, at the 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, his welcome, after his prolonged illness, must have left him no doubt of the attitude of his Boston audiences. In the applause that was sustained for several minutes there was an unmistakable and contagious warmth.

The programme was a notable one. Mme. Elena Gerhard was the soloist, and there are few more accomplished concert singers now before the public. Josef Holbrooke's "Queen Mab," after Shakspere, "Poem No. 7, for grand orchestra and chorus ad libitum, op. 45," was performed for the first time here. There was also Bruckner's seventh symphony, and Brahms' "Academic" overture—glorious music, most brilliantly played.

Josef Holbrooke is one of the ringleaders, let us say, of the modern English school. This school numbers among its members several young men who have at least wandered far out of the beaten track in their efforts to find expression of themselves. Mr. Holbrooke is the subject of a nearly hysterical eulogy by Ernest Newman, highly esteemed as a music critic in several continents. His life has been a checkered one. He has written many tone-poems for orchestra, and has been especially attracted by the writings of Edgar Allan Poe. His opera, "Children of the Don," libretto by Lord Howard de Waldron, Mr. Holbrooke's patron, was a failure when given recently by Mr. Hammerstein in London. Mr. Holbrooke, among other things, is the composer of an "Illuminated symphony," a sort of musical commentary, we gather, upon a series of "pictorial impressions," which were thrown upon a screen, eight lines at a time, while the music, including a choral epilogue, was played. This was on Jan. 20, 1908, in Queen's Hall, London.

The piece played yesterday was produced when the composer was in his 24th year. It is probably not one of Mr. Holbrooke's most mature expressions. It has, however, unmistakable individuality. It gives evidence not only of an individual attitude but of an individual musical talent. If it were only the work of one who had successfully gotten away from the beaten path it would have a certain value, for the sincerity of the composer is hardly to be doubted. But there are in the piece pages of real, living beauty. It is a singular compound of beautiful ideas and themes which are, in themselves, unfortunately commonplace.

Suggestion of Berlioz

The instrumentation is always interesting. It reminds one somewhat of Berlioz. The opening is Puck-like, with an undistinguished motive played by certain wood wind instruments.

It is in the middle section—the slow movement, or division—that the composer distinguishes himself, writing with real imagination and charm, and with no mean degree of workmanship. And this is, thematically, the most original portion of the work. After this, there is thought of the fairy "when she driveth over a soldier's neck," and the music becomes bombastic and merely physical in its character. There is vigor which is as the pounding of a prizefighter. We do not like Mr. Holbrooke in this mood. While we believe that battle and rebellion may well be incorporated in the four walls of a symphony, we do not believe in banality and a poorly disguised lack of real ideas.

Later, a figure given to a trumpet is tossed back and forth through the orchestra, a figure which proves to have close relation with a longer theme, and which is variously employed. It is ingenious, but it is too much of one good thing. We should like to hear more of Mr. Holbrooke's music. We should like to hear this piece again. We do not feel that this music justifies the hysterical praise of Mr. Newman, but it is good to know that the production of the modern English school is not confined to the middle class music of Sir Edward Elgar; that there are young men in Great Britain with something to say, and a manner of their own in its saying.

Old Italian and Strauss

Mme. Gerhard sang old Italian music—for surely the aria of Paris from Gluck's "Paris and Helen" is as Italian music as the fine old recitative "Il mio bel foco" and aria "Quella Fiamma" of Marcello, a composer of the 18th century—she sang this music with admirable appreciation of its grand and classic style, and in Gluck's music, especially, did splendid justice to the long, noble phrases.

Mme. Gerhard was at her best in the songs of Strauss. The "Morgen" and "Weigenlied," wonderful in their simplicity, will not be easily forgotten by those who listened. Their interpretation was an example of supreme art. So much was said, and with such apparent simplicity and lack of effort. Diction and phrasing were here beyond praise. The passionate song, "Cacilie," has been [illegible] in a more strenuous [illegible] climax, yet [illegible] hardly have been more effective if Mme. Gerhard had resorted to these methods. Her performance was a pleasure from first to last. It is rare indeed to meet with such a singer of such music.

Dr. Muck had devoted infinite pains to Bruckner's symphony. It is to be regretted that the hour was such that some of his hearers, unfortunately, by choice, and others, more unfortunately, necessity, quitted the hall before the work had been finished. But of these individuals the conductor was little aware. He was absorbed in his task. It is a great dispensation of providence that a composer such as Bruckner should find such a profoundly sympathetic interpreter. All that could be done with this symphony was done. The two middle movements are the nucleus of the work. The andante is noble and exalted past expression. The scherzo is characteristic of the composer, very vigorous, boisterous in its humor, then exceedingly poetic in an almost idyllic vein. This scherzo, like other movements of Bruckner, smells gratefully of the sod. Both the first and the last movements are uneven, halting, lacking in truly continuous development, and great ideas, more especially in the final movement, go to waste as you listen.

TIMES,
JANUARY 1,
PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN THIRD CONCERT

Symphony Players and Miss Elena Garhardt Please Audience at Infantry Hall.

Another large audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, when the third concert of the season was played in Infantry Hall, Providence. It was a concert with several marked features, with a programme potent with the power to attract, even on a night when the clink and tinkle, the boom and blare of New Year festivities constitute the music that is eagerly sought by millions.

Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93.......
..............................Beethoven
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Old Italian Arias..........Marcello-Gluck
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81........
..............................Schumann
Three Songs with Orchestra......Strauss
"Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Cacile."
Ouverture Solennelle, Op. 73...Glazounoff

To begin with, the audience read a note at the foot of the programme announcing that, owing to the illness of Dr. Karl Muck the orchestra would be conducted by Otto Urack, the assistant conductor. This was no surprise to those who have heard or read of the recent Boston concerts, which Mr. Urack has been conducting with success. The surprise came, however, when he appeared on the platform, and the audience greeted a slender, boyish looking young man, probably the the most youthful, in appearance at least, of the conductors who have led symphony orchestras in this city for many years.

It was evident from the first, however, that the audience was in the presence of an artist of power and discrimination. He dominated the orchestra with the authority of a seasoned conductor, and his interpretation of the Beethoven symphony was heartily indorsed by the most discriminating of his hearers.

This symphony, the eighth, is unfamiliar to most local concert goers. In comparison with some of the greater Beethoven works it is short and at times light, but never weak or frail. It was played with a dash and brilliance worthy of the best traditions of the Boston Orchestra, and it would hardly be expected that even with a master such as Dr. Muck or Max Fiedler at the helm better work would have been done.

The "Genoveva" overture by Schumann and the work by Glazounoff were also rendered in excellent style, the young conductor displaying a fire and enthusiasm in the final number that had a compelling influence on the players.

Miss Gerhardt thoroughly pleased the audience with her sweet, beautifully rendered songs. Her voice is of flawless quality and of sufficient power for the work in hand. The Strauss group, especially the "Wiegenlied," a true lullaby, were finely rendered. A return of this artist will be welcome to all who heard her last evening.

The fourth concert will be played on the evening of Feb. 4, and the soloist will be Norman Wilks, a newcomer on his first visit to America. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist.

JOURNAL—
JANUARY 4.

Four Features Mark the Symphony Concert

ELENA GERHARDT.
German lieder singer, this week's Symphony soloist.

Four features, everyone of them carrying its own importance, mark this week's symphony concerts, the first of which was given yesterday afternoon.

First and foremost comes the return of Dr. Muck, after three weeks' absence; and, as a result, yesterday the great orchestra was itself again. An attack of tonsilitis, suffered by so authoritative a conductor, is bound to lead to general orchestral debility. Dr. Muck got a very friendly greeting when he came out yesterday.

Second among the features is the return of Elena Gerhardt, the famous German lieder singer, who has braved the turbulent Atlantic especially to sing with the Symphony Orchestra, and two weeks hence at the popular Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall. Her contributions to this week's program consist of two old bel canto pieces, a recitative, "Il mio bel foco" and an air, "Quella flamma," by Marcello, and Paris's air, "O, del mio dolce ardor," from Gluck's opera, "Paris and Helen;" also three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Miss Gerhardt's singing is remarkable for its vocal beauty and eloquent expression.

The third feature of the program is the first performances here of the "Queen Mab" tone poem, composed by an Edgar Allan Poe sort of Englishman, Josef Holbrook. These tone pictures illustrate quotations from Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The work was written ten years ago, when Holbrook gave promise of rivaling Strauss or at least Laparra, but it is said that his later works show little more than freakishness. This tone poem has extraordinary moments. The battle picture in the third reel of this cinematograph composition is particularly hair-raising. The orchestra played the alternately jumping, thumping, droning, dreaming music with a brilliancy all its own.

The fourth and final feature is the titanic "Romantic" symphony No. 7, by Bruckner, with the renowned adagio or Wagnerian dirge.

"Brahms's "Academic Overture" is also on the program, and it is decidedly superfluous.

HERALD,
JANUARY 4.

DR. MUCK LEADS THE REHEARSAL

Effective Reading of Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

BRILLIANT TONE POEM GIVEN

"Queen Mab" by Holbrooke Is Brightly Colored—Elena Gerhardt Sings.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted after an absence of three weeks. The program was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture.......Brahms
"Il mio bel foco"....................Marcello
"O del mio dolce ardor"..........Gluck
"Queen Mab" (Shakespeare) Poem No. 7,
Holbrooke
Songs with orchestra: "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," Caecilie"..............R. Strauss Symphony No. 7 ("Romantic")..Bruckner

Dr. Muck was heartily welcomed. He received the tribute with his customary modesty and then gave the most effective reading of Brahms's overture that has been heard here during the last [illegible] years; it was so exquisitely proportioned, so clean cut in thematic exposition and [illegible] rhythmed, [illegible] say that the performance was in the spirit of the German university, suggesting scholastic dignity with the joviality and comradeship of student life.

Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" was played for the first time in Boston, and probably for the first time in the United States. This singularly original and fertile composer is almost wholly unknown here except by name and foreign report. Miss Goodson played his etude Fantastique for the piano a few years ago, but his many orchestral pieces and chamber music are as a sealed book. From the catalogue of his works it appears that he has been greatly influenced by Poe; but he has also been moved to write music by Wordsworth, Longfellow, Byron, Keats, Vaughan, Shelley, Emerson, and even Mrs. Hemans!

"Queen Mab" was of course suggested by Mercutio's speech, which fired the fancy of Berlioz and led Gounod to write pages which usually fall flat when sung by the baritone in "Romeo and Juliet." Holbrooke quotes the opening lines; the description of Mab galloping through lovers' brains and then driving o'er a soldier's neck. These three sections are connected, and there is a choral epilogue, "Arise, fair sun," which may be omitted, as it was at this concert.

This tone-poem is an uncommonly brilliant composition and one of marked originality. It is conspicuous for rhythmic effects and gorgeous or dramatic orchestral coloring rather than for striking musical contents, though the "love theme" is itself emotional and is developed emotionally. In the first section Holbrooke succeeds in avoiding the suggestion of Berlioz's famous Scherzo and in the soldier's dream of "breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades," there is no lapse into the vulgarity of square-toed march or conventional battle music. There is a persistent and audacious phrase which is extraordinarily effective, and the whole stiring section is appropriately fantastical. The performance was as brilliant as the composition, which awakens the desire to hear other orchestral works of this Englishman who has escaped the bondage of Mendelssohn, cathedral organists and the sound professors at the academy aghast at his wild and dangerous tendencies. Nor is there any trace of his being influenced by Wagner, Tschaik[illegible]

[illegible] might [illegible] in future to perform a Symphony of Bruckner with only an overture on the program. After music has been heard for an hour, even the "Romantic" Symphony may be as a stumbling block to many. It contains wonderful pages. The first movement, with its serene and confident opening, and noble thoughts; the indescribably solemn lamentation with its overwhelming climax, and the trio of the Scherzo are enough to stamp Bruckner as a genius. Alas! this genius was not a self-examining master. After a passage of rare beauty or sublimity, there will be measures of childish chatter, pages of damnable iteration. Then there are the disturbing haltings; the prevailing lack of logical continuity—but why now repeat the charges that have justly been brought against this strange and colossal apparition in the symphonic field?

Miss Gerhardt is first to be thanked for acquainting the audience with the fine air of Marcello and the still finer air of Gluck, an air that is the perfect expression of tender emotion. Marcello's air suffered from the manner in which the accompaniment had been orchestrated without regard to certain instruments not used in the time of Benedetto Marcello and without regard to the character of the song. Fortunately Gluck's simple accompaniment—strings and oboe—was not tinkered. She is also to be thanked for singing these ancient airs so beautifully. The appearance of an applauded operatic singer at a Symphony concert is to be looked on with suspicion. Miss Gerhardt is distinctively a lieder singer, but no woman of the opera could have interpreted the air from "Paride ed Elena" with greater dramatic significance. After the air of Gluck, the songs of Strauss seemed common place, and, in fact, few modern songs could have better stood the test, or vied at all with the affecting simplicity of Gluck's. Yet on an ordinary program, "Morgen" is sure to make its sentimental appeal, and "Wiegenlied" is not without charm. The composer would have enjoyed Miss Gerhardt's interpretation.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for those of Jan. 17-18 will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Bruch, Concerto for violin, No. 2 (Mr. Witek, violinist); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5.

From [illegible]

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date JAN 1 - 191

ANOTHER BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Delightful Programme Played by Orchestra and Sung by Miss Elena Gerhardt.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is having almost perfect weather for its concerts here this winter, which is in such sharp contrast with its experience the past two winters as to cause comment every symphony night. The result was another large audience at Infantry Hall last night for the third concert of this season's course, and the audience was as pleased with the concert and as enthusiastic in its expressions of approval as it was large in size.

There were two features that made this concert unusually interesting, the first appearance here as leader of the orchestra of Otto Urack, the assistant conductor in place of Dr. Muck, who, from illness, was unable to wield the baton, and the initial visit to this city of Miss Elena Gerhardt, the German concert soprano, who is making her second tour in this country. Both these features were fully equal to the expectations of the public and the reputation of the principals and the audience was quite satisfied with them both.

Mr. Urack is a young man, but he has already an enviable record as a 'cellist, composer and conductor, and that he has a brillaint future before him is the belief of those who have followed his career, and that belief is shared by those who heard him in this city last night. The work of the orchestra under his guidance has been considered exceptionally good, and he showed in this concert here thorough training, fitting him for the task he assumed and marked ability to lead his players and to draw from them all that they are capable of in the interpretation of the best musical compositions. The rendition of the selections by the orchestra was sympathetic and brilliant.

Miss Gerhardt sang last year in New York, Boston and other cities, and won cordial endorsement wherever she appeared. She has been in this country but a few days now, and is making her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for which she will be the soloist at a number of concerts during the season. Her musical education is of the Italian school, and her first selection was an old Italian aria by Gluck, while three songs by Richard Strauss, orchestrated by himself, "Morning," "Cradle Song" and "Cecilia," were her other offerings. In these she revealed a voice of sweetness and power, well trained and of wide range, and her rendering of all the selections was delightful and fully appreciated.

Of the orchestral numbers the symphony is practically new to Providence audiences. It is lighter in tone than some or perhaps many of these selections, but pleasing in its brightness and beauty. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" is also rarely heard but always enjoyable. and Glazounoff's overture, "Solennelle" is a brilliant production of the typical Russian sort. All were played with the sympathetic feeling and accurate workmanship that is characteristic of this orchestra.

The programme, which was entirely satisfying, was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93....Beethoven
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Old Italian Arias..............Marcello-Gluck
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81......Schumann
Three Songs with Orchestra............Strauss
"Morgen," "Wiegenlied." "Cacile."
Ouverture Solemnelle, Op. 73........Glazounoff

Newspaper Cutting B

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible] 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Muck, who has been ill for the past three weeks with a very severe attack of tonsilitis, is not yet sufficiently recovered to resume his work and, therefore Providence will have the interesting experience of hearing the Symphony orchestra at the concert in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who has made such a favorable impression in Boston with his conducting.

Mr. Urack was engaged by Dr. Muck last summer to take the place of Alwin Schroeder among the cellos and also to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. He is of German birth and Hungarian desent, is 28 years old, and suchessfully held the post of first cello in the orchestra of the Royal Opera house, Berlin, of solo cellist in the Festival orchestra in Bayreuth, and has had much experience in conducting in the Lower Rhine cities. In Mr. Urack the Boston Symphony seems to have discovered a man of extraordinary talent if not of genius. Certainly the orchestra has played most brilliantly under him.

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer whose first appearance in Providence, this will be. Miss Gerhardt, who has just arrived in this country, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra a number of times, this being her first appearance in this capacity. Last year she came to America for the first time and made a profound impression in Boston, New York and other cities where she sang as a most skilled singer of concert music.

The program is of more than ordinary interest. It begins with Beethoven's delightful Eighth symphony. In the second part will come an old Italian aria to

---

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date JAN 1 - 1913

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

New Year's Eve Programme Brilliant One and Superbly Played.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last night before an audience of about the usual size, notwithstanding the various counter attractions offered by the eve of the new year. Those who came were wise in foregoing, or at least postponing, to a later hour the aforesaid attractions, for they had the pleasure of listening to a programme of remarkable brilliancy, played as it could be by only the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its best. The soloist was Miss Elena Gerhardt, and the order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93.....Beethoven
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Old Italian Arias.................Marcello-Gluck
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81......Schumann
Three Songs with Orchestra.............Strauss
"Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Cacile,"
Ouverture Solennelle, Op. 73........Glazounoff

Beethoven's 8th symphony is less frequently heard, perhaps, than any other of the immortal nine. Unless the memory of the writer is treacherous, it has not been presented here before by the Boston orchestra. It does not appear to deserve neglect, for it certainly is a bright and interesting work, even though less deep and profound than three or four of the best among its fellows.

One could be in no doubt as to its origin, however. It contains too many of the genuine Beethoven earmarks—mannerisms, they might be called—for any mistake to be made in identification. And there is—notably in the two middle movements—a rollicking, jocose spirit manifested in which the great Ludwig did not often permit himself to indulge. The music is tricky, full of surprises which keep up the interest in spite of passages that are occasionally commonplace or trivial.

As a whole, therefore, the symphony is uneven. It lacks the logical force and directness of its composer's usual style; and this, in conjunction with its thinner texture, is doubtless the reason for its comparatively infrequent appearance on symphony programmes. Its rendition last night was a marvel of delicacy and precision, which was duly appreciated and enjoyed by the audience.

Of the other two purely instrumental numbers, Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" was far the more brilliant and striking, a typical piece of "red-blooded" music such as the modern Russian composers give us, and which seems to be beyond the power of any other school to achieve in just the same way. This, too, was played with enormous energy and corresponding effect.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, whom the observant pedestrian cannot fail to have noticed placarded for a week past as "Germany's greatest singer of lieder," came fully up to any expectations which the advertisement may have aroused. With a voice of ample power and range, under the finest control, and with an abundance of musical feeling, her singing was a pleasure to hear. The old Italian aria by Gluck, and the first two songs of the Strauss group, were most delighful music, most admirably sung.

Owing to the illness of Dr. Muck the orchestra was conducted last night by Otto Urack, the new first 'cellist and assistant conductor. Mr. Urack made a most favorable impression. His reading of the symphony was poetic and effective, and his accompaniment to the Strauss songs—a most difficult task—was remarkably well done.

The fourth concert by the orchestra will take place on Tuesday evening, Feb. 4, at which time Mr. Norman Wilks, the English pianist, will appear as soloist.

W. A. P.

Newspaper Cutting

From

Address

Date

Smyphony Orchestra to Give Concert.

Two artists will make their debut here to-night at the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Elena Gerhardt, German soprano, and Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who takes the place of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck is rapidly recovering from a severe illness that has kept him at home the last three weeks. His physicians will not allow him to be out yet. The programme will be as follows: "Symphony in F-major No. 8,," Beethoven: "Old Italian Aria;" overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; three songs with orchestra, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Cecilia," Miss Gerhardt; "Ouverture Sollennelle," Glazounoff.

1884

From

Address

Date DEC 31 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE THIRD CONCERT

Unusual interest surrounds the third Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, as it will mark the debuts of two very interesting artists, Elena Gerhardt, the eminent German soprano, and Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who takes the place of Dr. Muck.

Dr. Muck is rapidly recovering from a severe illness that has held him prisoner for the past three weeks, but his physician will not allow him to go out yet. Mr. Urack has had great success with the orchestra in Boston, and its patrons in Providence will watch his work with

---

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date JAN 5 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9 and Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Margarete Matzenauer and at the afternoon concert Geraldine Farrar. Madame Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's great aria, "Abscheulicher," from Beethoven's "Fidelio." A very interesting number on the Thursday evening's programme will be Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style (opus. 123), which will have its first public performance in New York. The other numbers will be Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's Second Symphony. On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing an aria from "Cosi fan tutte," and as her second number Azael's aria, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Dr. Muck has also included in the programme Josef Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab," besides Brahm's Symphony in D major and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

Esta 1884

From POST

Address: New York

Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Margaret Matzenauer and at the afternoon concert Miss Geraldine Farrar. Madame Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's great aria "Abscheulicher" from Beethoven's "Fidelio." On Thursday Reger's concerto in ancient style, opus 123, will have its first public performance in New York. The Philharmonic Society played it at a concert of its subscribers a few weeks ago. The other numbers will be Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's Second Symphony. On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing as her first number an aria from "Cosi fan tutte" and as her second number Azael's aria, "These Joyous Airs," from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue." On this programme also Dr. Muck has placed what is likely to be a novelty to most attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts. This is Josef Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab," the first work by this composer to be played by the Boston Symphony. The programme in proper order is as follows: Brahms, symphony in D major No. 2; Mozart, aria from "Cosi fan tutte; Holbrooke, tone poem, "Queen Mab"; Debussy, Azaël's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Chabrier, rhapsody for orchestra, "España."

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date JAN 5 - 1913

EVERY orchestra of which New York can boast and the pride of Boston's musical centres will play here this week, for with the new year a burst of activity is coming that bids fair to swamp the enthusiasts who want to miss nothing.

The January pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and Dr. Carl Muck has recovered sufficiently to conduct at both. Mme. Margarete Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday and Miss Geraldine Farrar Saturday afternoon. For the evening concert Dr. Muck has chosen a programme that includes Reger's Concerto in Old Style, Glazounoff's overture solenelle and Borodin's Second Symphony. Mme. Matzenauer will sing an aria from Mozart's "Titus."

Miss Farrar will sing two numbers on Saturday afternoon—an aria from "Cosi fan Tutti" and Azael's aria from Mr. Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Brahms' Second Symphony, Holbrook's tone poem "Queen Mab" and the "España" rhapsody by Chabrier will constitute the orchestra's programme.

Estab 84

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York.

Date JAN

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die beiden nächſten Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters finden unter Leitung von Dr. Muck am kommenden Donnerſtag Abend, reſp. Samſtag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ſtatt. Das erſterwähnte Konzert bringt das folgende Programm: Reger „Konzert im alten Style", Glazounow „Ouverture Solennelle" und Borodin's Zweite Symphonie. Als Soliſtin ſingt Frau Matzenauer vom Metropolitan Beethoven's Arie „Abſcheulicher" a „Fidelio" und die Altarie des Sextus a „Titus"

Established

[127]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date JAN 5 - 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Mme. Margarete Matzenauer, and at the afternoon concert Miss Geraldine Farrar. Mme. Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's great aria "Abscheulicher," from Beethoven's "Fidelio." A very interesting number on the Thursday evening programme will be Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, Opus 123, which will have its first public performance in New York. The Philharmonic Society played it at a concert of its subscribers a few weeks ago. The other numbers will be Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" and Borodin's Second Symphony. The programme is as follows:

Concerto in Ancient Style	Reger
Aria of Sextus, from "Titus"	Mozart
"Ouverture Solennelle"	Glazounoff
Symphony in B Minor, No. 2	Borodin

On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing as her first number an aria from "Cosi fan Tutte," and as her second number Azaël's aria, "These Joyous Airs," from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue." On this programme also Dr. Muck has placed what is likely to be a novelty to most attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts. This is Josef Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab." Little of the music of this interesting Englishman has been heard in America, and this is the first work to be played by the Boston Symphony. It is one of a series of tone poems, and had its first performance at the Leeds Musical Festival in 1904. The programme is as follows:

Symphony in D Major, No. 2	Brahms
Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"	Mozart
Tone poem, "Queen Mab"	Holbrooke
Azael's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Debussy
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"	Chabrier

Es 884

From ~~TRIBUNE~~ Times
Address: New York.
Date JAN - 1913

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Mme. Margarete Matzenauer, and at the afternoon concert Miss Geraldine Farrar. Mme. Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's aria "Abscheulicher," from Beethoven's "Fidelio." On the Thursday evening programme will be Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, Opus 123. The other numbers will be Glazunoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's Second Symphony. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Concerto in Ancient Style	Reger
Aria of Sextus from "Titus"	Mozart
"Ouverture Solennelle"	Glazunoff
Symphony in B minor, No. 2	Borodin

On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing as her first number an aria from "Cosi fan Tutte," and as her second number Azaël's aria, "These Joyous Airs," from Debussy's early cantata "L'Enfant Prodigue." On this programme also Dr. Muck has placed what is likely to be a novelty to most attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts. This is Josef Holbrooke's tone poem "Queen Mab." Little of the music of this Englishman has been heard in America, and this is the first work to be played by the Boston Symphony. It is one of a series of tone poems and had its first performance at the Leeds Musical Festival in 1904. The programme in proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 2	Brahms
Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"	Mozart
Tone poem, "Queen Mab"	Holbrooke
Azael's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Debussy
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"	Chabrier

.

Esta 884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date JAN 5 - 1913

Boston has had the pleasing sensation of having discovered a new conductor of worth. He is Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, through the illness of Dr. Muck, a sufferer from tonsilitis, has been called to conduct the concerts during the last [illegible] engaged as the successor of Alwin Schroeder among the 'cellos and also as assistant conductor to take Dr. Muck's place in case the latter was at any time incapacitated. Although but 28 years old, he has given some very remarkable performances. The feeling is that the young man has a remarkable future.

(Continued from Fourth Page.)

Dr. Muck has nearly recovered from his illness, and will conduct the next concerts of the orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. Mme. Matzenauer will be the soloist Thursday evening and Miss Farrar Saturday afternoon.

Est 1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1913
Date

Max Reger, Marcello, Gluck, Brahms, Richard Strauss and Mozart, make a remarkable list of composers represented on the programme of the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the very distinguished German soprano. whose recitals a year ago are gratefully remembered by all those who had the good fortune to hear her. Miss Gerhardt will sing twice. Her first number will be two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and the other by Gluck, and her second number three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," with orchestral accompaniment arranged by the composer himself. The orchestral part of the concert gains great importance from the first performance in Brooklyn of Max Reger's concerto in ancient style, opus 123. Reger shares with Strauss and Debussy the distinction of being the most interesting musical personality of the time. A man of prodigious musical learning, a contrapunist of extraordinary skill, his works often in the past having displayed this skill at the expense of melodic value. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century, and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach. The work was first produced in Frankfort-on-the Main on Oct. 4, 1912, and the Philharmonic Society of New York gave it at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on Nov. 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on Dec. 13 and 14. The work is in three movements and employs one and two solo violins. It is scored for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, three horns kettle-drum, solo violins, and the usual strings. The other numbers will be Brahms' magnificent variations on a theme by Haydn, and Mozart's symphony in C major, commonly known as "Jupiter."

ELENA GERHARDT,
Soprano Soloist.

Estal 884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York. JAN 5 - 1913
Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Madame Margarete Matzenauer, and at the afternoon concert Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Madame Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's great aria "Abscheulicher" from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

A very interesting number on the Thursday evening programme will be Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, opus 123, which will have its first public performance in New York. The Philharmonic Society played it at a concert of its subscribers a few weeks ago. The other numbers will be Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's Second Symphony. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Concert in Ancient Style	Reger
Aria of Sextus from "Titus"	Mozart
"Ouverture Solennelle"	Glazounoff
Aria, "Abscheulicher" from "Fidelio"	Beethoven
Symphony in B Minor No. 2	Borodin

On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing as her first number an aria from "Cosi fan tutte" and as her second number Azael's aria, "These Joyous Airs" from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue."

On this programme also Dr. Muck has placed what is likely to be a novelty to most attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts. This is Josef Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab." Little of the music of this interesting Englishman has been heard in America and this is the first work to be played by the Boston Symphony. It is one of a series of tone poems and had its first performance at the Leeds Musical Festival in 1904.

The programme in proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D Major No. 2	Brahms
Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"	Mozart
Tone poem, "Queen Mab"	Holbrooke
Azael's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Debussy
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"

E

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 5
Date

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra to Play Here Friday.

MISS ELENA GERHARDT WILL BE THE SOLOIST

Flonzaleys at the Academy on Tuesday—Two Symphony Concerts To-Morrow — McCormack's Recital To-Morrow Evening.

Max Reger, Marcello, Gluck, Brahms, Richard Strauss and Mozart makes a remarkable list of composers represented on the programme of the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose recitals a year ago are remembered by all those who had the fortune to hear her. Miss Gerhardt will sing twice. Her first number will be two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and the other by Gluck, and her second number three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," with orchestral accompaniment arranged by the composer himself.

The orchestral part of the concert gains importance from the first performance in Brooklyn of Max Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, Opus 123. This work was first produced in Frankfort-on-the-Main on Oct. 4 last, and the Philharmonic Society of New York gave it at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on Nov. 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on Dec. 13 and 14. The work is in three movements, and employs one and two solo violins.

The other numbers will be Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and Mozart's immortal symphony in C major, "The Jupiter."

Establ 884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York. BROOKLYN EDIT
Date JAN 5 - 1913

TO HEAR ELENA GERHARDT

Will Be Soloist at Third Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, whose appearances in America last year made such a pro[illegible]pression upon all those that heard her.

For a number of years Miss Gerhardt has been giving concerts and song recitals on the [illegible]ent and in England, where her p[illegible]larity is firmly established. She [illegible] probably be heard in an aria [illegible] in a group of songs with orchest[illegible]

Established:

From SUN
Address New York
Date JAN 5 - 1913

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present as soloist at the evening concert Mme. Margarete Matzenauer and at the afternoon concert Miss Geraldine Farrar. Mme. Matzenauer will sing the aria of Sextus from Mozart's "Titus" and Leonora's great aria, "Abscheulicher" from Beethoven's "Fidelio." A very interesting number on the Thursday evening programme will be Reger's concerto in ancient style, opus 123, which will have its first public performance in New York. The Philharmonic Scoiety played it at a concert of its subscribers a few weeks ago. The other numbers will be Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's second symphony. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Concerto in ancient style	Reg
Aria of sextus from "Titus"	Moza
"Ouverture Solennelle"	Glazoun
Symphony in B minor No. 2	Borod

On Saturday afternoon Miss Farrar will sing as her first number an aria from "Cosi fan Tutte," and as her second number Azaël's aria "These Joyous Airs," from Debussy's early cantata "L'Enfant Prodigue." On this programme also Dr. Muck has placed what is likely to be a novelty to most attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts. This is Josef Holbrooke's tone poem "Queen Mab." Little of the music of this interesting Englishman has been heard in America and this is the first work to be played by the Boston Symphony. It is one of a series of tone poems and had its first performance at the Leeds musical festival in 1904. The programme in proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D major No. 2	Brahms
Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"	Mozart
Tone poem, "Queen Mab"	Holbrooke
Azaël's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Debussy
Rhapsody for orchestra, "España"	Chabrier

Esi 884

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. 1913
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its third concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 10, has been trying out its assistant conductor, Otto Urack, called suddenly to this task by the illness of Dr. Muck. Once more Boston seems to have discovered a genius, for Mr Urack, although a young man of only twenty-eight, has had extraordinary success at his concerts in Boston. Dr. Muck, however, will conduct the Brooklyn concert as usual. The soloist will be the distinguished German singer, Elena Gerhardt, whose concerts last season were among the sensations of the winter in Manhattan and Boston.

Esta 884

[128]

From News
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date JAN 1 - 1913

1884

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

A very large and discriminating audience attended the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, and the performance was certainly one of the most brilliant and most pleasing ever given by this splendid musical aggregation. The program was:

Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93.... ....Beethoven
  I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
  II. Allegretto scherzando.
  III. Tempo di minuetto.
  IV. Allegro vivace.
Old Italian Arias.. ....Marcello-Gluck
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81....... ....Schumann
Three Songs with Orchestra.......Strauss
  "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Cacile."
Ouverture Solennelle, Op. 73....Glazounoff

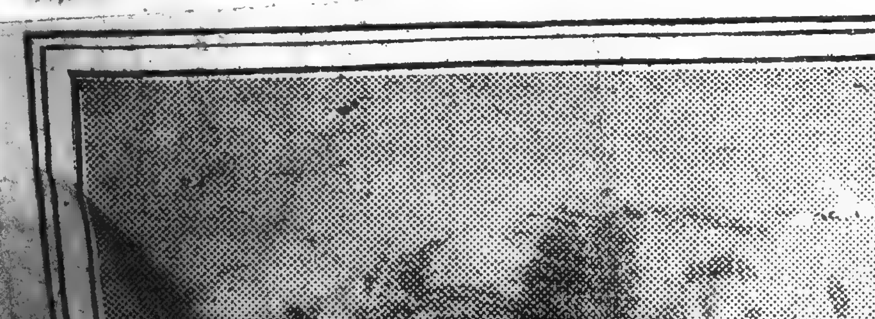
The soloist was Miss Elena Gerhardt, and she proved to be an artiste in every meaning of the term. Possessed of a voice full of power and of remarkable range, possessing a most evident knowledge of her art, she made a most delightful and most deserved impression, and was called before the audience again and again. Never losing control of her marvelously trained voice, she, at the same time clearly demonstrated that she possesses in a high degree the power of "feeling" the music.

She sang two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and the other by Gluck, and also a group of three "lied" by Strauss, in the last of which, "Cacile," she gave evidence of great dramatic force in her beautiful tones.

The orchestra, owing to the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, was conducted by Otto Urack, the new first 'cellist and assistant conductor. Mr. Urack made a most favorable impression, all of his readings being very effective, but particularly so in the "Ouventure Solennelle" of Glazounoff, one of the fiery compositions, which has so distinguished the composers of the modern Russian school.

On the whole it was a delightful concert, reflecting the greatest credit upon the conductor and the players.

The fourth concert will take place on Tuesday evening, Feb. 4, at which time Mr. Norman Wilks, the English pianist, will be the soloist.



Geraldine Farrar, Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Saturday Afternoon

---

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WEDNESDAY

Elena Gerhardt, Distinguished German Soprano, To Make Premiere.

TO SING NEW SOLOS

Orchestra Under Dr. Karl Muck Will Play Russian Numbers At Her First Appearance.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, presents several viewpoints of interest. The soloist will be Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, who will make her first appearance in this city. Miss Gerhardt is a comparative stranger in America, for last season was the first time she visited this country. Her concerts then, however, were sufficient to impress the musical public with the fact that in her Germany has sent another valuable contribution to our musical life.

The possessor of a beautiful soprano voice, she has taste and intelligence in the interpretation of songs and arias that are the lot of very few artists.

Two Italian Arias.

Her first number will be two old Italian arias—"Il mio bel fuoco," by Marcello, and "O del mio dolce ardor," by Gluck. Her second number will be three modern songs by Richard Strauss, the accompaniments to which he himself orchestrated. These are "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Cæcilie."

The orchestral numbers include two works new to Baltimore, one of them a novelty. This is Max Reger's "Concerto in Ancient Style for Orchestra, Opus 123."

Reger shares with Strauss and Debussy the distinction of being the most interesting musical personality of our time. A man of prodigious musical learning, a contrapuntist of extraordinary skill, his works often in the past have displayed this skill at the expense of melodic value. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach.

The work was first produced in Frankfort on October 4, 1912, and the Philharmonic Society of New York gave it at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on November 19.

Has Three Movements.

Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, on December 13 and 14. The work is in three movements and employs one and two solo violins. It is scored for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, three horns, kettle-drum, solo violin and the usual strings.

The other work which is new to Baltimore is Borodin's Symphony in B Minor No. 2. It was written during the years 1871-77 and had its first performance in St. Petersburg on February 15, 1877.

Borodin, who was born in 1834 and died in 1887, belonged to that Chauvinistic school of Russian musicians which rejected Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky as non-Russian and found its most eloquent expression in Rimsky-Korsakoff. Although older than Balakireff, Borodin was his pupil.

Borodin's vocation was medicine and surgery, and music was his avocation, and, curiously enough, from 1862 to the day of his death he was a teacher of chemistry in the Academy of St. Petersburg. Nevertheless, he devoted much time to music, writing in all its various forms.

Held In High Esteem.

His music was always held in high esteem in Russia, and at this late date is rapidly gaining ground in Europe.

The full program will be as follows:

Concerto in ancient style..........Reger
Old Italian arias—
"Il mio bel fuoco"..................Marcello
"O del mio dolce ardor"..............Gluck
"Academic Festival" (overture)....Brahms
Three songs with orchestra—
"Morgen"... }
"Wiegenlied" } ....Strauss
"Caecilie"... }
Symphony in B Minor No. 2.......Borodin
Soloist—Miss Elena Gerhardt

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date
Est 1884

ARTISTIC PROPRIETY

Is It Sinned Against When Philharmonic Plays Strauss and Rossini?

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: As Wednesday's Tribune contained a long reply to my recent criticism of the Philharmonic programmes, I must trespass upon your columns again with a rejoinder.

Your readers who have noticed my first communication will remember that I questioned the artistic propriety of placing Strauss waltzes and Rossini overtures on regular symphonic programmes, especially after such superb creations as Beethoven's Seventh and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphonies.

To this your correspondent, J. P. Schmitt, replies that the Strauss waltz is music of a high order, that good authority exists for thinking so, and that its performance falls well within the province of the Philharmonic Society. He goes into an exposition of the objects of this society, quoting from its constitution, bylaws, etc., to prove that the object of the Philharmonic Society is "the cultivation and performance of instrumental music," and that it is its duty to conserve "musical compositions which the judgment and taste of the cultured world have admitted to be first rank"—platitudes which no one ever disputed.

Simply noting this digression, let me ask my critic why the performance of Strauss waltzes and Rossini overtures is more the duty of the Philharmonic Society than of other first class orchestral associations? I cannot recall that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra or any similar orchestral organization has performed a Strauss waltz or Rossini overture in their regular symphonic concerts within a decade. Surely my critic will not deny that these organizations exist quite as much for the conservation of the best orchestral music as does the Philharmonic Society. Yet even he would probably be somewhat "shocked" to find the "Danube" waltz or the "Tell" overture on a regular Boston Symphony Orchestra programme.

With so much already accomplished in the development of genuine musical taste, it certainly does seem a pity that the Philharmonic Society should appear "to capitulate to the enemy" by throwing out needless bait to the unmusical. This is the only consideration that impelled me to protest against a continuance of the practice. No, I was not "shocked," Mr. Schmitt—nothing the Philharmonic Society will do under its present leadership can shock a keen observer of things musical. Amazed I certainly was, as were many others. Even the professional musical critics, as appeared from their Monday morning reviews of the concerts in question, were equally amazed at such incongruous innovations in recent Philharmonic programmes.

DAVID A. MODELL.
New York, Jan. 10, 1812.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date JAN 10 1913
Estab

For the third time this year the Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us, and for that happy fact let praise be given.

At the first of its two concerts last night, in Carnegie Hall, a change of programme was made at the last moment. Mme. Mateznauer, who was to have been the soloist, was ill, and in her place Miss Elena Gerhardt sang two groups of songs, making her first appearance here this year. Two old Italian arias by Marcello and Gluck were Miss Gerhardt's first selections. Her second group of songs by Richard Strauss were in her programme here last season, and were sung with that tonal beauty and artistic insight which have made this singer so justly celebrated. After the first song in this group, "Morgen," the progress of the concert was interrupted by the illness of one of the auditors. Dr. Muck and Miss Gerhardt succeeded in restoring the requisite artistic repose almost immediately.

The most important number of the orchestra was Borodin's second symphony, a bold work, showing not only the barbaric splendor of the modern Russian school but the influence of the frequently banal Liszt, who was Borodin's friend.

Dr. Muck conducted the work with his usual fidelity to the meaning of the composer and with the authority that marks his leadership and makes him the ideal orchestral conductor. Traces of his recent illness were apparent, but they were not permitted by him to interfere with or affect his work.

Another Russian represented in the programme was Glazounoff, whose overture solenelle was played between Miss Gerhardt's two groups of songs. Reger's concerto in the ancient style opened the programme.

As usual, the orchestra's playing was above reproach, and the appreciation of the most discriminating musical audience in the cty was manifest throughout.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date JAN 10 1913

Established

That most wonderful audience which greets the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its visits to New York became aware of a sudden interruption in the usual calm course of proceedings at Carnegie Hall last night. One of the woodwinds played a "sour" note, a thing unheard of. And the same instant an emergency soloist, Elena Gerhardt, appearing in Matzenauer's place, was seen to start and catch her breath. But the song, Strauss's "Morgen," was finished and Dr. Muck turned round inquiringly, just as an unconscious woman was lifted from one of the front rows on the middle aisle and carried out of the hall. Those on the stage had seen the mishap first.

It was said later that the fainting woman had quickly revived and that she was Mrs. Calvin S. May, whose home was in the Osborne, just over the way in Fifty-seventh street. At the other side of Carnegie Hall, by grim coincidence, a singer, Charles Rice, formerly occupying one of the studios high up in the musical building, was at the same hour being carried from the Fifty-sixth street door.

The big audience became quiet after a moment's pause and Miss Gerhardt went on with the well-known "Wiegenlied" of Strauss, and his brilliant "Caecilie," orchestrated for her by the composer. The German Lieder singer earlier in the evening sang old Italian arias, Marcello's "Il mio bel fuoco" and Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor," which earned a special distinction as being the only classical numbers in the entire programme.

Gerhardt looked a giant in a radiant costume of gold satin crossed from hem to shoulder by two great diagonals of lace. Her voice, used with care in the lower register, dominated the orchestra when delivered with full power on the upper tones. The "Cradle Song" and "Caecilie" were much applauded. Conductor and band began Max Reger's so-called concerto "In the Ancient Style," op. 123, a towering structure of serpentine fugues piled one on another in the familiar manner of the "Twentieth Century Bach."

Glazounoff's overture "Solenelle," better described by its original name of "Festival," was followed last of all by another Russian, Borodin, whose symphony No. 2 proved a tone pageant of the mediæval land of the Czars.

Borodin himself labelled his symphony's first movement a gathering of ancient Russian princes, his adagio a song of the Slavic "bayans" or troubadours, and his finale a banquet of heroes to the sound of the peasant "gousli" a bamboo flute.

Reger's concerto and the Strauss songs are repeated in Brooklyn to-night, with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn. To-morrow at Carnegie Hall the orchestra plays Brahms's second symphony, Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" and Chabrier's "Espana," while Geraldine Farrar sings airs of Mozart and Debussy.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Estab

Boston Orchestra Meets a Hoodoo And Finishes It

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THAT dreadful hoodoo of the rule of three fell upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Happily, it exhausted itself all at once, leaving the skies all serene for to-morrow's matinee. First, there had to be a hasty substitution of a soloist. Margarete Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, announced to sing arias from Mozart's "Titus" and Beethoven's "Fidelio," was ill, and Elena Gerhardt, the eminent German singer, who has been heard here previously this season, was hurried into the breech. Then between two of Miss Gerhardt's numbers, a woman seated well forward fainted and was carried out limp and motionless; an incident that might have caused some excitement elsewhere, but scarcely aroused a ripple on the surface of the placid Boston Orchestra audience. Finally, after the first number of the symphony, a music rack was upset with a distrubing clatter, and the man behind it fell, picking himself up unhurt, but with face aglow with chagrin. Fortunately, nothing further of an untoward nature happened.

The lady who fainted, it was learned, was Mrs. Calvin S. May, of the Osborn, Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, whose husband is a doctor. He was not present, but Mrs. May was attended by Dr. Percy S. Friedenberg, who pronounced the attack one of the heart, more serious than an ordinary faint.

[illegible] Gerhardt [illegible] two old Italian arias, Marcella's "Il mio bel fuoco" and "Gluck's "Odel mio dolce ardor." Later she sang a group of Richard Strauss's songs, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie." She was in fine voice, better, in fact, than she has ever displayed here, and she sang with the artistry which she has led us to expect from her. For once, at least, the soloist won the chief favor of a Boston Symphony audience.

Dr. Muck's orchestral numbers were so much out of the ordinary as to cause something of a surprise to the conventional among his hearers. He began with Max Reger's concerto for orchestra in the ancient style. Clever, at least, and not without interest. It is in three movements. The first ends in suspension—has no ending at all, one might say. There was silence for several seconds. Then there were a few hand clappings. Again silence. A few more desultory hand claps followed, and, after nearly a minute had expired, there was general but perfunctory applause. The incident was a tribute to the intelligence of the audience, a learned musician was overheard to say. The next two movements were better received. But there was no pretense of enthusiasm. Glazounoff's "Sollennelle" overture had something of brilliance, at least, to recommend it, and Borodin's second symphony, simple and rugged, held appeal for people of sentiment. Dr. Muck conducted throughout with fine understanding and appreciation of the works he presented, and his splendid band of musicians justified their great reputation.

Newspaper Cutting Bure

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

Established:

Elena Gerhardt Surprises Audience by Early Return

Miss Elena Gerhardt, somewhat more ample as to figure than a year ago, unexpectedly made her first appearance of the season last night at Carnegie Hall as the eleventh-hour soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in place of Mme. Margarete Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, who was unable to fill this engagement. Miss Gerhardt had not been scheduled to sing here until toward the end of the month, and it was a distinct pleasure to hear her so much sooner.

While Dr. Muck went somewhat far afield in his programme, making a musical detour first through the land of the Little White Father in order to gather up an overture and a symphony of the Russian school, and then to Meiningen for one more opus of the quite un-Russian but indefatigable Max Reger, Miss Gerhardt satisfied herself with three songs of Richard Strauss and airs of Benedetto Marcello and Gluck.

Miss Gerhardt's art is still quite the same art of utmost distinction that she revealed to us a year ago. It is that rare thing of beauty, a vocal organ delicately and surely responsive to the finest shades of expression that the singer demands of it, welded with a poetically penetrative understanding.

Very little of the music that Benedetto Marcello, that polished talent of the early eighteenth century, wrote in opera and oratorio and cantata is heard to-day, and this old air, "Il mio bel Fuoco," that Miss Gerhardt chose, she sang with the grace that it demanded. Smoothly beautiful was her singing of the "O del mio Dolce Ardor," from Gluck's "Helen and Paris."

Strauss's "Morgen" and "Wiegenlied" Miss Gerhardt has sung here before. With orchestra they gain in richness, and Miss Gerhardt sang them with that effect of quiet exaltation that her wonderful pianissimo spinning of tone achieves in songs that require it. The "Caecilie," which needs the opposite sort of exaltation, is not best suited to Miss Gerhardt's artistic individuality.

The effect of Dr. Muck's opening number, Max Reger's Concerto in the Olden Style, was a bit unusual. After the first movement, which ends in one of the Regerlation sort of contrapuntal exercise of which the Teuton of the Teutons is so fond, the audience remained stolidly still. Two or three pairs of hands spasmodically applauded and then the stillness continued. Dr. Muck and his men were plainly amused and both were then finally applauded, in spite of Reger, so to speak.

One ventures to say that few of even a Boston Symphony audience know or e what a concerto was in the olden s, and Mr. Reger's scholarliness thus lost. But the last movement real merit. Its aridity is well conled beneath a factitious liveliness, so this received its meed of apise. There should be no doubt that old forms in music may be used certain purposes to-day, but to em them merely for their own sake irely worse than taking the proverb coal back to Newcastle.

ie Russian music consisted of Glanoff's "Solemn Overture" and Boros Second Symphony. The formened most labored, and the symny, while interesting, is hardly disuished in its thematic material. orchestra did all that could be with it. Indeed, the playing of men from Boston was upon the est level of the tradition behind

---

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date JAN 10 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Modern Music—Miss Elena Gerhardt Sings.

Dr. Muck carried out his ideas as to unity of style in the programme of the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was made up entirely of modern works, except for two of the airs sung by Miss Elena Gerhardt, who was the soloist. She fulfilled that function because of the illness of Mme. Margarete Matzenauer, who had originally been announced for this concert, but was unable to appear. The orchestral music comprised Max Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," Op. 123; Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solenelle," Op. 73, and Borodin's second symphony in B minor.

Reger's work, one of his most recent, had not been heard publicly in New York before, though it was played at an invitation concert given by the Philharmonic Society to its associate members last November. He has made his music resemble in some degree the old form of a "concerto grosso," with solo passages for certain instruments alternating with passages for the whole orchestra. The beginning is promising, with a stoutly built theme that might suggest the manner of Bach, but there is little besides the manner, and even this is very soon cast aside. The music in all three of the movements wanders from key to key in Reger's jaunty fashion, and though there is a complex contrapuntal fabric woven and the treatment of the orchestra is unusually transparent, the general effect is fragmentary and disjointed, with little coherence or true development.

The first movement ends its tonal peregrinations, in fact, with an effect of not getting back to the key of the movement, but of staying in the dominant. So inconclusive was the end that the audience failed to recognize that an end had come, and sat at first, as though bewildered, without giving a hand. It did not seem as though Reger's attempt to put new wine into this old bottle has been a success—and that not because the new wine was strong enough to burst the old bottle. The performance was one of the greatest subtlety and finish.

Of the two modern Russian compositions, Glazounoff's "Solemn Overture," no doubt, made the most agreeable effect, for, though he says some things in it that come dangerously near the commonplace, he does it with resounding brilliancy, and his efforts in this direction were splendidly seconded by the orchestra, which played the music with a tonal magnificence worthy of a better cause. Borodin, on the other hand, made not the slightest attempt to beguile either by any lascivious pleasings of his musical ideas or by seductive orchestral coloring. He was one of the most determined of the new Russian school to be uncompromisingly Russian, and this symphony may be called a classic of its kind, and is almost wholly made up of short themes, rude and angular in their form, endlessly repeated rather than employed for musical development.

They have the suggestion of the Orient. There are obstinately recurring figures, long, persistent single notes, that summon up a vision of the monotony of the steppes. That there is an aggressive vigor, even violence, in the music that makes an impression of its own, is undeniable; but its impression is not of musical beauty. The symphony had been heard before in New York—the Philharmonic Society played it under Anton Seidl's direction in 1897; it is not likely to be heard again in a much briefer interval.

Miss Elena Gerhardt's singing gave great delight. It had all the beautiful qualities of voice, of profound appreciation and penetration, and of fine phrasing and artistic delivery that are remembered from her performances of last season. Her singing of the two old Italian airs, one by Benedetto Marcello, "Il mio bel Fuoco," and Gluck, "O, del mio dolce Ardor," was especially notable for the perfect command of the style to which they belong.

She sang also three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," and "Cäcilie," all with accompaniments transferred to the orchestra by the composer. Only in the last, however, is the transfer a success; and the first two, even if "Cäcilie" be not included, sound better with the pianoforte accompaniment as originally conceived and written. Miss Gerhardt sang them beautifully, and they were accompanied beautifully.

E 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date

k, 1884

SYMPHONY SOLOIST IS ILL; GERHARDT SINGS

Margarete Matzenauer Unable to Appear With Dr. Muck's Organization; Woman in Audience Faints.

A double illness marred the first of the Boston Symphony's January concerts which was given at Carnegie Hall last night. The indisposition of Margarete Matzenauer, the Metropolitan Opera contralto who was to have been the soloist of the evening, made necessary the substitution of Elena Gerhardt and a consequent change in the programme.

At the close of the first of the three Strauss songs the substitute soloist sang Mrs. Calvin Sloane May of 205 West Fifty-seventh street, who was in the audience, was seized with a fainting spell, supposedly due to a heart attack or to a mild form of apoplexy. Dr. Percy S. Friedenberg, who was attending the concert, offered his services, and Mrs. May was conveyed to her apartment near Carnegie Hall after he had revived her.

Despite these contretemps, the concert was an unusually brilliant one. The Glazounoff overture was easily the masterpiece of Dr. Muck and his orchetra for that evening. Reger's "Concert in Ancient Style" and Borodin's Symphony in B minor, No. 2, were the other numbers. Madame Gerhardt [illegible]

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date JAN [illegible] 1913

stabli

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Reger's „Concert im alten Style", welches Werk am 19. Nov. v. J. im erſten des Konzerts der Boſtoner ſymphoniſchen für ihre Jahres-Mitglieder erſtmalig in New York geſpielt worden war, erlebte geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall anläßlich des Concert der Boſtoner ſymphoniſchen Gäſte ſein öffentliches Debut. Es iſt mir nicht leicht, über Reger zu ſchreiben, ohne Altgewohntes zu wiederholen. Gelehrſamkeit iſt, wie immer, auch diesmal in unheimlicher Menge in Evidenz, aber faſt alles, was wir bisher an der Muſik Herrliches und Erhebendes fanden, glänzt durch Abweſenheit. Eine ausführlichere Beſprechung hat unter ſolchen Umſtänden keinen Sinn, denn da handelt es ſich um grundlegende Differenzen, nicht um dieſes oder jenes Thema oder um dieſe oder die andere Behandlungsweiſe. Ich ſtehe den Modernen ſympathiſch und vor allem höchſt aufmerkſam gegenüber, aber—was ich bisher an der Muſik geliebt habe, wird mir da auf den Kopf geſtellt! Was nützt alle blendende Virtuoſität der Boſtoner ſolch' trockenen kontrapunktiſchen Verſchlingungen und Auswüchſen gegenüber, es iſt, als ob man am oberſten Stockwerk eines „Wolkenkratzers" werthvolle Fresken anbringen wollte. Sehen und genießen würde ſie ja doch niemand. Der Beifall des Publikums klang nicht eben ſehr aufrichtig und galt offenbar vorwiegend dem Meiſter-Orcheſter und ſeinem Führer.

Glazounoff, deſſen „Ouverture Solennelle" die nächſte Orcheſternummer bildete, iſt der Optimiſt unter den Neuruſſen, und ſeine Muſik klingt gewöhnlich wie Lebensbejahung und Glanz. Das war auch diesmal mit dieſer mehr dekorativ gehaltenen ,rauſchenden Muſik der Fall, die lebhaften Beifall auslöſte.

Die Hauptdarbietung des Konzerts kam zum Schluß. Es war Alexander Borodin's (1834—1887) Zweite Symphonie in H-Moll, die ſich ungeachtet eines nicht zu überſehenden Mangels an Einheitlichkeit als ein ſtarkes, intereſſantes [illegible]. Das iſt echt ruſſiſche Muſik von Natürlichkeit und Farbigkeit in Harmonik und Inſtrumentation.

Der erſte Satz zeigt ſcharfe Profilirung und bringt ein Ringen zwiſchen trüben und helleren Mächten. Finſtere Entſchloſſenheit charakteriſirt ihn faſt durchweg, mit dem der Humor und die Grazie des Scherzos in ſtarkem Kontraſt ſteht. Dieſer zweite Satz bringt ein ganz entzückendes Trio, das durchweg paſtoral anmuthet und die zarteſten, poetiſchen Farben zeigt. Faſt religiös angehaucht iſt dagegen der dritte Satz, der überwiegend träumeriſch gehalten iſt und ſtarken Klang- und Stimmungszauber bietet. Riemann findet, daß in dieſem Satz neben den ruſſiſchen Einflüſſen auch ſolche orientaliſcher Provenienz erkenntlich ſind, „die ſchillernden und verſteckten Farben und Schönheiten, die Unendlichkeitsſtimmung, die heiße und doch züchtige Sinnlichkeit des Orient. Der Schlußſetz findet wieder elementarere Rhythmen und gemahnt an die Steppe. Er klingt faſt ausgelaſſen luſtig aus.

Dr. Muck dirigirte dieſes originelle Stück Muſik mit ſichtlichem Behagen und imponirendem Farbenreichthum, und das Orcheſter konnte ſich an virtuoſem Muſiziren nicht genug thun. Einen beſonders guten Abend hatte der Konzertmeiſter, Herr Anton Witek, deſſen Solo-Violine auch im Reger'ſchen Werk durch Klangreiz und künſtleriſcher Vornehmheit wirkte.

An Stelle der angekündigten Soliſtin, Frau Matzenauer vom Metropolitan, die erkrankt war, hatte Frl. Elena Gerhardt die Aufgabe übernommen, das Publikum durch Sangesvorträge zu erfreuen, was ihr auch voll gelang. Prächtig bei Stimme, ſang die Dame, die in der laufenden Saiſon hier noch nicht gehört worden war, zwei Arien von Marcello und Gluck, die, das mangelhafte Italieniſch abgerechnet, wahre Kunſtleiſtungen brachten. Noch mehr wirkte ſie durch den intelligenten und ſeelenvollen Vortrag von Richard Strauß' „Morgen", „Wiegenlied" und „Cäcilie", von denen ſie namentlich das erſtgenannte wundervoll ſang. Dieſe Lieder wirken mit Orcheſterbegleitung viel mehr als mit Piano. Das Publikum zeichnete Frl. Gerhardt ſehr warm aus und verhielt ſich auch den Boſtonern gegenüber ſehr beifallsfreudig.

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date JAN

E 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Some New and Unexpected Music in the Programme.

The illness of Mme. Matzenauer, who was expected to sing at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of its home city this week, compelled a change in the programme of the third concert, which took place in Carnegie Hall last night. Fräulein Gerhardt chanced to be available, however, and was secured, thus giving her New York admirers an earlier opportunity to hear her than was expected, and also enabling them to hear her under extremely gratifying conditions. The substitution spared the public a repetition of two airs which have become something of an obsession at concerts in which large voiced singers take part—the air with clarinet obbligato from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito" and the scena "Abscheulicher!" from "Fidelio." In place of these very admirable but somewhat too persistent pieces Miss Gerhardt sang an old air by Benedetto Marcello ("I mio bel fuoco"), with which she made no very profound effect; a more familiar aria, that "gem of purest ray serene" from Gluck's "O del mio dulce ardor," in which beautiful feeling was paired with beauty of style and voice, and three of Richard Strauss's songs, in which nearly all the merits in the singer's catalogue were united and enhanced by exquisite orchestral accompaniments written by the composer himself. The songs were "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Cäcilie," and in the first the principal violin, Mr. Witek, fairly divided the honors with the singer by his performance of the obbligato.

There was a-plenty of unfamiliar music in the orchestral list. The opening number, by Max Reger, a "Concerto in the Ancient Style," was about as startling an example of new wine in old bottles as that revolutionary with archaic tendencies could well have been expected to provide. In form it leaned on that of the old concerto grosso, though the ripieno band had a vastly different constitution than that known in the works of Bach and Handel, and the old manner was also observable in the structure of the themes, But there the likeness stopped, the harmonic progressions going so far afield that when the first movement came to an end the listeners were so lost in a maze that they sat in silence and stared at Dr. Muck as if wondering why he had stopped beating time. The slow movement made a nearer appeal, however, and from its opening to the end of the finale the music was followed with curious interest if not with unalloyed delight. A quicker response of popular appreciation was won by Glazounow's really fine and stirring "Overture Solennelle," which, played with such brilliancy as is heard only from the Bostonians, created a lively feeling of delight.

Set apart by itself as the closing portion of the programme was Borodine's Symphony in B minor, his second. There were probably a score or more of persons in the audience who recalled that this work had been previously heard in New York. It was sixteen years ago, however (February 5 and 6, 1897, at Philharmonic concerts directed by Anton Seidl), and those who remembered the incident at all probably could not recall much more than that it gave them a hearing of the most characteristically Russian symphony ever played in New York. Long years ago, when Tschaikowsky was a newcomer in our concert room, The Tribune's reviewer uttered the warning, "Look out for the Muscovite!"—uttered it in a spirit of admiration which has endured ever since. But when this symphony came it brought with it the discovery that, compared with Borodine, Tschaikowsky was a genial conservative, and that Rubinstein, whom some used to think a Russian, was hopelessly Teutonic and academic. This symphony is all Slav. Its ideas are all drawn from Russian folk song or folk dances, and are treated with true Russian desperation and wildness. Of extended melody there is not a shadow except in the slow movement—the third—and again, except in this slow movement, there is nothing which by any stretch of the imagination can be looked upon as thematic development—supposedly the first principle of symphonic composition. The first, second and fourth movements are all built up out of short phrases, which are reiterated over and over again with seemingly infinite variation of harmonic and instrumental color, but with a stubborn persistence which must seem maddening to all devotees of old-fashioned notions of musical development. It was all most revolutionary, but a perfect reflection of the spirit of Russian folksong, and to imaginations properly attuned must have called up pictures of the barbaric splendor of ancient Russian life. The music was driven home by the tremendous impetuosity and relentless power of Dr. Muck's reading.

H. E. K.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date JAN 10 1913

k, 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD HERE AGAIN

New Concerto in Old Style by Max Reger the Novelty of Programme.

ELENA GERHARDT SINGS

Glazounov's 'Overture Solenelle and Borodin's Second Symphony Are Also Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again and Dr. Karl Muck, happily recovered from the attack of grip which recently laid him low in the wise city of the East, conducted the concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme was one of unconventional description, the orchestral numbers being Max Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," opus 123, Glazounov's "Overture Solenelle," opus 73, and Borodin's second symphony.

The solo singer of the entertainment was to have been Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House, but she was indisposed and her place was taken after sufficient warning in the morning papers) by Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, who thus made her reappearamce before this public earlier than she had expected to make it.

After the concerto she sang two old Italian airs which she had given in Boston at the concerts of January 3 and 4. They were Marcello's "Il mio bel fuoco" and Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" from "Paride ed Elena." After the overture she sang three songs of Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Cäcelie." Miss Gerhardt was welcomed cordially by her hearers and sang with much beauty of style, particularly in the German songs.

Mr. Reger's concerto, as noted, is his 123d work, but he was born in 1873 and on the whole he has not been immoderate in production. The composition heard last evening was first performed at Frankfort on October 4, 1912, at a concert of the Museums Gesellschaft conducted by Wilhelm Mengelberg, who once visited this city as a guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society. The concerto was first played here at the Philharmonic's private concert of November 19 last.

There are no important reasons why a musician of to-day should not take up the concert for "several instruments" as Bach wrote it, or the "concerto grosso" as fashioned by Handel. On the contrary, there are good reasons why in these days of new instrumental combinations and highly developed technical skill on the part of orchestra players admirable results should be expected from new excursions into the old field.

But it is probable that the greatest satisfaction will be gained from compositions which frankly adapt the old form to the new conditions and make no attempt at compromise. Mr. Reger has scored his work for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three horns, three trumpets, kettledrums, solo violin and the usual strings. The selection of wind instruments betrays a desire to be archaic in orchestral color if not also in treatment.

On the other hand the passages allotted to the solo violin in the first movement are of a hybrid style. They have old fashioned figuration and distinctly Regerian melodic sequence. The union is utterly unhappy. The violin rebels against it and the concertino, as it used to be called, is not homogeneous with the concerto. The general result is one of confusion. The movement is needlessly complicated and its termination is so uncertain that last evening's audience did not know that the end had been reached and permitted several seconds to pass in silence before determining that there ought to be at least some semblance of applause.

The slow movement, which is the second of the composition, is much clearer and more interesting than the first allegro. Here the composer has bent himself to the unwonted task of affecting a simplicity which, though not congenial to his talent, is none the less becoming. The finale, too, is better made than the first movement and one can listen to it with pleasure if not with enthusiasm. Mr. Reger's return to an old form is attractive and ought to encourage other musicians to make experiments in similar things. But the antique manner need not be lamely imitated because the form is employed. This seems to be a case in which new wine might very successfully be poured into an old bottle.

It was a joy to hear the splendors of the tone of the Boston orchestra in the Glazounov overture. It is not a mighty conception, but it has fluency, color and plenty of striking contrast. It is well orchestrated and, as the musicians say, it "sounds." Given such a piece of music and a great orchestra can fairly show its qualities.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date JAN 10 191

Estab

BOSTON MUSICIANS PLAY REGER WORK

Glazaunoff's Solemn Overture Also Is Fascinating Feature of Symphony Orchestra Concert.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony last night appeared at Carnegie Hall with an unusual programme. Opening with Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," for orchestra, it ended with the second Symphony of the Russian, Borodin.

Between the works, representative of two most different schools, came Glazounoff's moving and melodious "Solemn Overture" and various songs—sung by Elena Gerhardt, who had replaced Margarethe Matzenauer, indisposed.

Rarely have the Boston players seemed more masterly in their attack, more delicate in their shading, more admirable in their precision, more varied in their color. The subtilities of Reger, whose concerto is not a concerto in the sense now attaching to that form of composition, were rendered with admirable expressiveness. The long and interesting Overture of Glazounoff was played with eloquence. And the heavy symphony of his fellow Russian, with its Muscovite themes, its barbaric vigor and its curious character, was racy of the land from which it sprang.

Mme. Gerhardt was in glorious voice. And if the style in which she sang two old Italian arias by Marcello and Gluck, displeased the critical, her tones were beautiful.

So was her singing of three songs by Strauss, his "Morgen" and "Wiegenlied" and his "Caecilie."

Hardly had Mme. Gerhardt reached the end of the Morgen" leed when an incident, of a distressing kind, upset the audience. An elderly lady seated in the middle of the orchestra fell forward in a fit and had to be carried into the lobby.

By a strange coincidence, almost at the same moment the body of a vocal teacher named Charles A. Rice, who died of heart failure yesterday morning, was removed from the building. Of this, however, those in the thronged hall knew nothing.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date JAN 1913

Established: Lon

"Concerto in the Ancient Style" by Reger Played

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heads With It Its Carnegie Hall Programme—Elena Gerhardt Replaces Mme Matzenauer—Other Musical Matters.

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.30 P. M., concert of the Symphony Society.

Carnegie Hall—3 P. M., song recital by Mme Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "The Magic Flute."

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—8.30 P. M., song recital by Leon Rains, bass.

Carnegie Hall—2.30 P. M., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Metropolitan Opera House—2 P. M., "The Tales of Hoffmann."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again and last night gave a concert in Carnegie Hall. For the first number on the programme Dr. Muck offered Max Reger's new "Concerto in the Ancient Style." The work, which was brought out in Germany only last October, has already been played in New York at a private subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society. The performance last night was its first here in public.

By "ancient style" is meant the style of Bach and Handel. The question has been asked, why did Max Reger choose to put his ultra-new wine in old bottles? And the question is pertinent. At times last night the matter seemed to shriek at the form; at times the form was empty formalism. And yet there were passages that entranced the ear, oftener in the intervening "Largo" than in the first or the last movement. The first movement does end with the tonic chord in F major, but with the C so strongly emphasized that it seems to end with one foot in the air. A flutter of applause was quickly suppressed, the audience waited for more music, none came, then the obvious amusement of the orchestra men showed where the truth lay. A good-nature. round of applause folthusiasm was not lacking. At the end of the concerto Dr. Muck summoned Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, the first and second concertmasters, to share with him the applause, in token of the important solo parts they had played.

---

The other orchestral numbers were picked from modern Russian music, Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Borodin's second symphony, in B minor. The Glazounoff piece is "occasional" music. It makes a joyous noise unto the people and otherwise signifies little. Borodin's symphony is a much more interesting work, in its barbaric vigor and swing and its rich oriental trappings.

Mme Matzenauer was to have been the soloist at this concert, but the illness that prevented her from singing Laura Adorno in "La Gioconda" in Philadelphia Tuesday night kept her silent again. Miss Elena Gerhardt replaced her, singing in New York for the first time this season. Miss Gerhardt's first number consisted of two old Italian airs, Marcello's "Il mio bel fuoco" and "O del mio dolce ardor" from Gluck's "Paris and Helen" (an air of such surpassing beauty that one longs for the revival of the whole opera); three Strauss songs with orchestra made the second—"Morgen," "Wiegenlied," and "Căcilie." Miss Gerhardt recently sang the same pieces at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. The better qualities of Miss Gerhardt's art were apparent in "Morgen" and the "Wiegenlied," but I doubt if she has ever sung here so badly as in the Italian airs and "Căcilie." The great audience applauded her cordially.

The performance of the orchestra was in the main superb, though a slip in the horn part brought momentary disaster in the accompaniment to "Morgen."

The pleasure of the evening was marred by the fainting of a lady who proved to be Mrs. Calvin S. May of 205 West Fifty-seventh street, who was carried out seriously ill from an orchestra seat near the stage during Miss Gerhardt's second number.

PITTS SANBORN.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

Esta

Miss Gerhardt Wins Honors in America Again

German Lieder Singer Is Heard to Advantage at Brilliant Concert by Boston Musicians.

Neither the fact that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, had just recovered from a three weeks' illness from tonsilitis nor the circumstance that Mme. Matzenauer, who was to have been the soloist, was indisposed and could not appear affected the excellence of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. When it was learned that Mme. Matzenauer, contralto of the Metropolitan, could not sing Miss Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder singer, was engaged. Last season she appeared here for the first time and won marked success, and last night she deepened this favorable impression by wonderful singing. In two old Italian arias, by Marcello and Gluck, she showed her reverence for the classics, and she followed these by a group of Mr. Richard Strauss' songs, which she sang inimitably. In his "Morgen" she sounded sentimental depths that moved her listeners to sighs—and applause; the following "Wiegenlied" was exquisitely phrased and interpreted; and the concluding "Caecilie" was dramatic. Again and again was she recalled by the enthusiastic audience.

Praise should be accorded to Mr. Muck for the sympathetic manner in which he conducted the accompaniments. He clearly showed the effects of his recent illness, but in appearance only, for his leading was marked by impressive generalship and authority.

The orchestral part of the programme began with Mr. Max Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," interesting, but not always very grateful. Glazounoff's "Overture Solenelle" was brilliantly played, and the final number was Borodin's second symphony, admirably performed, with the elemental spirit of this Russian writing fintely stated, yet never noisily. The orchestra played with the finesse and beauty of tone for which it is noted.

Mr. A. Witek, concert master, was not at his best in the Reger concerto, but was fine in the obbligato to the song "Morgen." The audience filled the hall and was liberal with its applause.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date JAN 8 - 1913

Establ

The January pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be welcomed in Carnegie Hall this week The Thursday evening soloist will be Margarete Matzenauer of the Metropolitan opera and on Saturday afternoon Geraldine Farrar will make her only concert appearance of the season.

Dr. Muck's symphony for Thursday is Borodin's No. 2, and on Saturday the second of Brahms

---

From POST
Address: New York
Date JAN 10 1913

Estab

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Margarete Matzenauer was unable to sing at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the audience, which, as usual, was a large one, had no cause for complaint, for her place was taken by another eminent vocalist, Elena Gerhardt. She sang an air by Marcello and Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" with good tonal production and distinction of style; but it was in three orchestrated Strauss songs that she was heard at her best, the Lied being her specialty. The first of these songs, "Morgen," is very much in the style of Brahms. Melodically, it is the most inspired song Strauss has composed, but it is seldom sung because the melody is almost entirely in the piano part, the voice being a mere side-show. In the beautiful orchestral version the melody falls to the lot of the violin obligato, which was admirably played by the concert-master, Mr. Witek. The other two songs "Wiegenlied" and "Căcilie," are melodically insignificant, but they are effective, and Mme. Gerhardt sang them to the satisfaction of the audience.

Some recent home concerts of the Boston Orchestra were not conducted by Dr. Muck, as he was ill. Fortunately, he appeared last night at his desk as usual, and the orchestra played with its usual brilliancy and technical finish.

It cannot be said that the programme was particularly interesting. Whenever a piece by Max Reger is produced in New York one wonders why; and the echo answers, "Why?" Why the "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," opus 123, was chosen for performance is a mystery, for it is, with the exception of a part of the second movement, entirely uninspired. Reger writes a great deal too much; he enjoys the fun of speeding his pen over the paper, and this tempts him to excesses which call for new laws as to speed limits in musical automobilism. It seems likely that if Max fell asleep while composing, his pen would travel on as fast as usual, and with about the usual results.

Another unfamiliar work on the programme, Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solenne," proved to be watered Tchaikovsky. However, it gave Philip Hale a chance to write some interesting pages of programme notes. So did the final number, Borodin's Second Symphony, which also was disappointing, except in the slow movement, which echoes the songs of Slavic troubadours.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert of the Boston Orchestra Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist, and Dr. Muck and his men will doubtless give an inspired performance of the delightful Second Symphony of Brahms, of which Weingartner has truly said that "the stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms, and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so successfully."

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Es

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Reger's Style of Composition Discussed by N. J. Corey of Detroit, Mich.

N. J. Corey of Detroit, Mich., gave the lecture recital in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the opera house of that building, this evening. He omitted all interpretation of the vocal music and only discussed the Reger "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," Opus 123, because he could not obtain the music in advance of the lecture recital. There is but one copy in the United States, and it was brought here from Germany by Dr. Muck. It belongs to him and was loaned by him to Mr. Stransky when that conductor wished to present it. It is being used in this series of concerts by the orchestra, and the programme, because of Dr. Muck's illness, was arranged at so late a date that a copy could not be prepared. Musical illustrations, therefore, were of Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn," Opus 56a, and Mozart's "Symphony" in C major, with Fugue Finale, "Jupiter," to which thematic study was given.

After speaking of the difficulty with which anything new in any form of art makes its way, Mr. Corey mentioned the frequent comment that great men in art "are not good business men," and said that they are. For their art is their business. They are good in it. Finance is not the only business. He expressed the hope that Americans will "maintain a cosmopolitan attitude toward music," and listen to whatever is new with an unprejudiced mind.

Reger has been much criticised. He "has a dangerous fertility" in writing, having published an unusually large number of works, to which he is continually adding. Intensely individual, he was said to have built his musical expression on study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, and this concerto is, while modern, remarkably reminiscent of the style which the title sets forth.

[132]

Address: New York.

Date

Establis

GERHARDT'S SINGING DELIGHTS BIG AUDIENCE

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, was heard in its third concert last night by an audience which filled Carnegie Hall. Mme. Matzenauer was unable to appear as soloist, and in her place was Elena Gerhardt, who on the same date last year made her first appearance in America. In many essentials Miss Gerhardt, who has just arrived for another tour, proved herself one of the finest artists heard this season, and there seemed much growth since she was last heard. He voice is exceedingly pure, and her production and coloring seem much improved. It would be difficult to offer any better interpretations than hers in two old Italian arias and three songs of Richard Strauss, all sung with orchestral accompaniment, Strauss himself having orchestrated "Morgen" and "Caecilie."

Dr. Muck devoted himself to modern works, opening with Max Reger's "Concerto in Ancient Style," part of which was interesting, but much was dull. The remaining numbers were from Russian composers, including an effective "Overture Solenelle," by Glazounow, and Borodin's second symphony. The Glazounow number might better have been called overture triomphale, for so it was in spirit. It was full of beautiful themes, some of which in the present day, when anything approaching melody is regarded as "banale," might be designated by the Germans as "Zuckersuss." It was played with rich color effects.

Borodin, whose name has figured on the programmes of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, is a modern Russian who died as late as 1887, and his second symphony, with its national color and haunting folk melodies, has much that is of interest and beauty. Dr. Muck and his admirable organization found all of these beauties.

The programme on Saturday afternoon will open with the Brahms symphony No. 2, and Miss Farrar will be the soloist.

New Symphony Brilliant.

The Borodin Symphony is a most elaborately orchestrated and studied work, combining a great variety of thought gleaned for other purposes, but combined in this one elaborate composition in four movements. It is generally brilliant, and especially so in its finale, although the andante movement is most tuneful and odd, in which the horn sings the old song of the troubadours and the clarinet, with harp accompaniment, gives the introductory passages.

The other number on the program was the familiar Academic Festival overture, one of the brightest of all the Brahms shorter numbers. With each concert the Boston Orchestra is showing more improvement under the masterly baton of Dr. Muck, and they have never played here better than last evening. Their next concert will be given on Monday evening, February 17, with Max Pauer, pianist, as sololist.

---

in Ancient Style.
Mozart—Aria of Sextus from "Titus."
Brahms—"Academic Festival" Overture.
Beethoven—"Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin?" from "Fidelio."
Borodin—Symphony in B Minor No. 2.
Soloist—Madam Matzenauer.

* * *

Philadelphia should have a keen appetite for opera on Tuesday evening, when, after an interval of three weeks, the Metropolitan Opera Company will pay another visit to this city, singing Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Caruso, who will sing the role of Enzo, will make his second appearance here this season. The title role will be entrusted to Emmy Destinn, while Mme. Matzenauer will be the Laura. The blind Mother will be impersonated by Maria Duchene. An interesting feature of the cast will be the Barnaba of the Franco-Algerian baritone, Dinh-Gilly. The Spanish basso cantante, Andrea De Segurola, will act the part of Alvise. The performance will include the beautiful ballet "The Dance of the Hours." Giorgio Polacco will conduct.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date
1884

Elena Gerhardt Heard with Boston Symphony

Elena Gerhardt replaced the indisposed Margarete Matzenauer at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The famous singer, who was heard here for the first time since she appeared last spring in the Metropolitan Opera House with Arthur Nikisch, sang Strauss's "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Caecilie" and several other numbers.

Dr. Karl Muck's most interesting offering came at the beginning of the programme, Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," opus 123, a work which had its first public performance in New York, though the Philharmonic Society had produced it recently at one of its private concerts in the Waldorf-Astoria.

Glazounoff's Ouverture Solennelle, opus 73, which separated Mme. Gerhardt's two groups of songs, introduced a note of pompous banality into the programme, for which Borodin's unimportant Symphony in B minor, No. 2, presented at the close of the evening's proceedings, offered little compensation.

From WORLD
Address: New York JAN
Date
E , 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Max Reger's concerto for orchestra, written in the ancient style, had its first general public performance in America in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck. It proved grateful music to the ear in the second movement.

The first movement seemed labored and made-to-order and ending in a manner contrary to the accepted laws of harmony left a queer impression. Borodin's second symphony in B minor and Glazounow's "Solennelle" overture were the other instrumental works, and each received admirable treatment.

Advertis

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 - 1913
Establi

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has succeeded in holding a place of eminent distinction in the musical world for so many years, was heard in Washington yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck did not appear, his place being filled by Otto Urack, first cellist and assistant conductor. Particular interest attached to the Max Reger number, which, like the remainder of the program, was performed in a manner to claim the most admiring consideration.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 1913
Estal 4

Boston Symphony January 7.

For the January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 Dr. Muck has arranged a program in the atmosphere of the eighteenth century. Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano, is to be the soloist. Her first number will be two Italian arias, "Il mio bel fuoco," by Marcello and "O del mio dolce ardor," by Gluck. Her second number will be three very modern songs by Richard Strauss, the accompaniments to which he himself orchestrated. These are "Morgan," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie."

The Reger concerto in ancient style had its first performance in Frankfort-on-the-Main last October. Reger has followed the model established by Bach and contemporaries. The other orchestral

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
E , 1884

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Matzenauer Ill and Flutist Maquarre Is the Soloist.

PROGRAM.

1. Reger—Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra, Op. 123
2. Bach—Suite in B Minor for Flute and Strings. A. Maquarre, Soloist.
3. Brahms—Academy Festival Overture, Op. 80.
4. Borodin—Symphony No. 2 in B Minor.

Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist......................A. Maquarre

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of its season's concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program which had to be changed from the one announced, owing to the illness of Madame Matzenauer, who was to have been the soloist. Instead of a vocal soloist, who was to have sung a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and an aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," the first flute of the Orchestra, A. Maquarre, substituted, and played the long suite in seven movements in B minor by Bach. The change in no way interfered with the usual enjoyment of a Boston symphony concert, for too rarely is the flute heard in solo, especially when so admirably played as by Maquarre.

The Bach Suite covers a wide range of musical expression, from the largo overture to the Badineria finish, including a minuet and polonaise movement. The latter half of the suite is the most brilliant part of it, but the flutist played with so much expression and delicate sweetness that every part of it was thoroughly enjoyed, and every movement was enthusiastically applauded, and at its finish Maquarre had to bow repeatedly to the appreciation displayed.

Reger Concerto New.

The Reger concerto, which opened the concert, is a composition new to this city, as was also the Symphony, which closed the program. Only as recently as October the Reger number was first played in public in Frankford-on-the-Main, and yet apparently in its construction it might date back at least a century, for it is arranged in the ancient style of orchestra composition, although with all the skill of the modern composer, with the present big and broad field for selection before him.

It is in three movements, the first having two solo violins that carry the theme. The entire work, while uninspiring, nevertheless presents delightful harmony, which graduates up and down in a simple but most effective way. Dr. Muck conducted it most admirably, bringing out fully the intent of the composer to show how an ancient idea in music would be handled by a member of the modern school.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 5 - 1913
Date 104
Est 1884

REGER CONCERTO FOR ORCHESTRA

Madam Matzenauer With Boston Symphony and Also in Cast of "La Gioconda."

CARUSO AND DESTINN

Thaddeus Rich as Soloist With Local Organization—Fellowship Club's Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, presents as soloist Madam Matzenauer, the extraordinary mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard here then for the first time in concert. She will sing the Sextus aria "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the great aria of Leonora in "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher: wo eilst du hin?"

The orchestral numbers include two works quite new to Philadelphia, one of them a novelty in every sense of the word. This is Max Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style for Orchestra, opus 123. Reger is one of the most interesting musical personalities of the time. He is a man of prodigious musical learning, and is a contrapuntist of extraordinary skill. His works often in the past have displayed his skill at the expense of melodic value. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and has clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach. The work was first produced in Frankfort on October 4 of last year, and the Philharmonic Society, of New York, gave the composition at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on November 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, on December 13 and 14. The work is in three movements and employs one and two solo violins. It is scored for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, three horns, kettle-drum, solo violins and the usual strings.

—Copyright, Mishkin Studio.
MARGARET MATZENAUER.

The other work which is new to Philadelphia is Borodin's Symphony in B Minor, No. 2. It was written during the years 1871-77, and had first performance in St. Petersburg on February 15, 1877. Borodin, who was born in 1834, and died in 1887, belonged to that Chauvinistic school of Russian musicians which rejected Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky as non-Russian and found most eloquent expression in Rimsky-Korsakoff. Although older than Balakireff, Borodin was that musician's pupil. Borodin's vocation was medicine and surgery, and music was his avocation. Curiously enough, from 1862 to the day of his death he was a teacher of chemistry in the Academy of St. Petersburg. None the less, he devoted much time to music, writing in all its forms. His music was always [133]

Address: New York.

Date JAN 9 1913

GERHARDT'S SINGING DELIGHTS BIG AUDIENCE

stablis

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, was heard in its third concert last night by an audience which filled Carnegie Hall. Mme. Matzenauer was unable to appear as soloist, and in her place was Elena Gerhardt, who on the same date last year made her first appearance in America. In many essentials Miss Gerhardt, who has just arrived for another tour, proved herself one of the finest artists heard this season, and there seemed much growth since she was last heard. He voice is exceedingly pure, and her production and coloring seem much improved. It would be difficult to offer any better interpretations than hers in two old Italian arias and three songs of Richard Strauss, all sung with orchestral accompaniment, Strauss himself having orchestrated "Morgen" and "Caecilie."

Dr. Muck devoted himself to modern works, opening with Max Reger's "Concerto in Ancient Style," part of which was interesting, but much was dull. The remaining numbers were from Russian composers, including an effective 'Overture Solenelle," by Glazounow, and Borodin's second symphony. The Glazounow number might better have been called overture triomphale, for so it was in spirit. It was full of beautiful themes, some of which in the present day, when anything approaching melody is regarded as "banale," might be designated by the Germans as "Zuckersuss." It was played with rich color effects.

Borodin, whose name has figured on the programmes of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, is a modern Russian who died as late as 1887, and his second symphony, with its national color and haunting folk melodies, has much that is of interest and beauty. Dr. Muck and his admirable organization found all of these beauties.

The programme on Saturday afternoon will open with the Brahms symphony No. 2, and Miss Farrar will be the soloist.

---

om PRESS

ddress: New York

te

Elena Gerhardt Heard with Boston Symphony

1884

Elena Gerhardt replaced the indisposed Margarete Matzenauer at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The famous singer, who was heard here for the first time since she appeared last spring in the Metropolitan Opera House with Arthur Nikisch, sang Strauss's "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Caecilie" and several other numbers.

Dr. Karl Muck's most interesting offering came at the beginning of the programme, Reger's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," opus 123, a work which had its first public performance in New York, though the Philharmonic Society had produced it recently at one of its private concerts in the Waldorf-Astoria.

Glazounoff's Ouverture Solennelle, opus 73, which separated Mme. Gerhardt's two groups of songs, introduced a note of pompous banality into the programme, for which Borodin's unimportant Symphony in B minor, No. 2, presented at the close of the evening's proceedings, offered little compensation.

From WORLD

Address: New York JAN [illegible]

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

E , 1884

Max Reger's concerto for orchestra, written in the ancient style, had its first general public performance in America in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck. It proved grateful music to the ear in the second movement.

The first movement seemed labored and made-to-order and ending in a manner contrary to the accepted laws of harmony left a queer impression. Borodin's second symphony in B minor and Glazounow's "Solennelle" overture were the other instrumental works, and each received admirable treatment.

Advertis

From EVG. STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 8 - 1913

Boston Symphony.

Establi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has succeeded in holding a place of eminent distinction in the musical world for so many years, was heard in Washington yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck did not appear, his place being filled by Otto Urack, first cellist and assistant conductor. Particular interest attached to the Max Reger number, which, like the remainder of the program, was performed in a manner to claim the most admiring consideration.

From EVG. STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 5 - 1913

Boston Symphony January 7.

Estal 4

For the January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 Dr. Muck has arranged a program in the atmosphere of the eighteenth century. Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano, is to be the soloist. Her first number will be two Italian arias, "Il mio bel fuoco," by Marcello and "O del mio dolce ardor," by Gluck. Her second number will be three very modern songs by Richard Strauss, the accompaniments to which he himself orchestrated. These are "Morgan," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie."

The Reger concerto in ancient style had its first performance in Frankfort-on-the-Main last October. Reger has followed [illegible] the model established by Bach and [illegible] contemporaries. The other orchestral

---

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

E , 1884

Matzenauer Ill and Flutist Maquarre Is the Soloist.

PROGRAM.

1. Reger—Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra, Op. 123
2. Bach—Suite in B Minor for Flute and Strings.
   A. Maquarre, Soloist.
3. Brahms—Academy Festival Overture, Op. 80.
4. Borodin—Symphony No. 2 in B Minor.

Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist........................A. Maquarre

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of its season's concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program which had to be changed from the one announced, owing to the illness of Madame Matzenauer, who was to have been the soloist. Instead of a vocal soloist, who was to have sung a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and an aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," the first flute of the Orchestra, A. Maquarre, substituted, and played the long suite in seven movements in B minor by Bach. The change in no way interfered with the usual enjoyment of a Boston symphony concert, for too rarely is the flute heard in solo, especially when so admirably played as by Maquarre.

The Bach Suite covers a wide range of musical expression, from the largo overture to the Badineria finish, including a minuet and polonaise movement. The latter half of the suite is the most brilliant part of it, but the flutist played with so much expression and delicate sweetness that every part of it was thoroughly enjoyed, and every movement was enthusiastically applauded, and at its finish Maquarre had to bow repeatedly to the appreciation displayed.

Reger Concerto New.

The Reger concerto, which opened the concert, is a composition new to this city, as was also the Symphony, which closed the program. Only as recently as October the Reger number was first played in public in Frankford-on-the-Main, and yet apparently in its construction it might date back at least a century, for it is arranged in the ancient style of orchestra composition, although with all the skill of the modern composer, with the present big and broad field for selection before him.

It is in three movements, the first having two solo violins that carry the theme. The entire work, while uninspiring, nevertheless presents delightful harmony, which graduates up and down in a simple but most effective way. Dr. Muck conducted it most admirably, bringing out fully the intent of the composer to show how an ancient idea in music would be handled by a member of the modern school.

New Symphony Brilliant.

The Borodin Symphony is a most elaborately orchestrated and studied work, combining a great variety of thought gleaned for other purposes, but combined in this one elaborate composition in four movements. It is generally brilliant, and especially so in its finale, although the andante movement is most tuneful and odd, in which the horn sings the old song of the troubadours and the clarinet, with harp accompaniment, gives the introductory passages.

The other number on the program was the familiar Academic Festival overture, one of the brightest of all the Brahms shorter numbers. With each concert the Boston Orchestra is showing more improvement under the masterly baton of Dr. Muck, and they have never played here better than last evening. Their next concert will be given on Monday evening, February 17, with Max Pauer, pianist, as sololist.

Reger—Concerto in Ancient Style.
Mozart—Aria of Sextus from "Titus."
Brahms—"Academic Festival" Overture.
Beethoven—"Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin?" from "Fidelio."
Borodin—Symphony in B Minor No. 2.
Soloist—Madam Matzenauer.

* * *

Philadelphia should have a keen appetite for opera on Tuesday evening, when, after an interval of three weeks, the Metropolitan Opera Company will pay another visit to this city, singing Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Caruso, who will sing the role of Enzo, will make his second appearance here this season. The title role will be entrusted to Emmy Destinn, while Mme. Matzenauer will be the Laura. The blind Mother will be impersonated by Maria Duchene. An interesting feature of the cast will be the Barnaba of the Franco-Algerian baritone, Dinh-Gilly. The Spanish basso cantante, Andrea De Segurola, will act the part of Alvise. The performance will include the beautiful ballet "The Dance of the Hours." Giorgio Polacco will conduct.

* * *

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 5 - 1913

Date 104

REGER CONCERTO FOR ORCHESTRA

Est 1884

Madam Matzenauer With Boston Symphony and Also in Cast of "La Gioconda."

CARUSO AND DESTINN

Thaddeus Rich as Soloist With Local Organization—Fellowship Club's Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, presents as soloist Madam Matzenauer, the extraordinary mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard here then for the first time in concert. She will sing the Sextus aria "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the great aria of Leonora in "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher: wo eilst du hin?"

The orchestral numbers include two works quite new to Philadelphia, one of them a novelty in every sense of the word. This is Max Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style for Orchestra, opus 123. Reger is one of the most interesting musical personalities of the time. He is a man of prodigious musical learning, and is a contrapuntist of extraordinary skill. His works often in the past have displayed his skill at the expense of melodic value. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and has clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach. The work was first produced in Frankfort on October 4 of last year, and the Philharmonic Society, of New York, gave the composition at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on November 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, on December 13 and 14. The work is in three movements and employs one and two solo violins. It is scored for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, three horns, kettle-drum, solo violins and the usual strings.

—Copyright, Mishkin Studio.
MARGARET MATZENAUER.

The other work which is new to Philadelphia is Borodin's Symphony in B Minor, No. 2. It was written during the years 1871-77, and had first performance in St. Petersburg on February 15, 1877. Borodin, who was born in 1834, and died in 1887, belonged to that Chauvinistic school of Russian musicians which rejected Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky as non-Russian and found most eloquent expression in Rimsky-Korsakoff. Although older than Balakireff, Borodin was that musician's pupil. Borodin's vocation was medicine and surgery, and music was his avocation. Curiously enough, from 1862 to the day of his death he was a teacher of chemistry in the Academy of St. Petersburg. None the less, he devoted much time to music, writing in all its [illegible] form. His music was always

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 1913

Estal ... 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WORTHY OF GREAT PRAISE

Orchestra and Soloists Heard by Large Audience at National Theater.

A large and noteworthy audience greeted Dr. Otto Urack yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, where the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The program was distinguished not only by the choice and arrangement of composers, but by the association of two soloists, Andre Maquerre, flutist, and Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

Mr. Urack conducted with earnestness, and the orchestra played with ease a long and exacting program. The three groups by Reger, Bach and Mozart challenged admiration, respectively, for the tone production, the tempo, and the sweetness achieved, though this division of qualities is not hard and fast. The Concerto of Reger is called "in the ancient style of orchestra."

Work Is Modern.

In this modern composer's work, beautiful as much of it is, modulation is difficult to recognize, and if so, how much more difficult to produce by the various instrumentalists.

Such music was an excellent foil for the Suite, No. 2, of Bach, which followed—a Suite in B minor for flute and strings. The effect of the flute playing of Mr. Maquerre to the accompaniment of the strings must have been heard to be appreciated. The silvery tones of the flute and the sweet music of the strings moved through the Rondo, the Sarabande and Polonaise, the Minuet and other movements, giving Bach's well defined motifs with grace and precision. The Polonaise was a lovely duet. In the presto the flute part was allowed to caper, quite as though it had become an ancient pipe and had caught the spirit of the young players on the greensward.

Prolonged applause attested the enjoyment of this selection by the audience. Between the orchestra's first and second groups, Miss Gerhardt sang two old Italian songs, and later she gave a German group by Strauss. She was well received, and gave much pleasure by her wonderful voice and presence. Though she is an American, she shows the Saxon strain, and has studied much in Germany, and has sung with symphony orchestras in London and other European cities.

Effect of Contralto.

Called a soprano, she nevertheless produces the effect of a contralto, for her songs are set in a low key, and her voice, while clear, has in the lower register all the charm of a contralto. She sings in sustained style. Her choice yesterday was good, for her voice is well adapted to express feeling, as in Wagner's "Wiegenlied" and the Gluck number.

Mozart's Symphany in C major concluded the concert. The Allegro movement had the most familiarity, and the Andante Cantabile was, perhaps, the most beautiful. Praise of an effect always means praise of the ones who produce it. One cannot imagine a better interpretation than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 - 1913

Es ... 1884

URACK AS CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

First 'Cellist Appears in Place of Dr. Muck—Reger Composition on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, was not one of pure lyric sweetness, but none the less the most interesting one could well imagine. Max Reger, Bach, Richard Strauss, and Mozart, were the composers.

To the surprise of the audience Dr. Muck did not appear, but Mr. Otto Urack took his place. Mr. Urack came over from Berlin this fall with Dr. Muck under contract as first 'cellist, instead of Mr. Schroeder, who had resigned. Mr. Urack formerly conducted an orchestra in Barmen, Germany, and gave up a five-year contract in Berlin to come to America. Mr. Urack holds the position, in addition to first 'cellist, of assistant conductor to Dr. Muck, a quite new arrangement in this country. He has conducted several concerts in America this fall and he proved himself yesterday to be a careful and intelligent reader of the score. Especially in the Bach suite and the songs, the concerted playing with the flute and the accompaniment to the lieder was accomplished with sympathetic understanding.

Whether it was coincidence or by design that the Bach of the eighteenth century—the great Bach—was placed side by side on the same programme with his disciple of the twentieth is not impor

[illegible] Max Reger is not understood in America is not to say much, for he is not understood anywhere. There is much "confusion of expert opinion" everywhere about him. There are those who find him "quite wonderful"—greater than his master. There are others—equally qualified to judge—who "cannot in the least understand what his music is all about." One thing is certain about the Reger music. It is written in strict classical form, and that it is a revival of the pure contrapuntal is also clear. Those who do not like Reger say he takes too much freedom with his harmonic progressions; moreover, that he writes music of unnecessary difficulty; that it is not worth the tremendous trouble.

Reger is a most prolific writer, the number of his compositions approaching the 100 mark. The "Concerto in Ancient Style," one of his very recent works, was first performed in the fall of 1912 at Frankfort-on-the-Main. It was heard in this country for the first time in November in Boston. Mr. Urack conducted the performance. It was given yesterday in Philadelphia, Dr. Much conducting. The concerto has few well-marked themes in the first movement, and there are many nuances of modulation and phrasing. In the second movement a melody strayed in here and there, and these were of exceeding beauty. The last movement was an interesting fugal piece. It must be said that clear threads of melody are rare, and that the harmonies, in a great measure, blur and confuse the melodic threads.

In the Bach suite of six old dances and an overture there is no doubt about the title to ancient style. The sarabande and bourree, at least, are of a respectable antiquity. The question of pace and of strict, direct even tempo always arises in the interpretation of these old dances by modern players. Mr. Andre Maquarre, flutist, played the solo part in these dances with exquisite delicacy.

Miss Elena Gerhardt sang five songs, two old Italian arias and three songs by Richard Strauss. Each of her songs was a clear-cut gem. There was no slurring over of the words. Miss Gerhardt's greatest effort is directed simply to the understanding of the subleties of the text. She makes the song vital, not only by artistry of voice, but she sings the words so that the listener can hear and understand them. This is her art; to make the poet's intent vital with meaning. She has something to say and sings as if she had; she tells a story in every song. Her voice is not extraordinary, but is controlled, even and clear, that is all. Her greatest skill is directed to the poet's utterance.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Es ... , 1884

MR. COREY INTERPRETS THE REGER CONCERTO

Lecture Recital on To-night's Programme of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon N. J. Corey, of Detroit, gave the lecture recital on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the opera house of that building this evening. He omitted all interpretation of the vocal music and was able only to discuss the Reger "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," opus 123, because he could not obtain the music in advance of the lecture recital. There is but one copy in the United States. That was brought here from Germany by Dr. Muck. It belongs to him and was loaned by him to Stransky when that conductor wished to present it. It is being used in this series of concerts by the orchestra, and the programme, because of Dr. Muck's illness, was arranged at so late a date that copy could not be prepared. Musical illustrations, therefore, were of Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Josef Taydn," opus 56A, and Mozart's "Symphony in C major, with fugue finale. 'Jupiter,'" to which thematic study was given.

After speaking of the difficult with which anything new in any form of art makes its way, Mr. Corey mentioned the frequent comment that great men in art "are not good business men," and said that they are. For their art is their business. They are good in it. Finance is not the only business. He expressed the hope that Americans will "maintain a cosmopolitan attitude toward music," and listen to whatever is new with an unprejudiced mind. Reger has been much criticised. He "has a dangerous fertility" in writing, having published an unusually large number of works, to which he is continually adding. Intensely individual, he was said to have built his musical expression on study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms and this concerto is, while modern, remarkably reminiscent of the style which the title sets forth. It was performed for the first time at Frankfort-on-the-Main, on Oct. 4, 1912, and for the first time in this country at an invitation concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, on Nov. 19, last.

Both concert and lecture recital are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN

Establ

BOSTON SYMPHO

Maquarre the Soloist in Ba for Flute and String

1. Reger: Concerto in Ancient Syle, tra.
2. Bach: Suite in B minor, for flute ar A. Maquarre, soloist.
3. Brahms: Academic Festival Overt
4. Borodin: Symphony No. 2, B mi

Though the first work on the gramme that allured a large audience to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening was denominated a "Concerto in Ancient Style," one could not acept the qualifying adjective "ancient" in the full weight of its literal sense. There was more than an infiltration of modernity. By an eleventh hour contretemps—one cannot say an ill wind, for Mr. Maquarre's flute was too beautifully played—Madame Matzenauer, the soloist announced, was unable to sing, and the Bach suite substituted instead with the flute for prima donna showed the source of Max Reger's fundamental inspiration and wherein the latter-day master departs from the austere tradition of the patriarch. It is as though Mr. Reger started out with a firm New Year's resolve to deliver his message in terms of the first half of the 18th century but presently found his virtue tottering in favor of contemporary musical idioms. The writing was not especially radical or perverse; there were episodes of splendid buoyancy and vigor; the racing violin of Mr. Witek sang gloriously in the largo, and trumpets and horns spoke out with valor in the final allegro. Yet the instruments had not marched down a dozen bars into the Bach music ere one felt the immortal vitality of the great original as compared with the bold and brilliant paraphrase. It was like turning from Pope's translation of Homer to the heroic and naive simplicity of the bard whom seven cities claimed.

Mr. Marquarre, whose brother is flutist in our own orchestra, is without a superior in this country as a performer upon the elusive and capricious instrument of his choice. His modesty is equal to his art; he does not obtrude the ego; he is one of the players who make it seem the easiest thing in the world for the merest tyro to do likewise. The "Badinerie" of the seventh and last division of the work was rippled off so gracefully that many recalls were the inevitable sequel.

As "ancient" somewhat belies the work of Reger, so "academic" proves a rather misleading designation for the Brahms overture when read by a leader who imparts to the dextrous medley of German student airs such Sousa-like swing and fervor as Dr. Karl Muck gave to it last night. The brass-band suggestion is not profane, for Brahms wrote the overture in a frankly jovial if not convivial temper after the more sedate introductory measures.

Much of the Borodin symphony was received with respectful admiration rather than rapture by the audience; plangent Oriental themes and Cossack dancing ditties have their own fierce element of barbaric fascination, but they do not go to the heart like the melting pathos of Tschaikowsky's utterances. What the hearers wanted and expected in the way of Russian music came to the fore in the Andante, with the harp and lonely horn, the oboe and the tremolo of the violins voicing the characteristic melancholy that lies like a weight upon the soul of Russian music.

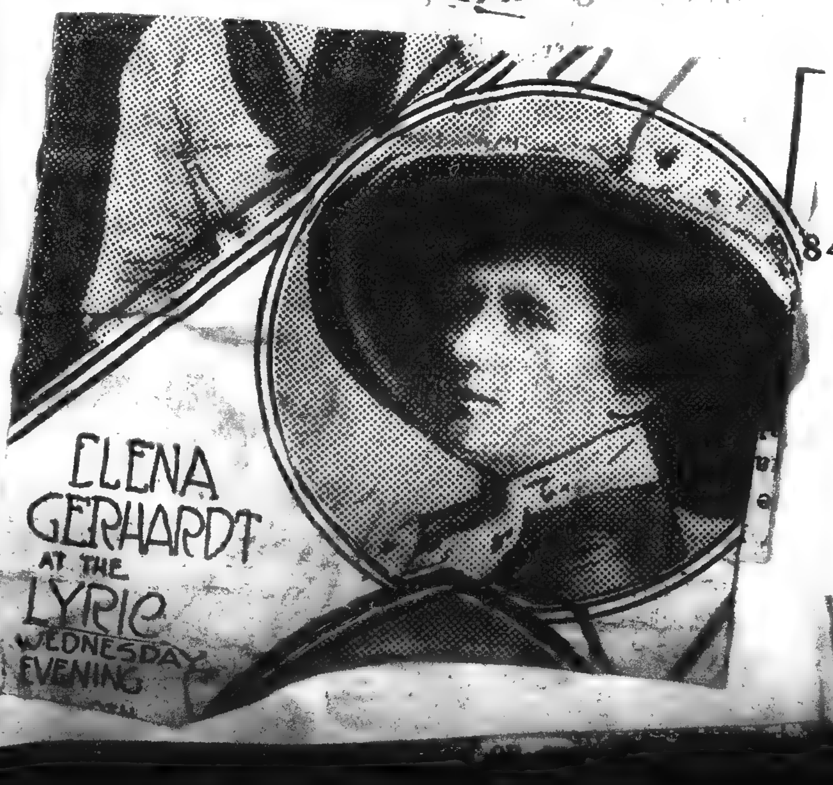
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Establish ... 4

There will be a classical piano and violin program given next Friday afternoon at the Von Ende School of Music, by Anton Witek, concertmeister, and Heinrich Warnke, cellist, of the Boston Symphony, and Vita Witek, the Berlin pianiste. Bach, Bethoven, Bruch and Brahms (the four big B's) will be represented by sonato, song, concerto and fugue.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 5 1913



84

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date JAN 7 - 1913

Esta ... 84

The Boston Orchestra

A. Maquarre, Flutist, Heard in Program Marked by Two Novelties

The eleventh-hour announcement that Mme. Matzenauer, who was to have been the assisting artiste, could not sing because of illness, disappointed many music lovers who went to the Academy of Music last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the season. To take the place of the necessarily omitted number, Dr. Muck chose Bach's beautiful and seldom-heard Suite in B-minor for flute and strings with A. Maquarre, first flutist of the orchestra, playing the solo instrument. It was on the whole a happy choice, for Mr. Maquarre is a virtuoso of fine attainments, and he interpreted the quaint melodies of the master with becoming grace and ease. The agility of his fingering and his breath control were, at times, little short of astonishing, particularly in the Badinere Presto, the last of the seven movements of the Suite, and the audience, judging from the heartiness of its applause, was thoroughly delighted.

The remainder of the program consisted of two compositions never heard here before—Reger's Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra and Borodin's Symphony in B-minor. Brahms's interesting but uninspired Academic Festival Overture, a musical melange of German student-songs, woven together on a thread of skillful orchestration, was thrown in for good measure.

The symphony is a work of striking originality, broad in conception and rich in color, but rather too characteristically Russian in its inspiration to carry a universal message. Though written in the symphonic form, to which it rigidly adheres, it is essentially program music, for it attempts to paint a musical picture of the ancient Russian Knights in their warlike conquests and their barbaric diversions. Its themes are, for the most part, rough and primitive, and its rhythms heavily-stressed and insistent, so much so, in fact, that at times, as in the allegro, they tend to become monotonous. The composer's originality is best shown in the scherzo, where, with simple material, he achieves remarkable effects by a daring use of syncopation, embellished with color lavishly borrowed from nearly every instrument in the orchestra. There are moments of gentle feeling in the andante, in which the horn sings a troubadour song against a humming of strings, but even here the sentiment is bizarre rather than pensive or sweet, and is soon lost in the sweep and rush of the finale into which it merges without a pause. The work abounds in difficulties for conductor and musicians alike, but these, it is needless to say, were as if they were not to Dr. Muck and his men.

Reger's Concerto, though arranged in the ancient style of composition, is the work of a thorough modern, to whom color is of as much consequence as form. It consists of three movements: Allegro Con Spirito, Largo and Allegro, and is notable, rather for cleverness than for inspiration. Indeed, it is really a tour de force whose appeal will be to the musically-learned rather than to the mere amateur. The allegro is an arabesque of themes interwoven in marvelous counterpoint, in which the solo violin, gracefully played last night by Mr. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, discourses fluently with the solo flute. The most pleasing movement is the largo where two solo violins are used to obtain a pleasing effect.

◆

The Principle of Arbitration

the gallery ... st time months, and ... w on through every Wednesday and Saturday, from o'clock until 4, the exhibit will be the mecca of thousands of discerning people, who realize just how splendid a treat one may enjoy and who believe in seizing Opportunity when it brushes near them.

Beauty in Many Forms.

Any attempt to describe in a limited space even a small part of the rooms full of paintings of every school, bronzes, statues and statuettes, tapestries, ivories, jades and scores of other objects of artistic value, must prove futile. From the time that one passes the deferential colored attendant at the door, checks his hat and coat at the desk and ascends the marble steps leading to the first floor to secure his initial peep at the splendid

---

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 - 1913

Es ... 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, as soloist, and with two works of importance new to Baltimore, the third Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening promises to have unusual interest for the musical public. Her first number will be two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and one by Gluck; and then she will sing three of Richard Strauss' finest songs—Morgen, Wiegenlied and Caecilie—to orchestral accompaniments arranged by the composer himself. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Reger—Concerto in ancient style. Old Italian arias—Marcello, Il mio bel fuoco; Gluck, O del mio dolce ardor. Brahms—Academic Festival overture. Strauss—Three songs, with orchestra—Morgen, Wiegenlied, Caecilie. Borodin—Symphony in B Minor, No. 2. Soloist—Miss Elena Gerhardt.

IC

[134]

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 - 1913

Estal

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WORTHY OF GREAT PRAISE

Orchestra and Soloists Heard by Large Audience at National Theater.

A large and noteworthy audience greeted Dr. Otto Urack yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, where the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The program was distinguished not only by the choice and arrangement of composers, but by the association of two soloists, Andre Maquerre, flutist, and Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

Mr. Urack conducted with earnestness, and the orchestra played with ease a long and exacting program. The three groups by Reger, Bach and Mozart challenged admiration, respectively, for the tone production, the tempo, and the sweetness achieved, though this division of qualities is not hard and fast. The Concerto of Reger is called "in the ancient style of orchestra."

Work Is Modern.

In this modern composer's work, beautiful as much of it is, modulation is difficult to recognize, and if so, how much more difficult to produce by the various instrumentalists.

Such music was an excellent foil for the Suite, No. 2, of Bach, which followed—a Suite in B minor for flute and strings. The effect of the flute playing of Mr. Maquerre to the accompaniment of the strings must have been heard to be appreciated. The silvery tones of the flute and the sweet music of the strings moved through the Rondo, the Sarabande and Polonaise, the Minuet and other movements, giving Bach's well defined motifs with grace and precision. The Polonaise was a lovely duet. In the presto the flute part was allowed to caper, quite as though it had become an ancient pipe and had caught the spirit of the young players on the greensward.

Prolonged applause attested the enjoyment of this selection by the audience. Between the orchestra's first and second groups, Miss Gerhardt sang two old Italian songs, and later she gave a German group by Strauss. She was well received, and gave much pleasure by her wonderful voice and presence. Though she is an American, she shows the Saxon strain, and has studied much in Germany, and has sung with symphony orchestras in London and other European cities.

Effect of Contralto.

Called a soprano, she nevertheless produces the effect of a contralto, for her songs are set in a low key, and her voice, while clear, has in the lower register all the charm of a contralto. She sings in sustained style. Her choice yesterday was good, for her voice is well adapted to express feeling, as in Wagner's "Wiegenlied" and the Gluck number.

Mozart's Symphany in C major concluded the concert. The Allegro movement had the most familiarity, and the Andante Cantabile was, perhaps, the most beautiful. Praise of an effect always means praise of the ones who produce it. One cannot imagine a better interpretation than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 - 1913

URACK AS CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Es 1884

First 'Cellist Appears in Place of Dr. Muck—Reger Composition on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, was not one of pure lyric sweetness, but none the less the most interesting one could well imagine. Max Reger, Bach, Richard Strauss, and Mozart, were the composers.

To the surprise of the audience Dr. Muck did not appear, but Mr. Otto Urack took his place. Mr. Urack came over from Berlin this fall with Dr. Muck under contract as first 'cellist, instead of Mr. Schroeder, who had resigned. Mr. Urack formerly conducted an orchestra in Barmen, Germany, and gave up a five-year contract in Berlin to come to America. Mr. Urack holds the position, in addition to first 'cellist, of assistant conductor to Dr. Muck, a quite new arrangement in this country. He has conducted several concerts in America this fall and he proved himself yesterday to be a careful and intelligent reader of the score. Especially in the Bach suite and the songs, the concerted playing with the flute and the accompaniment to the lieder was accomplished with sympathetic understanding.

Whether it was coincidence or by design that the Bach of the eighteenth century—the great Bach—was placed side by side on the same programme with his disciple of the twentieth is not impor

...say that Max Reger is not understood in America is not to say much, for he is not understood anywhere. There is much "confusion of expert opinion" everywhere about him. There are those who find him "quite wonderful"—greater than his master. There are others—equally qualified to judge—who "cannot in the least understand what his music is all about." One thing is certain about the Reger music. It is written in strict classical form, and that it is a revival of the pure contrapuntal is also clear. Those who do not like Reger say he takes too much freedom with his harmonic progressions; moreover, that he writes music of unnecessary difficulty; that it is not worth the tremendous trouble.

Reger is a most prolific writer, the number of his compositions approaching the 100 mark. The "Concerto in Ancient Style," one of his very recent works, was first performed in the fall of 1912 at Frankfort-on-the-Main. It was heard in this country for the first time in November in Boston. Mr. Urack conducted the performance. It was given yesterday in Philadelphia, Dr. Much conducting. The concerto has few well-marked themes in the first movement, and there are many nuances of modulation and phrasing. In the second movement a melody strayed in here and there, and these were of exceeding beauty. The last movement was an interesting fugal piece. It must be said that clear threads of melody are rare, and that the harmonies, in a great measure, blur and confuse the melodic threads.

In the Bach suite of six old dances and an overture there is no doubt about the title to ancient style. The sarabande and bourree, at least, are of a respectable antiquity. The question of pace and of strict, direct even tempo always arises in the interpretation of these old dances by modern players. Mr. Andre Maquarre, flutist, played the solo part in these dances with exquisite delicacy.

Miss Elena Gerhardt sang five songs, two old Italian arias and three songs by Richard Strauss. Each of her songs was a clear-cut gem. There was no slurring over of the words. Miss Gerhardt's greatest effort is directed simply to the understanding of the subleties of the text. She makes the song vital, not only by artistry of voice, but she sings the words so that the listener can hear and understand them. This is her art; to make the poet's intent vital with meaning. She has something to say and sings as if she had; she tells a story in every song. Her voice is not extraordinary, but is controlled, even and clear, that is all. Her greatest skill is directed to the poet's utterance.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Es 1884

MR. COREY INTERPRETS THE REGER CONCERTO

Lecture Recital on To-night's Programme of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon N. J. Corey, of Detroit, gave the lecture recital on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the opera house of that building this evening. He omitted all interpretation of the vocal music and was able only to discuss the Reger "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," opus 123, because he could not obtain the music in advance of the lecture recital. There is but one copy in the United States. That was brought here from Germany by Dr. Muck. It belongs to him and was loaned by him to Stransky when that conductor wished to present it. It is being used in this series of concerts by the orchestra, and the programme, because of Dr. Muck's illness, was arranged at so late a date that copy could not be prepared. Musical illustrations, therefore, were of Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Josef Taydn," opus 56A, and Mozart's "Symphony in C major, with fugue finale, 'Jupiter,'" to which thematic study was given.

After speaking of the difficulty with which anything new in any form of art makes its way, Mr. Corey mentioned the frequent comment that great men in art "are not good business men," and said that they are. For their art is their business. They are good in it. Finance is not the only business. He expressed the hope that Americans will "maintain a cosmopolitan attitude toward music," and listen to whatever is new with an unprejudiced mind. Reger has been much criticised. He "has a dangerous fertility" in writing, having published an unusually large number of works, to which he is continually adding. Intensely individual, he was said to have built his musical expression on study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms and this concerto is, while modern, remarkably reminiscent of the style which the title sets forth. It was performed for the first time at Frankfort-on-the-Main, on Oct. 4, 1912, and for the first time in this country at an invitation concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, on Nov. 19, last.

Both concert and lecture recital are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 7 - 1913

Establ

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Maquarre the Soloist in Bach Suite for Flute and Strings.

1. Reger: Concerto in Ancient Syle, for orchestra.
2. Bach: Suite in B minor, for flute and strings. A. Maquarre, soloist.
3. Brahms: Academic Festival Overture.
4. Borodin: Symphony No. 2, B minor.

Though the first work on the programme that allured a large audience to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening was denominated a "Concerto in Ancient Style," one could not acept the qualifying adjective "ancient" in the full weight of its literal sense. There was more than an infiltration of modernity. By an eleventh hour contretemps—one cannot say an ill wind, for Mr. Maquarre's flute was too beautifully played—Madame Matzenauer, the soloist announced, was unable to sing, and the Bach suite substituted instead with the flute for prima donna showed the source of Max Reger's fundamental inspiration and wherein the latter-day master departs from the austere tradition of the patriarch. It is as though Mr. Reger started out with a firm New Year's resolve to deliver his message in terms of the first half of the 18th century but presently found his virtue tottering in favor of contemporary musical idioms. The writing was not especially radical or perverse; there were episodes of splendid buoyancy and vigor; the racing violin of Mr. Witek sang gloriously in the largo, and trumpets and horns spoke out with valor in the final allegro. Yet the instruments had not marched down a dozen bars into the Bach music ere one felt the immortal vitality of the great original as compared with the bold and brilliant paraphrase. It was like turning from Pope's translation of Homer to the heroic and naive simplicity of the bard whom seven cities claimed.

Mr. Marquarre, whose brother is flutist in our own orchestra, is without a superior in this country as a performer upon the elusive and capricious instrument of his choice. His modesty is equal to his art; he does not obtrude the ego; he is one of the players who make it seem the easiest thing in the world for the merest tyro to do likewise. The "Badinerie" of the seventh and last division of the work was rippled off so gracefully that many recalls were the inevitable sequel.

1884

As "ancient" somewhat belies the work of Reger, so "academic" proves a rather misleading designation for the Brahms overture when read by a leader who imparts to the dextrous medley of German student airs such Sousa-like swing and fervor as Dr. Karl Muck gave to it last night. The brass-band suggestion is not profane, for Brahms wrote the overture in a frankly jovial if not convivial temper after the more sedate introductory measures.

Much of the Borodin symphony was received with respectful admiration rather than rapture by the audience; plangent Oriental themes and Cossack dancing ditties have their own fierce element of barbaric fascination, but they do not go to the heart like the melting pathos of Tschaikowsky's utterances. What the hearers wanted and expected in the way of Russian music came to the fore in the Andante, with the harp and lonely horn, the oboe and the tremolo of the violins voicing the characteristic melancholy that lies like a weight upon the soul of Russian music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date JAN 5 - 1913

There will be a classical piano and lin program given next Friday afoon at the Von Ende School of by Anton Witek, concertmeis-Heinrich Warnke, cellist, of n Symphony, and Vita Witek, pianiste. Bach, Bethoven,
Brahms (the four big B's) esented by sonato, song
d fugue.

be ope to learn the Easter tour

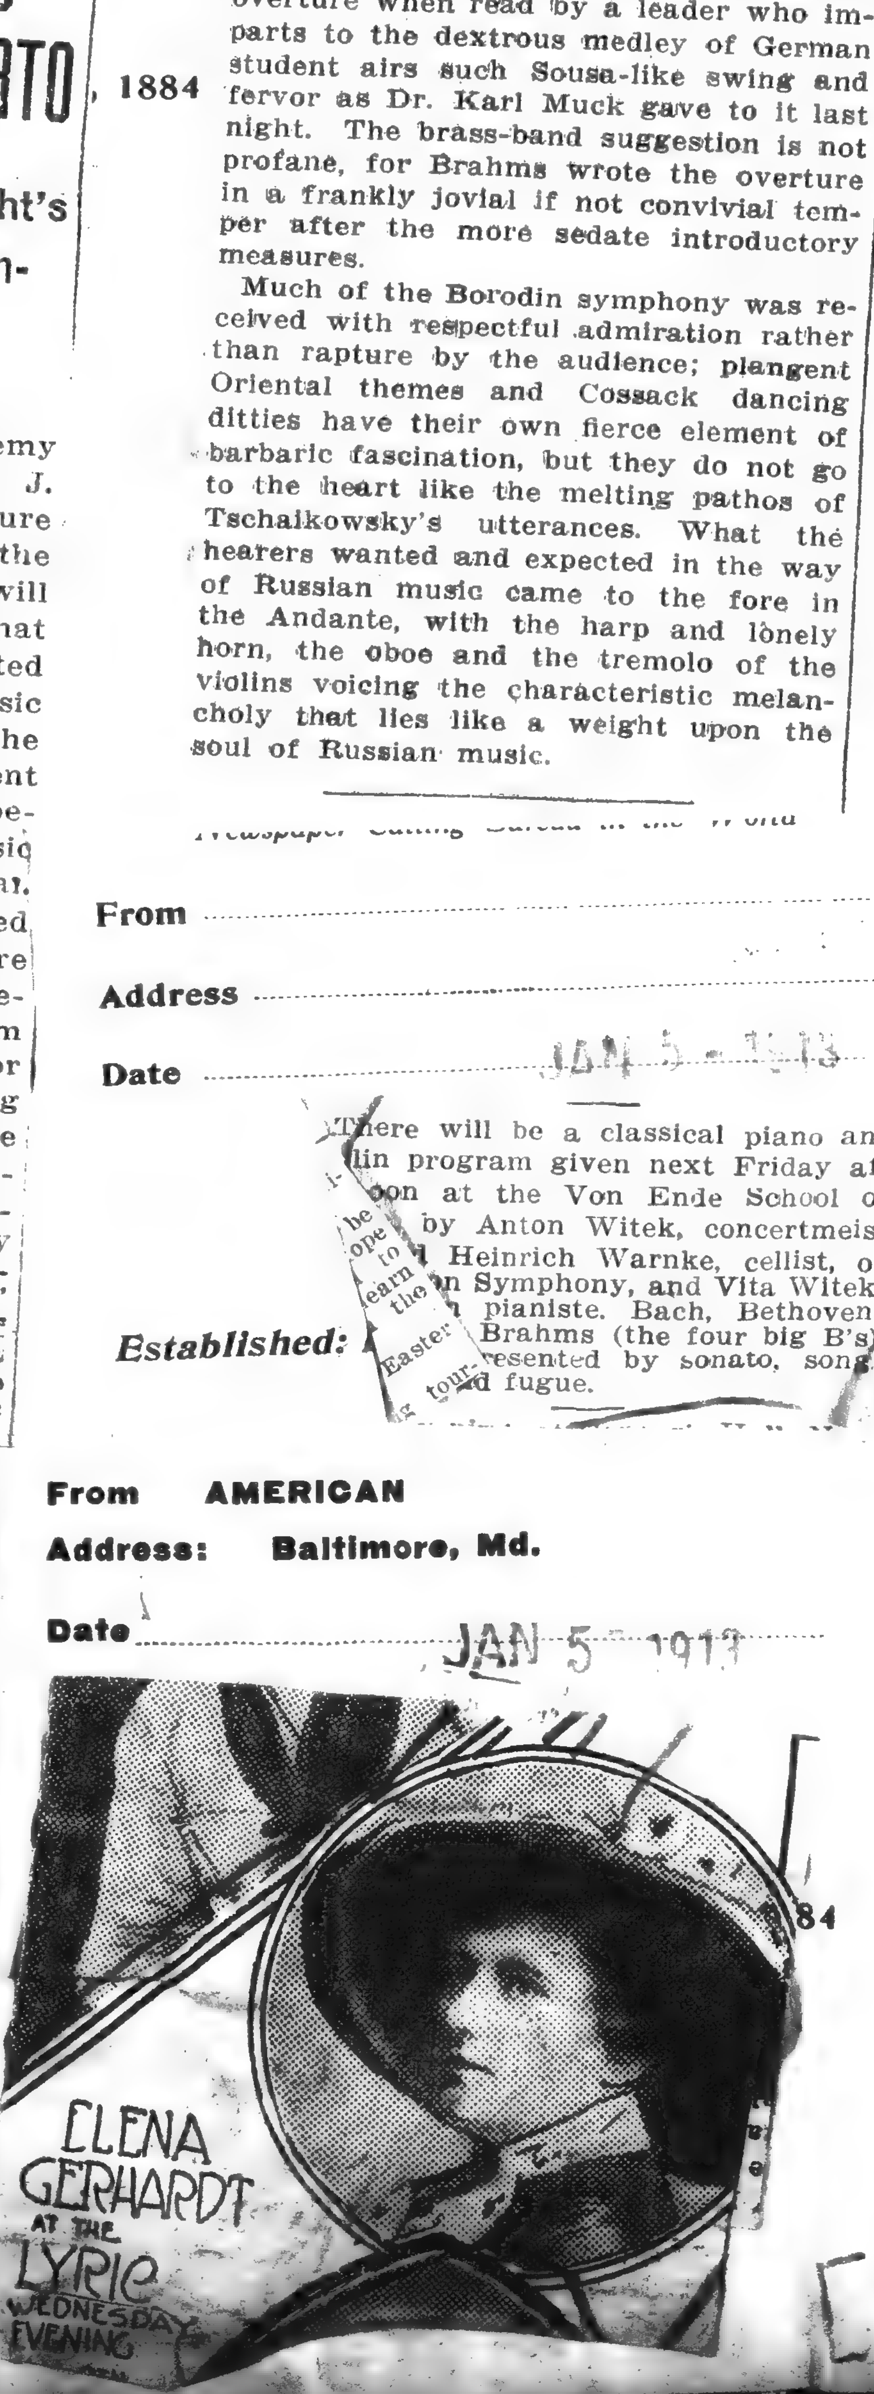
Established: 4

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 5 1913



1884

LLETIN
ADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 7 - 1913

84

Orchestra

Heard in Program by Two Novelties

hour announcement that nauer, who was to have been artiste, could not sing be illness, disappointed many music who went to the Academy of last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the season. To take the place of the necessarily omitted number, Dr. Muck chose Bach's beautiful and seldom-heard Suite in B-minor for flute and strings with A. Maquarre, first flutist of the orchestra, playing the solo instrument. It was on the whole a happy choice, for Mr. Maquarre is a virtuoso of fine attainments, and he interpreted the quaint melodies of the master with becoming grace and ease. The agility of his fingering and his breath control were, at times, little short of astonishing, particularly in the Badinere Presto, the last of the seven movements of the Suite, and the audience, judging from the heartiness of its applause, was thoroughly delighted.

The remainder of the program consisted of two compositions never heard here before—Reger's Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra and Borodin's Symphony in B-minor. Brahms's interesting but uninspired Academic Festival Overture, a musical melange of German student-songs, woven together on a thread of skillful orchestration, was thrown in for good measure.

The symphony is a work of striking originality, broad in conception and rich in color, but rather too characteristically Russian in its inspiration to carry a universal message. Though written in the symphonic form, to which it rigidly adheres, it is essentially program music, for it attempts to paint a musical picture of the ancient Russian Knights in their warlike conquests and their barbaric diversions. Its themes are, for the most part, rough and primitive, and its rhythms heavily-stressed and insistent, so much so, in fact, that at times, as in the allegro, they tend to become monotonous. The composer's originality is best shown in the scherzo, where, with simple material, he achieves remarkable effects by a daring use of syncopation, embellished with color lavishly borrowed from nearly every instrument in the orchestra. There are moments of gentle feeling in the andante, in which the horn sings a troubadour song against a humming of strings, but even here the sentiment is bizarre rather than pensive or sweet, and is soon lost in the sweep and rush of the finale into which it merges without a pause. The work abounds in difficulties for conductor and musicians alike, but these, it is needless to say, were as if they were not to Dr. Muck and his men.

Reger's Concerto, though arranged in the ancient style of composition, is the work of a thorough modern, to whom color is of as much consequence as form. It consists of three movements: Allegro Con Spirito, Largo and Allegro, and is notable, rather for cleverness than for inspiration. Indeed, it is really a tour de force whose appeal will be to the musically-learned rather than to the mere amateur. The allegro is an arabesque of themes interwoven in marvelous counterpoint, in which the solo violin, gracefully played last night by Mr. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, discourses fluently with the solo flute. The most pleasing movement is the largo where two solo violins are used to obtain a pleasing effect.

◆

The Principle of Arbitration

the gallery st time months, and w on through every Wednesday and Saturday, from o'clock until 4, the exhibit will be the mecca of thousands of discerning people, who realize just how splendid a treat one may enjoy and who believe in seizing Opportunity when it brushes near them.

Beauty in Many Forms.

Any attempt to describe in a limited space even a small part of the rooms full of paintings of every school, bronzes, statues and statuettes, tapestries, ivories, jades and scores of other objects of artistic value, must prove futile. From the time that one passes the deferential colored attendant at the door, checks his hat and coat at the desk and ascends the marble steps leading to the first floor to secure his initial peep at the splendid

---

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 - 1913

Es 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, as soloist, and with two works of importance new to Baltimore, the third Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening promises to have unusual interest for the musical public. Her first number will be two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and one by Gluck; and then she will sing three of Richard Strauss' finest songs—Morgen, Wiegenlied and Caecilie—to orchestral accompaniments arranged by the composer himself. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Reger—Concerto in ancient style. Old Italian arias—Marcello, Il mio bel fuoco; Gluck, O del mio dolce ardor. Brahms—Academic Festival overture. Strauss—Three songs, with orchestra—Morgen, Wiegenlied, Caecilie. Borodin—Symphony in B Minor, No. 2. Soloist—Miss Elena Gerhardt.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ....

Est 1884

ELENA GERHARDT HEARD AT LYRIC

Recall for Soprano at Third Boston Symphony Concert.

With Elena Gerhardt as soprano soloist, the third concert for the season by the Boston Symphony was given at the Lyric last evening under the able leadership of Dr. Carl Muck.

Every program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is highly educational because its plan in giving concerts is to present in the course of a season several varieties of good music without merely catering for the approval of even the best taste. Last evening the program consisted of things both new and old. The new features were somewhat tentative efforts as to the music of the future, while the old numbers were not those familiar to concert-going ears. Marcello was celebrated as the early composer of music for the Psalms, which is still most charming and elegant, and Gluck is known as the German composer who wrote French music and with it drove Italian opera out of Paris. Both of these men wrote before the music of the spheres was quite exhausted, and to each was given his blessing of true melody.

Miss Gerhardt sang both the old arias in a becoming, pure and simple style and was heartily recalled. Her success in these was greater than in the three Strauss songs, with orchestra, which, while possessing originality and melody, lack much of the charm which accompanies the best successes of the old song masters.

There is always one satisfaction in listening to a Boston Symphony rendition under Dr. Muck, in knowing that if the music does not occasion enthusiasm, it is the fault of the music and not of the orchestra or its conductor.

The Borodino symphony was written before symphony form and melody were entirely gone, and it has much of the musical vigor of the last generation. It shows the cumulative power of musical iteration, and discounts the restlessness shown in modern methods of novelty and change. It is a good work of the now old school of musical composition, and will be fresh a generation hence. Its andante is especially effective.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 1913

Establ

ELENA GERHARDT
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT
LYRIC, WED., JAN. 8TH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING WEDNESDAY

Elena Gerhardt, Soloist, And Two New Works On The Program.

With Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, as soloist and with two works of importance new to Baltimore, the third Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening promises to have unusual interest for the musical public.

Elena Gerhardt is the foremost of German concert sopranos of our day, having elected to confine her work to this more intimate branch of the art rather than go into grand opera. Her first number will be two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and one by Gluck, and then she will sing three of Richard Strauss' finest songs, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" to orchestral accompaniments arranged by the composer himself.

The two works new to Baltimore will be Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, which is a novelty in the full sense of the word, as it had its first rarely been played in this country. Reger's Concerto is really for a whole orchestra, although a solo violin is used in it incidentally.

Borodin, whose Symphony in B Minor will be heard, has been dead at least 25 years. He belonged to that branch of neo-Russians whose leaders were Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Like so many Russian composers, music to him was really an avocation, for up to the time of his death he was professor of chemistry in the Academy of St. Petersburg.

1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ....

Esta 184

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Rare Programme at Academy, With Elena Gerhardt as Solo Singer.

For the third concert of its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a programme largely made up of music in the old style. Two of the three orchestral numbers were of this character as well as one of the two groups of songs sung by Miss Elena Gerhardt, who was the soloist of the evening. It was a programme that pleasantly intimated the definite qualities of music of the olden time and illustrated wherein those qualities were good ones. The opening number for the orchestra was both new and old, inasmuch as it was a recent product of the fertile brain of Max Reger, written after the manner of some compositions by Bach and others of his day. It was the "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," which is Mr. Reger's 123d important composition, according to the opus number affixed to it. The orchestra played also Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn," and the customary symphony was Mozart's in C, generally known as the "Jupiter," which is, of course, old music of the most delightful kind.

Alternating with these numbers, Miss Gerhardt made two appearances, singing first Marcello's recitative "Il mio bel foco" and aria "Quella flamma," with the "O, del mio dolce ardor" air, from Gluck's opera "Paride ed Elena." A second group was made up of three songs by Strauss, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," and "Cecilie." These latter pieces were interpreted in a way to leave no doubt of Miss Gerhardt's forte as a singer. The old arias were well sung, but with an apparent physical effort that was a handicap. The songs were beautifully sung, with more control, and with an executive skill that made them very effective. This singer has yet to acquire the art of being less demonstrative in manner and putting all of the demonstration into the singing. Her voice has rich smoothness and solidity, with the capacity to express much. This was impressively indicated in the rendering of "Wiegenlied."

The Reger concerto is in three movements, "Allegro con spirito," "Largo" and "Allegro," and had its first performance in public as recently as October last, at Frankfort-on-the-Main. It was performed for the first time in this country at an invitation concert of the New York Philharmonic Society at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on November 19 last. It is an ingenious piece of work, in which the composer has very skillfully used the musical idiom of days of yore. Without being a direct imitation of the old fashioned concerto, it faithfully reflects in musical figures and contrapuntal devices the period to which it reverts in general style and represents a happy blend of scholarship and sensibility to the elemental charm of music. It is a modern treatment of an old form, and the hand of a strong personality is apparent in its making. After hearing it we can readily appreciate what Dr. Riemann meant when he said that Reger has won his reputation by expressing his own individuality in a language that comes from deep study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

The Brahms treatment of the Haydn theme appeals more directly to the professional musician than to most concertgoers. It is a well-known specimen of a form of composition that does not carry out its purpose of giving variations on the theme which is discernible only in the first and the last movements. The rest is a series of cleverly contrived musical subtleties expressing what Mr. Brahms could write when he was thinking of the theme without putting any of it into the music.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony is about as full of the delightful melodic frankness of this composer as a composition could be, and all its graceful, flowing tunefulness was brought out by Dr. Muck with a fine sympathetic touch that gave uncommon eloquence to its phrases. The conductor, last night, gave no evidence of the recent illness which disabled him for three weeks, and his men responded to his will with finely finished work. The concert was enjoyed by an audience that tested the seating capacity of the house.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date JAN 12 1913

Establ 84

FAREWELL OF BOSTONIANS

Miss Farrar and Orchestra Delight Capacity Audience.

The musicians from Boston—and how grateful are we these days for their journeys to this town—gave their third Saturday matinee concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There is no need to say that all who love the best in music were there—that is, all who could get in—for Major Higginson's orchestra never fails in the excellence of its offerings.

Dr. Muck chose for his symphony the Brahms No. 2, in D major, and the remnant of those who still believe the great Johannes dull must surely have found a change of heart had it been present when the Boston orchestra paid tribute to the composer's genius. Dr. Muck gave to the symphony a labor of the tenderest love, and brought out the serene beauties of the work most exquisitely. That the band responded to every call made upon it by the master is self-evident.

In the second portion of the programme Dr. Muck presented a novelty in Joseph Holbrooke's "Queen Mab," denominated "Shakespeare Poem No. 7 for grand orchestra and chorus" (ad. lib.). The chorus portion was omitted yesterday. This work, by one of England's best known younger composers and musical revolutionists, was magnificently played, and played in a manner which, had it contained less merit than it does, must have made an effect.

Yet, especially in the first movement, there was something in the fantasy of the music that was really Shakespearian, Puck chasing Ariel amid an orchestral maze. The love music of the second movement had more than one hint of Wagner, and in the dream of battle Richard Strauss had not been forgotten. But it was ever music that possessed fancy and invention, and if it was programme music it surely did not need Shakespeare's text to justify its existence. The concert closed with a most brilliant performance of Chalmer's "Espana."

But we are forgetting that there was also a singer, and when we suddenly realize that that singer was none less than Miss Geraldine Farrar, we come preciously near leze majesty. No one who has ever seen Miss Farrar at a Boston symphony concert can forget her. For these occasions she reserves her choicest. At them she appears gowned beyond the dreams of Paquin, Redfern and Worth, for in gowns as in impersonations Miss Farrar's dreams are her own. For yesterday her dream had begun in Paris, the Paris of Louis XV, a dream of a cream silk pannier gown, that blew out as she swept down to the footlights like some fair frigate with studding sails set. Then her dream had shifted, and concealing her hands was a most wonderful nineteenth century muff, while her head was surmounted with the bat-like headgear of the winter of 1912-'13.

So Miss Farrar came to us garbed in three centuries, and both she and we were very, very happy. Her songs were the recitative "Temeran" and the aria "Come scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and a recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Miss Farrar's voice was in splendid condition and she did not hesitate to make the audience acquainted with that fact.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date ....

E 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Joseph Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" Heard for the First Time.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall, was attended by an audience that crowded the house. Dr. Muck offered a list of compositions somewhat taxing in length but carefully arranged according to his programmatic ideas of not placing the strictly classical and highly romantic together in an indiscriminating fashion to the detriment of each.

Brahms's D major symphony was the mainstay of the programme. The other numbers were a recitative, "Temerari," and aria "Come scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte"; "Queen Mab" (Shakespeare) poem No. 7, for grand orchestra and chorus (ad libitum), opus 45, by Joseph Holbrooke; Azael's recitative "These joyous airs" and aria "O time that is no more" from Claude Debussy's cantata "The Prodigal Son" and the "Espana" of Chabrier. Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House was the soloist.

Mr. Holbrooke, whose one poem "Queen Mab" was heard in part for the first time here yesterday, is a young Englishman. His works already include operas, many longer orchestral and choral compositions, much chamber music and many pieces of miscellaneous character. No doubt much pertinent discussion has been raised in England concerning the merit of Mr. Holbrooke's musical output, and that he himself maintains strictly that he is a composer of gifts is stated on authority.

His poem "Queen Mab" had its first hearing in 1904 in England at the Leeds music festival. The first three parts were first given by the Boston Orchestra at its home concerts of January 3 and 4, when the fourth, or choral, section was omitted as it was yesterday.

The demands made by the orchestral score are of extreme modern elaboration, though it may also be given by small orchestras.

On the flyleaf are quotations from "Romeo and Juliet" telling of dreams, the fairies' midwife, Queen Mab and lovers, which the composer states in a note are to be taken as the best explanation of the work's content. Dr. Muck in his presentation of the composition did all possible for an unfolding of its characteristics yesterday, and his orchestra played it with all the splendid resources of technical power.

Comment upon the impression it leaves allows for mention of the extraordinarily rich and varied display of picturesque tonalities it affords, as contrasted with a manifold variety of delicate or fanciful suggestions obtained largely through color schemes.

The first part of the programme was given to the Brahms symphony. Dr. Muck, superbly supported by the orchestra, gave a finely planned performance of it and at the close of the final movement had his men share in the prolonged applause.

Miss Farrar was greeted with enthusiasm as she apeared on the platform in a bewitching, delicate costume that suggested butterflies and fireflies and finished with the accessories of a headdress of dark gaufie antenæ and a huge brown muff. Her voice was at its best and she sang the Mozart music with excellent style throughout. She was also happy in the Debussy excerpt. It is a specimen of the composer, written in his early years,

---

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date ....

Establ 884

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening was interesting in the presentation for the first time to the general New York public the Max Reger concerto, arranged in ancient style. Although previously performed by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the private concert held in the Waldorf-Astoria last fall for the benefit of the members, the character of the Reger composition was practically unknown.

Save for the second movement, which offered a suave melody, the recent Reger creation was of scant value. The opening movement, especially, wanders from one tonality to another and closes abruptly—so much so, in fact, that the audience hearing it was not aware that the end had come.

Glazounow's "Solennelle" overture, a graceful bit of writing written in fluent style, and the second Borodin symphony, which is not great music, comprised the remainder of the strictly orchestral presentations, all of which were performed under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, with that admirable tonal quality and technical facility for which the Boston musicians are distinguished. Elena Gerhardt, the German soprano, taking the place of the indisposed Margarete Matzenauer, sang two groups of songs with artistic finish and commendable if not superlative vocalism.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

Esta 384

MISS FARRAR SINGS IN GAY COSTUME

Wonderful Pink Pannier Shown at Boston Symphony Concert—Fine Programme Presented.

Carnegie Hall was filled against yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee concert of the season. Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan opera company, was the soloist. She wore an amazing pink pannier costume, a contraption that looked like a visor to shield her face, a head dress from which floated, or flapped, when she walked two huge black tulle bows, and carried a large sable muff.

After the audience had caught its breath Miss Farrar sang a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and a recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son" for her second number. She was in excellent voice and the numbers were received with much applause.

Conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra played Brahms' Second Symphony in a highly artistic manner, voicing the beauty of the adagio exquisitely and performing the following allegretto with spirit and delicacy. It also was heard in an English novelty called "Queen Mab," by Mr. Josef Holbrooke, which boasted many bizarre effects. A brilliant performance of Chabrier's "Espana," a rhapsody that breathes the very mood of dancing Spain, concluded the programme.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date JAN

Estab

GERALDINE FARRAR SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee on Saturday, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. Its most important offering was the Brahms symphony in D minor, opus 73, an ideal vehicle for the artistic expression of the Boston orchestra. Miss Farrar was a quaint and charming picture, in her Dolly Varden costume of yellow satin, almost concealed by a huge sable muff that looked as if it must have belonged to her great-grandmother. Her two numbers from the "Cosi fan tutte" of Mozart, and "The Prodigal Son" of Debussy, were especially suited to her voice, and she has never sung better—if one expects her very dubious use of three or four chest tones. The rest of the programme consisted of "Queen Mab," an eccentric and interesting composition by Josef Holbrooke (with more than a suggestion of Strauss in its treatment) and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody, a charming and colorful elaboration of two well known Spanish dances.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date

Established

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT A DELIGHT

That beautiful Bostonian, Miss Geraldine Farrar, was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Society, in Carnegie Hall. She sang a recitative and air from Mozart's almost forgotten opera, "Cosi fan tutte" and the the aria and recitative from Debussy's rarely heard opera, "The Prodigal Son." She wore a white satin gown with the very latest pannier effects and a black hat of maline with the largest bat wing bows ever seen out of a fashion plate.

As the serious contribution to the orchestral part of the programme Dr. Karl Muck and his musicians gave Brahms' Second Symphony, the rendition being marked by magnificent tone, faultless balance and effectively taken climaxes. A characteristic of the Boston Orchestra, which always stamps itself upon the audience, is its perfection as a unit, perhaps the natural result of having a membership of musicians of the highest rank.

When the large brasses dominated, their work was heard to be as accurate as was that of the concertmaster or the first flutist. So, of course, a work containing such possibilities as Brahms Symphony, No. 2, played under such conditions, was a genuine delight.

"Queen Mab," a poem "for grand opera and chorus (ad lib.)" by Josef Holbrooke, proved an incoherent and ultra-rhapsodic composition—a sort of tonal patchwork, with the pieces poorly fitted together.

In marked contrast to the foregoing number was the "Espana" Rhapsody by Chabrier. A succession of well-defined melodious themes, founded on familiar Andalusian dance tunes, with the broken time and jingly tambourines, formed the Frenchman's idea of a Spanish rhapsody.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Miss Gerhardt Soloist at Academy of Music.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening at the Academy of Music, no doubt illustrated Dr. Muok's ideas as to unity of style in programme making. With the exception of a group of the songs of Richard Strauss, which were sung by Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, the compositions heard were examples of a style long out of fashion, the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, arias of Marcello and Gluck, and the more or less successful attempts of Max Reger and Brahms to revitalize archaic forms in the former's "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra," and the latter's "Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn." The result of these attempts is not altogether happy, for "No man putteth a piece of new cloth into an old garment, neither do men put new wine into old bottles." Max Reger's concerto is one of his most recent works, and was first performed at Frankfort, on Oct. 4, 1912. He has imitated, as far as form is concerned, the "concerto gross" of the older writers, with solo passages for certain instruments, alternating with passages for the scheme is vague and inconclusive. The slow movement is more clear, direct and simple, and the final allegro spirited and more suggestive of the pompous rhythms and coloring of the themes of the Guild of the Meistersingers than of Bach. The performance of the work was one to command admiration and wonder at its subtlety and finish. A faint suspicion arises that the finale was meant to convey the quality of humor, and, if so, the audience failed to grasp the situaion.

---

Miss Gerhart's singing gave great delight, and in the tender aria of Gluck especially she revealed a perfect command of the style which such music demands. The Straus songs, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecile" were delivered with fine appreciation, deep penetration with their content and with admirable phrasing.

In the Brahms variations the increasing elaboration of the workmanship is very striking, yet the learning displayed is only used to obtain the effects desired, both in orchestral coloring and effective climaxes.

The concert closed with the "Jupiter" symphony. Here we are face to face with a miracle. Three symphonies—the E flat, the G minor and the symphony in C, with fugue, which the admiration of musicians has named the "Jupiter," which rapidly succeeded each other in the space of about six weeks in the year 1788—and the Bastile fell in 1789, yet no trace of the impeding storm in the marvelous beauty and refinement, pure harmony and ideal truthfulness of these joyous creations. Considered as pure music, it is hardly worth while to ask whether the world possesses anything more perfect.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date

HOLBROOKE'S "QUEEN MAB"

Given in New York for First Time by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is usually unsafe to make general remarks about first performances, but it is pretty certain that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Josef Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall it was the first time that an orchestral composition by this English composer had been heard in New York, although such colleagues of his as Granville Bantock, Frederick Delius, and William Wallace are more or less known here. Of course, many will remember that Oscar Hammerstein produced Holbrooke's "The Children of Don" at his London Opera House, and one or two of the chamber music organizations have played his compositions in New York.

The poets seem to have had an extraordinary influence on Holbrooke, if one judges from the list of his compositions. There is a symphonic quartet which he has dubbed "Mrs. Hemans;" a trio, 'Byron," and a quartet, "Shelley." There is a choral symphony which is entitled "oHmage to Edgar Allan Poe," and Holbrooke has likewise set "The Bells." His symphonic poems without exception have been inspired by poets, the first by Poe's "The Raven," and one by Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor." Of co[illegible] "Queen Mab" Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" is responsible. The work was first performed at the Leeds Festival Oct. 6, 1904.

The original is in four sections and concludes with a chorus. This final movement was omitted in yesterday's representation, but one heard the fairy dream music in the beginning, the love adagio, and the fiery march which illustrates the text, "Sometimes she driveth o'er a soldier's neck." The music at the beginning is imaginative and pretty, qualities which the second movement seems to lack. There seems to be an original mode of expression in the march also. The composition, however, is much too long, considering its contents.

Dr. Muck further placed on the programme Brahms's D major symphony, which received an excellent performance, one which brought its manifold beauties into the clearest light, and Chabrier's brilliant "Espana" rhapsody, which is perhaps heard too seldom in New York.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, did not seem to be at her best in the air from "Cosi Fan Tutte," which she sang at her first appearance, but in Azaël's air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," which she sang later in the afternoon, she appeared to greater advantage.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Estal

THIRD SYMPHONY MATINEE.

Geraldine Farrar the Soloist with the Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its third matinee programme of the season to a large audience yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

The programme was varied enough to hold the attention of the audience throughout the afternoon, and Brahms's Symphony No. 2, Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" and "Espana," a rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier, were played with that unison, beauty and firmness of tone that seem the especial properties of this musical organization.

Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. She sang a recitative and aria from "Cosi fan tutte," by Mozart, and Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 1913
Date

Esta 1884

REGER'S CONCERTO PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck gave its third concert of the Brooklyn season last night at the Academy. Interest was centered on the first performance here of Max Reger's Concerto in ancient style. Its hearing plainly left the audience in confusion. ~~The musical mannerisms~~ that it disclosed created a feeling of curiosity rather than of real musical pleasure.

Assisting the orchestra was Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished singer, of the German lied. It was her first appearance at the Academy this season and her success, due to her consumate artistry, was instantaneous.

The orchestra was heard at its best in the last number—Mozart's Symphony in C major, the "Juppiter" symphony. It also played Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn.

The Reger concerto is modelled on the old concerto grosso, as fashioned by Handel, consisting of solo passages alternating with passages for the whole orchestra. It wanders from key to key with a complexity of themes not truly developed, giving it, on the whole, a disjointed effect. Its first movement ended so suddenly that the audience, in its surprise, failed to give the orchestra the applause with which it is usually greeted. There were attractive violin passages in the second and third movements, but the concerto as a whole was lacking in any sustained melody.

If melody is the soul of music, Reger, along with many others of the modern school, comes near to being soulless. There is much that is clever in his orchestral writing and more that is surprising. Its first performance was given at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Oct. 4, 1912.

Miss Gerhardt's part of the programme was divided into two groups. In the first were Marcello's "Il mio bel foco" and the aria "O del mio dolce ardor," from Gluck's "Paride ed Elena." The second included three songs by Richard Strauss, "Morgen," "Wieglied" and "Caecile."

The singer proved herself to be an interpretative artist of the first rank. In the first number her voice was cloudy, but she used it with rare skill, her phrasing and vocalization calling for unstinted admiration. In the Gluck number she sang with impressive dignity. The full beauty of her voice was not disclosed, however, until she reached the Strauss group. Here it was sweetly tender and irresistably expressive. She adapted her singing to the varying moods and styles of song with unfailing charm. Miss Gerhardt is an exceptionally beautiful woman and has a very attractive personality.

In contrast to the fragmentary composition of Reger, the musicianly Brahms number came as a splendid relief. Its symmetry of form and the logical development of themes were easily recognized as the work of a true master.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was splendid. In Dr. Muck's reading all of the beauties of the compositions selected were brought out with precision, color and delicacy. The Boston Symphony concerts still maintain their place as the best the country has produced. Last night the theatre was filled, and, after the Reger number, the applause was enthusiastic.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES THIRD MATINEE

Geraldine Farrar's Muff Attracts as Much Attention as Her Singing.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Geraldine Farrar was the soloist and charmed her admirers not only with her musical interpretations, which included the recitative "Temerari" and aria "Come Scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Azael's recitative "These Joyous Airs" and aria "O Time That Is No More" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son," but also with her personality.

She made a pretty, if not artistically appropriate picture in a pink pannier dress and black tulle butterfly bonnet, and her enormous brown muff attracted almost as much attention as her singing. She was recalled again and again by a large and enthusiastic gathering.

The programme began with Brahms's second symphony, which the orchestra played with its usual balance and force. This symphony, which is one of Brahms's most tuneful, gave opportunity, especially in the adagio, for the violins to show the singing quality so characteristic of the Boston orchestra. The allegro was stirring and the whole symphony the masterwork of the afternoon.

Though a novelty, the tone-poem, "Queen Mab," by Holbrooke, was perhaps the least interesting number on the programme. Yet it cannot be said that the work is lacking in variety of effect.

The [illegible] Chabrier's

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date JAN 1 3 1913

Esta 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Miss Geraldine Farrar has gone through many metamorphoses since she first came to New York, but it is doubtful if the attenders of the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, at which she was the soloist, were prepared for the vision which floated coquettishly in after the intermission. Miss Farrar has usually selected Boston Symphony concerts, of which she is an annual feature, for her most barbaric and oriental adornment. Queenlike and tragic, glittering with jewels, shimmering with colors, and hung with pale archaic golds and coppers, she has made a picture which other singers have found it impossible or unwise to attempt to copy.

On Saturday afternoon, however, she appeared as a sort of Bull-moose Bo-Peep. Her costume was of the purest pannier type, with symmetrical and very flaring panniers on both sides. It was of one single color, a baby pink. On her head she wore a close fitting cap with great protruding gauze horns, suggesting the Progressive party. In her hands she should, doubtless, have carried a crook, but instead she brought on a sable muff—one of the largest sable muffs which the present writer has ever seen.

Miss Farrar appeared twice; at first to sing an air from "Cosi fan tutte," again to sing Azaël's air from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant prodigue," which suggests Massenet at his worst. Can it be true, by the way, that but for Moussorgsky Debussy would always have written pale Massenet? Somebody in Paris says so. Miss Farrar as a Mozart singer was once a delight. Her singing of the Mozartean measures of Wolf-Ferrari still proves to the constant operagoer that she can excel in that style of vocal art. Saturday, however, she gave no evidences of her capabilities in that line. In the Debussy air she was more successful.

The novelty of the afternoon was a tone poem by Joseph Holbrooke, "Queen Mab," suggested by Mercutio's lines in "Romeo and Juliet." Holbrooke is new here, but he is already old if Saturday's music is Holbooke at his best. Better harmonies have been constructed by many men, including Bach, and Richard Strauss or Horatio Parker can beat him hands down at discords. (We won't even mention Schönberg, whom we suspect of being overrated as a discorder!) Nevertheless, much of this music is pleasing, especially the first movement; the adagio is commonplace, and the finale original, if not altogether convincing.

But the real delights of the afternoon were the Brahms D major symphony and Chabrier's wonderful rhapsody, "España." It is extraordinary that in these days, when it seems to be the aim of conductors to play everything written in heaven and earth during the course of a season, nobody ever plays Chabrier. And the opera house could produce one of his works with success, too.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date

Est 1884

FARRAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert Saturday afternoon with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. Miss Farrar sang an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Azael's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," the second with more success than the first. The orchestra gave an ideally beautiful performance of Brahms' D major symphony under Dr. Muck, who also lent great brilliancy to Chabrier's "Espana." The novelty was "Queen Mab," a poem for orchestra by Joseph Holbrooke, the English composer who wrote "The Children of Don," brought out in London by Mr. Hammerstein. It is an interesting work with wonderful orchestral effects, and a little trace of Strauss melody, but later it works up to a fine broad line.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date ....

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Brahms Symphony.

UNDER Dr. Carl Muck the Boston Orchestra gave the second concert of its third pair in the season yesterday afternoon, and Brahms' Second Symphony ravished the great audience which packed Carnegie Hall to its capacity.

Nothing finer might be wished than Dr. Muck's masterly performance. True understanding of the composer's intention and a musical utterance at once ardent and restrained marked his interpretation of the allegro. He evoked the profound beauties of the adagio, inspired by an evident love for its content. The scherzo was a crisp, sparkling thing of joy under his baton, and its execution appeared perfect but for a slight mistake by an over anxious flute player.

Rarely has the final portion of Brahms' work been done with a finer rhythmic sweep or clearer sonority. The conductor bade his musicians stand and share in the enthusiatic plaudits at the end.

Miss Geraldine Farrar sang the recitative and aria from the first act of Mozart' opera, "Cosi fan tutte" ("All women d so") with a fair measure of vocal success. Particularly good was her rendition of the parts that lie in the medium range of her voice, but the aria, "Come Scoglio," makes exacting demands on the soloist, especially in the extremely low register, and was consequently less pleasing vocally. Miss Farrar showed a more comprehensive grasp of the recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and was heartily applauded.

Josef Holbrooke's orchestral poem, "Queen Mab," after Shakespeare, is not a work of distinctive merit, even as descriptive music, but is cleverly constructed for instrumental effects, and its passages of Straussian declamation were delivered with the stunning virtuosity for which this band is noted. Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody, "Espana," completed an admirably arranged programme.

From ....
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN - 1913
Date ....

Established: L

Fine Concert at Academy by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its third concert last night at the Academy of Music, was received with the well-merited enthusiasm which marks all its visits to this city. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, showed his usual mastery of his complex human instrument, and his men made their customary response in harmonious obedience to his baton.

Unfortunately the soloist of the evening, Madame Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, was unable to appear because of illness. This made necessary a considerable change in the original program and the substitution of a soloist from the artists in his orchestra.

Flutist Substituted

Mme. Matzenauer, in the original program for last night, was to have sung Mozart's "Now, Vitellia!" and the rondo, "Never Shall Hymen," from the opera "Titus," and Beethoven's aria, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio." Instead the Bach suite in B minor for flute and strings was substituted. The soloist was A. Maquarre.

Other Numbers

The other numbers on last night's program were Reger's concerto in the ancient style for orchestra, opus 123; Brahms' academic festival overture, opus 80, and Borodin's symphony No. 2 in B minor. The Brahms overture was especially pleasing. It embodies a number of German student songs, ending with the famous "Gaudeamus Igitur," a merry potpourri of the music of student life.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ....

E 1884

MISS GEBHARDT SCORES TRIUMPH

Soprano Wins Favor At Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Elena Gebhardt, soprano, sang herself into high favor last evening as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third of the present series of symphony concerts at the Lyric. As for orchestra and conductor, all that can be said is everything the names Boston Symphony and Dr. Karl Muck imply.

Small wonder then that at the end of the concert the large audience left fully satisfied that the performance had been a most enjoyable one. Following was the program given:

Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra, Op. 123 .... Reger
I. Allegro con spirito.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Old Italian Arias—
a. "Il mio bel fuoco" .... Marcello
b. "O del mio dloce ardor" ...... Gluck
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80. Brahms
Three songs with orchestra .... Strauss
"Morgen."
"Wiegenlied."
"Cacilie."
Symphony No. 2, in B minor ...... Borodin
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Molto vivo.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro.

Thus there were given things both old and new, and the audience reaped the rich benefits of adding to its musical education.

Max Reger is still living, and the world hopes to receive more from his rich, prolific genius. Chief interest in his concerto lies in its remarkable instrumentation and contrapuntal construction. In the first movement the chief coloring is done by solo violin and solo flute. Of the three movements the second, with its two solo violins, is perhaps the most interesting. Here the composer has done some really excellent scoring.

"Papa" Brahms wrote the "Academic" overture as an expression of thanks to the University of Breslau which, in the seventies, gave him the degree of doctor of philosophy. The work is described as a petpourri of students' songs. It ends with the immortal "Gaudeamus Igitur," so dear even today to the hearts of university men.

Miss Gebhardt enjoyed her greatest success in the old Italian arias, both of which are delightful melodies. She was less interesting in the Strauss group.

The Borodine symphony is a fine example of the old school, with its faithful adherence to "form" and its vigorous but thoroughly musical treatment.

J. B. M.

HERALD,

JANUARY 15,

HONOR FOR DR. MUCK

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a cable from th intendant of the Court Theatre i Darmstadt, which said that at the r quest of the Grand Duke of Hes Darmstadt, Dr. Muck was invited take part in the Wagner festival pe formances in that city; to condu "Siegfried" on April 16 and "Die Me stersinger" on May 4. The festival wi be one of the most important in Ge many. Dr. Muck was compelled to d cline for his work in Boston will n be finished until May 3.

GLOBE—

JANUARY 15,

HONORS FOR DR MUCK.

Distinguished Conductor of Boston Symphony Invited to Appear at Spring Festival at Darmstadt.

Dr Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next Summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a long cable from the intendant of the Court Theatre in Darmstadt, which said that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, Dr Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner Festival performances to be held in that city next Spring.

He was asked if he would conduct a performance of "Siegfried" on April 16 and a performance of "Die Meistersinger" on May 4. The festival will be one of the most important in Germany, as it will, to a certain extent, take the place of Bayreuth, where there are no performances next Summer. Dr Muck of course was compelled to cable a declination, for his work in Boston is not finished until May 3.

POST,

JANUARY 15,

DR. MUCK REQUESTED TO CONDUCT IN GERMANY

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a long cable from the intendant of the Court Theatre in Darmstadt which said that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darstadt, Dr. Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner festival performances to be held in that city next spring.

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 15,

Dr Muck Honored by Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday received a cable message from the intendant of the Court Theater in Darmstadt, saying that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, Dr. Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner festival performances to be held in that city in April. He was asked if he would conduct performances of "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger."

The festival will be one of the most important in Germany, as it will to a certain extent take the place of Bayreuth, where there are no performances next summer. Dr. Muck was, of course, compelled to decline the invitation, for his [illegible]

Cutting Bureau in the World

REVUE

From ....
Address: New York City
Date .... JAN 12 1913

*

In dem Concerte des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters am letzten Donnerſtag Abend trat die berühmte deutſche Liederſängerin Frl. Elena Gerhardt zum erſten Male in dieſer Saiſon auf, und erntete durch den muſtergültigen, warmblütigen Vortrag von einer Gruppe Strauß'ſcher Lieder ſowie je einer Arie von Mozart und Gluck rauſchenden Beifall. Die Künſtlerin wird in nächſter Zeit auch in einem Recital gehört werden.

E 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: New York
Date ....

Esta 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon opened with Brahms's best symphony, the second, in D major. The true Brahmsites say this is not the real Brahms; if this is true, let us have the unreal Brahms, who is so much more interesting than the other! The symphony was beautifully played, clarity in tone, color, and rhythm, and beauty of balance between the different choirs being notable. It has become a truism to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays impeccably. But even Homer nodded occasionally, and when the first flute player came in a bar too early in the third movement, just before the change of tempo to presto, near the beginning of the movement, it was only to relieve our minds from the discomfort of being in the presence of absolute perfection. Not being troubled with laziness, the player felt that he didn't need the full bar's rest allotted him. But it was a wonderfully beautiful performance of Brahms's most melodious symphony.

The novelty of the programme was Josef Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" (Shakespeare), Poem No. 7, for grand orchestra and chorus (ad lib.), Op. 45. Naturally the "ad lib." was taken advantage of and the chorus omitted; the three (continuous) movements being a presto leggiero, an adagio, and an allegro marcia. It proved to be a very interesting work; naturally full of bizarre effects, it nevertheless had enough of melody to differentiate it from many other works of the present day.

Geraldine Farrar sang an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and a "Recitative and Air" from Debussy's "Prodigal Son" (L'Enfant Prodigue). A "Recitativeand Air" by Debussy sounds like a paradox. But this was written for a competition at the Conservatory in 1884, and not only was the Debussy of "Pelléas et Mélisande" not yet developed, but a competitive work in that decidedly unvocal form (whatever else may be said of it) would have had small chance of winning twenty-two votes out of twenty-eight, as Debussy's work did. Miss Farrar sang it well. The concert closed with that tour de force of orchestration, Chabrier's Rhapsody "España," which was given a brilliant performance.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date ....

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Brahms Symphony.

UNDER Dr. Carl Muck the Boston Orchestra gave the second concert of its third pair in the season yesterday afternoon, and Brahms' Second Symphony ravished the great audience which packed Carnegie Hall to its capacity.

Nothing finer might be wished than Dr. Muck's masterly performance. True understanding of the composer's intention and a musical utterance at once ardent and restrained marked his interpretation of the allegro. He evoked the profound beauties of the adagio, inspired by an evident love for its content. The scherzo was a crisp, sparkling thing of joy under his baton, and its execution appeared perfect but for a slight mistake by an over anxious flute player.

Rarely has the final portion of Brahms' work been done with a finer rhythmic sweep or clearer sonority. The conductor bade his musicians stand and share in the enthusiatic plaudits at the end.

Miss Geraldine Farrar sang the recitative and aria from the first act of Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte" ("All women do so") with a fair measure of vocal success. Particularly good was her rendition of the parts that lie in the medium range of her voice, but the aria, "Come Scoglio," makes exacting demands on the soloist, especially in the extremely low register, and was consequently less pleasing vocally. Miss Farrar showed a more comprehensive grasp of the recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and was heartily applauded.

Josef Holbrooke's orchestral poem, "Queen Mab," after Shakespeare, is not a work of distinctive merit, even as descriptive music, but is cleverly constructed for instrumental effects, and its passages of Straussian declamation were delivered with the stunning virtuosity for which this band is noted. Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody, "Espana," completed an admirably arranged programme.

From ....
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN - 1913
Date ....

Fine Concert at Academy by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its third concert last night at the Academy of Music, was received with the well-merited enthusiasm which marks all its visits to this city. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, showed his usual mastery of his complex human instrument, and his men made their customary response in harmonious obedience to his baton.

Unfortunately the soloist of the evening, Madame Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, was unable to appear because of illness. This made necessary a considerable change in the original program and the substitution of a soloist from the artists in his orchestra.

Flutist Substituted

Mme. Matzenauer, in the original program for last night, was to have sung Mozart's "Now, Vitellia!" and the rondo, "Never Shall Hymen," from the opera "Titus," and Beethoven's aria, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio." Instead the Bach suite in B minor for flute and strings was substituted. The soloist was A. Maquarre.

Other Numbers

The other numbers on last night's program were Reger's concerto in the ancient style for orchestra, opus 123; Brahms' academic festival overture, opus 80, and Borodin's symphony No. 2 in B minor. The Brahms overture was especially pleasing. It embodies a number of German student songs, ending with the famous "Gaudeamus Igitur," a merry potpourri of the music of student life.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ....

1884

MISS GEBHARDT SCORES TRIUMPH

Soprano Wins Favor At Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Elena Gebhardt, soprano, sang herself into high favor last evening as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third of the present series of symphony concerts at the Lyric. As for orchestra and conductor, all that can be said is everything the names Boston Symphony and Dr. Karl Muck imply.

Small wonder then that at the end of the concert the large audience left fully satisfied that the performance had been a most enjoyable one. Following was the program given:

Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra, Op. 123 .... Reger
  I. Allegro con spirito.
  II. Largo.
  III. Allegro.
Old Italian Arias—
  a. "Il mio bel fuoco" .... Marcello
  b. "O del mio dloce ardor" ..... Gluck
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80. Brahms
Three songs with orchestra .... Strauss
  "Morgen."
  "Wiegenlied."
  "Cacilie."
Symphony No. 2, in B minor ...... Borodin
  I. Allegro moderato.
  II. Molto vivo.
  III. Andante.
  IV. Allegro.

Thus there were given things both old and new, and the audience reaped the rich benefits of adding to its musical education.

Max Reger is still living, and the world hopes to receive more from his rich, prolific genius. Chief interest in his concerto lies in its remarkable instrumentation and contrapuntal construction. In the first movement the chief coloring is done by solo violin and solo flute. Of the three movements the second, with its two solo violins, is perhaps the most interesting. Here the composer has done some really excellent scoring.

"Papa" Brahms wrote the "Academic" overture as an expression of thanks to the University of Breslau which, in the seventies, gave him the degree of doctor of philosophy. The work is described as a petpourri of students' songs. It ends with the immortal "Gaudeamus Igitur," so dear even today to the hearts of university men.

Miss Gebhardt enjoyed her greatest success in the old Italian arias, both of which are delightful melodies. She was less interesting in the Strauss group.

The Borodine symphony is a fine example of the old school, with its faithful adherence to "form" and its vigorous but thoroughly musical treatment.

J. B. M.

HERALD,

JANUARY 15,

HONOR FOR DR. MUCK

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a cable from the intendant of the Court Theatre in Darmstadt, which said that at the request of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, Dr. Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner festival performances in that city; to conduct "Siegfried" on April 16 and "Die Meistersinger" on May 4. The festival will be one of the most important in Germany. Dr. Muck was compelled to decline for his work in Boston will not be finished until May 3.

GLOBE—

JANUARY 15,

HONORS FOR DR MUCK.

Distinguished Conductor of Boston Symphony Invited to Appear at Spring Festival at Darmstadt.

Dr Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next Summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a long cable from the intendant of the Court Theatre in Darmstadt, which said that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, Dr Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner Festival performances to be held in that city next Spring.

He was asked if he would conduct a performance of "Siegfried" on April 16 and a performance of "Die Meistersinger" on May 4. The festival will be one of the most important in Germany, as it will, to a certain extent, take the place of Bayreuth, where there are no performances next Summer. Dr Muck of course was compelled to cable a declination, for his work in Boston is not finished until May 3.

POST,

JANUARY 15,

DR. MUCK REQUESTED TO CONDUCT IN GERMANY

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is constantly receiving invitations to take charge of the various festival performances in Germany next summer, particularly to conduct performances of celebrations of the centenary of Wagner's birth. Yesterday he received a long cable from the intendant of the Court Theatre in Darmstadt which said that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darstadt, Dr. Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner festival performances to be held in that city next spring.

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 15,

Dr Muck Honored by Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday received a cable message from the intendant of the Court Theater in Darmstadt, saying that at the urgent request of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, Dr. Muck was invited to take part in the Wagner festival performances to be held in that city in April. He was asked if he would conduct performances of "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger."

The festival will be one of the most important in Germany, as it will to a certain extent take the place of Bayreuth, where there are no performances next summer. Dr. Muck was, of course, compelled to decline the invitation, for his [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....
Address: New York City
Date .... JAN 12 1913

1884

In dem Concerte des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters am letzten Donnerſtag Abend trat die berühmte deutſche Liederſängerin Frl. Elena Gerhardt zum erſten Male in dieſer Saiſon auf, und erntete durch den muſtergültigen, warmblütigen Vortrag von einer Gruppe Strauß'ſcher Lieder ſowie je einer Arie von Mozart und Gluck rauſchenden Beifall. Die Künſtlerin wird in nächſter Zeit auch in einem Recital gehört werden.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

OST
New York
Date ....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon opened with Brahms's best symphony, the second, in D major. The true Brahmsites say this is not the real Brahms; if this is true, let us have the unreal Brahms, who is so much more interesting than the other! The symphony was beautifully played, clarity in tone, color, and rhythm, and beauty of balance between the different choirs being notable. It has become a truism to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays impeccably. But even Homer nodded occasionally, and when the first flute player came in a bar too early in the third movement, just before the change of tempo to presto, near the beginning of the movement, it was only to relieve our minds from the discomfort of being in the presence of absolute perfection. Not being troubled with laziness, the player felt that he didn't need the full bar's rest allotted him. But it was a wonderfully beautiful performance of Brahms's most melodious symphony.

The novelty of the programme was Josef Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" (Shakespeare), Poem No. 7, for grand orchestra and chorus (ad lib.), Op. 45. Naturally the "ad lib." was taken advantage of and the chorus omitted; the three (continuous) movements being a presto leggiero, an adagio, and an allegro marcia. It proved to be a very interesting work; naturally full of bizarre effects, it nevertheless had enough of melody to differentiate it from many other works of the present day.

Geraldine Farrar sang an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and a "Recitative and Air" from Debussy's "Prodigal Son" (L'Enfant Prodigue). A "Recitativeand Air" by Debussy sounds like a paradox. But this was written for a competition at the Conservatory in 1884, and not only was the Debussy of "Pelléas et Mélisande" not yet developed, but a competitive work in that decidedly unvocal form (whatever else may be said of it) would have had small chance of winning twenty-two votes out of twenty-eight, as Debussy's work did. Miss Farrar sang it well. The concert closed with that tour de force of orchestration, Chabrier's Rhapsody "España," which was given a brilliant performance.

…eau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date JAN [illegible] 1913

Estab

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ein intereſſantes Programm, wundervolle Darbietungen, eine populäre und erfolgreiche Soliſtin, — dazu der gewohnte ausverkaufte Saal in Carnegie Hall. Damit iſt die Signatur des geſtrigen, überaus enthuſiaſtiſch aufgengmmenen Nachmittags-Konzerts der Boſtoner gegeben.

Dr. Muck bot mit Brahms' Zweiter Symphonie eine Leiſtung von Größe und Vielfarbigkeit. Ich will den übrigen Sätzen nicht Unrecht thun, wenn ich ganz beſonders auf die ausgeſuchte Delikateſſe hinweiſe, die er dem dritten Satz entgegenbrachte, und auf die imponirende Steigerung und Krönung im letzten aufmerkſam mache. Das ſind Wirkungen, die gehört werden müſſen, aber nicht beſchrieben werden können. Ein Wort beſonderer Anerkennung gebührt dem Meiſterorcheſter im Allgemeinen und einigen Soliſten darin insbeſondere. Selten habe ich ein Horn ſo reich im Ton und tief im Gefühl gehört, wie geſtern. Der Oboiſt förderte einen ſo ſinnlich ſchönen und runden Ton, daß er mitunter von dem der erſten Violinen nicht zu unterſcheiden war, und die Streicher klangen namentlich im Schlußſatz in durchgeiſtigter Schönheit.

Als Novität hörten wir Holbrooke's „Queen Mab", ein Tonpoem, das Wirkungen zeitigte. Es ſetzt mit einem effektvollen Orgelpunkt ein, gefolgt von Wagner'ſchem Streichertremolo und kleinen, dazwiſchengeworfenen Brocken der Holzbläſer. Im weiteren Verlauf ſtellt ſich ein intereſſantes Thema vor, dann giebt es die unvermeidlichen Debuſſy'ſchen Reminiszenzen, aber mit Maß und Verſtand verwendet. In ſchönſter Steigerung geht es einem lärmenden, aber ſtark wirkenden Schluß entgegen. Sehr modern, aber unleugbar mit Talent gearbeitet.

Chabrier's effektvolle „España beſchloß das Programm und wirkte in ſeiner Brillanz wie ein Stück guter „French Paſtry", die nach einem guten Diner ſervirt wird. Das Orcheſter ſpielte es mit wundervollem Reichthum an Farben und Nuancen.

Frl. Farrar erſchien in einer Senſationstoilette, die mannigfaches „Schütteln des Kopfes" erregte. Ein Hut mit einem windmühlenflügelartig ſich reckendem Band von Koloſſaldimiſſionen, ein rieſiger Muff, eine Toilette mit Draperieeffekten — mehr originell als kleidſam für die Diva, die am Beſten ausſieht, wenn ſie ihre natürliche Schönheit und Grazie wirken läßt. Aber die Ausſtellungen ſind damit auch ſchon zu Ende, denn ſie war trefflich bei Stimme und ſang ſowohl Mozart's Rezitativ und Arie aus „Coſi fan tutte", als auch Debuſſy's Rezitativ des Azaël aus den „lyriſchen Szenen" „L'enfant prodigue" mit Stilgefühl und voller Beherrſchung ſowohl des Techniſchen als des Emotionellen. Der Erfolg war ein gewaltiger, und der Sturm beruhigte ſich erſt, nachdem die Dame ſich ein halbdutzendmal gezeigt hatte. Auch das Orcheſter und deſſen Leiter wurde mit Beifall überſchüttet. —p. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

GERHARDT TO SING NEW STRAUSS SONGS

1884

German Lieder Singer Will Be Boston Symphony Soloist At Lyric.

Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder singer, will appear for the first time at an orchestral concert in this city tonight, when she will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the year at the Lyric.

Miss Gerhardt made her initial bow to a Baltimore audience at a recital in the Peabody Conservatory last year, scoring a popular success, and her appearance tonight has been keenly anticipated. It is said that the house has been practically sold out. The numbers the German soprano will present include two old Italian songs and a group of modern ones by Richard Strauss—"Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie."

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has selected an entirely unhackneyed program for the orchestra, one of

---

…and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establis

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE IS LARGE, BUT COOL

Opinion Is Divided On Dr. Muck's Plan Of Giving Unfamiliar Numbers.

The program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Lyric last night consisted largely of novelties.

The apparent policy of Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fiedler's successor in the directorship, to favor the production of new or seldom-heard numbers is being generally remarked. While many local music-lovers express themselves as being glad of the opportunity for hearing things that do not come in the usual run, a great many more have no hesitancy in saying they prefer the standard works, or at least those of modern writers that are already more or less familiar. Comments—allegro con spirito, largo and opinion concerning the programs presented by the Orchestra this season is sharply divided.

At all events, the audience last night was unresponsive, and the attitude of the big crowd—there was not a vacant seat in the auditorium—was decidedly cool. Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder soprano, who was the soloist, was given a hearty reception and received numerous enthusiastic calls.

Max Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style for Orchestra (Op. 123) was the opening number. It is in three movements—allegro con spirite, largo and allegro—and is considered remarkable as the expression of a man who is as essentially an exponent of the modern spirit and method as Reger.

The two songs which followed—Marcello's "Il Mio Bel Fuoco" and Gluck's "O Del Mio Dolce Ardor"—continued the mood created by the old-fashioned simplicity of the Reger concerto, and Miss Gerhardt's singing of them evidently made a deep impression. It was only the second time she had ever appeared in Baltimore and the first at an orchestral concert, her prior engagement having been at the Peabody Conservatory last season, when she gave a song recital. Miss Gerhardt is of the traditional robust type of German sopranos, very blond and possessing an imposing stage presence. Last night she was extremely handsome in a gorgeous gown of scarlet and white.

Besides the old Italian arias Miss Gerhardt sang three of the loveliest of the Richard Strauss songs—"Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie"—and it was with these that she created the greatest amount of enthusiasm.

Borodin's Symphony in B minor No. 2 closed the concert. While the composer has been dead a score or so of years, he is classed with the leading figures of the modern Russian school, and his compositions, as are those of his colleagues, are deeply tinged with the curious and frequently tragic coloring of Slavic folk music. The Second Symphony is regarded as one of his most characteristic productions.

Despite the fact that the concert was the first Dr. Muck has directed since recovering from a severe attack of illness, he appeared to be in good form, though his manner was not quite as vigorous as usual.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 7 - 1913

1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH SOLO NOVELTY

Russian Symphony and Bach Suite for Flute and Strings.

Last evening marked the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy. Margarete Matzenauer, who had been announced to appear as soloist, was prevented by illness from doing so, which made necessary a rearrangement of the program. The concert as given consisted of Reger's "Concerto in Ancient Style," the Academic Festival Overture of Brahms, and Borodin's Symphony No. 2, in B minor. As the solo number A. Maquarre, first flutist of the orchestra, rendered the Bach Suite in B minor for flute and orchestra. The amended program brought in juxtaposition the Brahms Festival Overture, with its proudly joyful assemblage of German student songs and the sombre Russian symphony of Borodin. The contrast perhaps overemphasized the barbaric basis of the symphony's inspiration. The overture was composed to celebrate Brahms' reception of the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Breslau. Its mood is joyous. Its themes the careless careful carolings of collegiate youth. Even the finale, the "Gaudeamus Igitur," has been so often sung as a crowning rite at some student "bierfest" that the solemn burlesque of the words dominates the sacerdotal quality of the music. The symphony of the Russian surgeon-musician, Borodin, had its inspiration in the Orient. It reflects the thought of an Eastern people. Its short, apparently unrelated, at times hardly controllable phrases are held with difficulty in conventional bounds. It has not the basic reality and spontaniety of the Brahms' overture.

Mr. Maquarre's rendition of the Bach suite must be judged with the leniency due the fact that it was substituted at the last moment and rendered without the possibility of immediate rehersal, though it has been performed as an announced number at previous out-of-town concerts of the orchestra. The soloist is undoubtedly master of his instrument, but the suite was as certainly written with no idea that the obligato would be performed by a full orchestra. Valuable as the flute is to the orchestra, its usefulness as a solo instrument is confined to intimate music. In spite of Mr. Maquarre's virtuosity the disproportion between his sophisticated Arcadian pipings and the richness of the orchestral tone was always marked, at times ludicrously so. The "Concerto in Ancient Style" closely approximates the old simple harmonies and naive melodies of early musicians. It is a pleasant limpid composition with little external evidence of struggle for the "admired simplicity" which it attains.

Dr. Muck, who has happily recovered from a recent indisposition, directed with his accustomed authority, so that the concert, though lacking the presence of Madame Matzenauer, had that far more important factor, an admirable conductor.

Margarete Matzenauer Ill.

Margarete Matzenauer, who was to have appeared last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony and who was also announced to sing Laura in this evening's performance of "La Giaconda" at the Metropolitan, has been prevented by illness from fulfilling either engagement. Louise Homer will make an efficient substitute in tonight's opera.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 7 1913
Date

Establ … 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening Largely Attended

It was not a particularly interesting program in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was heard by a large audience at the Academy of Music last night. Its contents were too exotic and unfamiliar to be generally enjoyable. Max Reger's Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra is a tour de force which strikingly attests its composer's ingenuity, but how far it is worth while is another matter. It employs the old forms, but it does not breathe the old spirit, and the difference between the original and the imitation was impressively illustrated in the somewhat unfortunate coincidence that the Reger number was immediately followed by Bach's Concerto in B minor for flute and strings. Max Reger is unquestionably a wonderfully clever man, but his scores are chiefly notable as feats in composition and if the one heard last night was less wearisome than most this circumstance was mainly due to its greater brevity. The second orchestral number was Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, which is not much more spontaneous or inspired than is apt to be the case with "occasional" compositions and the concert ended with Borodine's Symphony No. 2 in B minor. Mme. Matzenauer, who had been announced as the assisting artist, was prevented by illness from appearing. Her place was taken by Mr. A. Maquarre, who played Bach's Concerto for flute and strings already mentioned with a lovely quality of tone and a consummately artistic execution. He was much and deservedly applauded, but the rule which excludes encores was inflexibly enforced. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, February 17, when the assisting artist will be Max Pauer, the distinguished pianist.

WOULD RESTRAIN SALE

...and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 7 - 1913

Establi[illegible]84

MME. MATZENAUER ILL

In Consequence She Did Not Sing at Symphony Concert.

Great disappointment was undoubtedly felt by the large audience gathered to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night when it was learned that Margaret Matzenauer, owing to illness, was unable to fulfill her engagement to sing with the Orchestra. The distinguished contralto has become such a favorite in this city, and is so rarely heard with the Metropolitan Opera Company, that expectation of hearing her last night was keen, and disappointment was proportionately great. The principal flutist of the Orchestra, A. Maquarre, was substituted, and gave an enjoyable performance of the Bach B minor suite for flute and strings. Maquarre is an accomplished flutist, and was accorded quite a demonstrative approval for his interesting and unusual work.

The chief interest of the evening, however, from a musical standpoint, centred in the wonderful Reger composition, given here for the first time. It was entitled a "Concerto in the Ancient Style for Orchestra." While the work is undoubtedly an imitation of the ancient style, it is so much richer in orchestral effects that the impression is entirely modern. The Bach suite, which was played immediately after the Reger, established this point beyond question. Throughout the work, but particularly in the second movement, entitled "Largo, A Minor," two solo violins are used, with transcendently beautiful effect. Reger is a master of polyphonic writing, which scientific accomplishment, added to the fact that he is at least one modern who has something to say worth listening to, places him in a unique position in the musical world, where so much that is the result of painful study is taken as original and worth while. The Largo of the Reger work is one of the most wonderful pieces of orchestral writing available—full of power and expression, and containing the essence of classicism and elegance. The entire concerto was beautifully done, the various voices of the orchestra in contrast and support of the solo violins, being clearly developed and delivered with that degree of light and shade that denotes the guiding hand of a master.

The symphony, the Borodin B Minor, is purely Slavic in color, and is extremely interesting. The first movement, with its insistence in all choirs and varying rhythm of one phrase, is a fascinating piece of writing. The scherzo was wonderfully played, employing the full orchestra, and with marked syncopation in the strings, the rhythm is yet so graceful and light that one is lost in admiration of the genius that could construct the movement, as well as the conductor who could play it so delicately and graciously.

With the exception of the disappointment occasioned by Mme. Matzenauer's non-appearance the concert was particularly enjoyable, although the program was badly arranged. All the conductors seem to have become temporarily obsessed with the idea of moving the symphony into some unusual place on the program, and the second place is always best.

...Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 8 - 1913

Esta[illegible]84

ELENA GERHARDT CHARMS.

Famous German Soprano Heard With Boston Symphony.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano who ranks as one of the greatest concert favorites in England as well as her native land, and who is now making her second American tour, appeared at the National yesterday afternoon as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two groups of songs. The impression created was most gratifying, and particularly in the Richard Strauss numbers—"Morgen," "Wiegenlied," and "Cacilie"—was her rich and resonant organ full of sympathy and color. Her control, especially in the quiet passages, is very complete and her method is delightfully natural. The soloist's other numbers were old Italian arias by Marsello and Gluck.

Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's conductor, was taken ill with tonsilitis on his way to Washington yesterday morning, so that the responsibility for interpreting Max Reger's new concerto in the ancient style for orchestra, the Bach suite No. 2, in B minor for flute and strings, and Mozart's Jupiter symphony, fell to O Urack, second cellist and assistant director of the organization.

The program was a somewhat unfortunate grouping of unique orchestral compositions. Interest centered in the Reger work, which was performed for the first time only three months ago, and the fact that Andre Maquarre was the flute soloist for the Bach suite made that number also a feature of the afternoon. Thus, the symphony had to be placed at the end of the program, always an unfortunate position, considering the lateness of the hour at which the Washington concerts are held and the consequent confusion attendant upon the enforced early departure of many patrons.

Mr. Urack's reading of the concerto was not as clear or authoritative as might have been desired, but Mr. Witek's splendid art as the first violinist did much to lend distinction to the interpretation. The andante cantabile of the symphony was the artistic climax of the orchestral program.

ADVERTISER.
JANUARY 18.

A CONCERT OF TANGIBLE MUSIC

SYMPHONY OFFERING AN UNUSUAL [illegible]REAT

Strauss' "Till Eulenspie[illegible]el" Arou[illegible] [illegible]nthusiasm—A P[illegible]ect Perform[illegible] of a Be[illegible]n Symph[illegible]y.

[illegible]y Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Weber. "[illegible]utz" overture.
Strauss. "[illegible]Eulenspiegel."
Bruch. C[illegible] for Violin, No. 2. D minor.
[illegible]st, Anton Witek.
Beethov[illegible] [illegible]hony No. 5, in C minor.

The [illegible] resented a symphony by a German na[illegible]eethoven, who seems by certain ind[illegible]us to be very inferior to our modern sy[illegible]phonic writers. In the first place he calls his work a "symphony" and not a "tone poem" a "symphonic fantasie," or even a "symphonic poem." Then it is not much over a half-an-hour in length. No self-[illegible]pecting composer would give his ideas in [illegible]ss than an hour and a quarter. Then the [illegible]coring does not show a single gong, [illegible]lphone, bass clarinette, cymbal, or [illegible]ass tuba, but goes on with the ordinary strings, wood and brass wind. Nor does the work "tell a story," which the auditor can follow out with his nose in the programme-book.

Nevertheless this Beethoven has his good points, especially in lucidity, in beauty of themes, and in logical development of figures. And Dr. Muck read the work like the d[illegible]vout interpreter that he is. There [illegible] no effort to make more out of it than [illegible]ven intended. No exaggeration such [illegible] found in the recent performance [illegible] New York orchestra. In fact [illegible]ck does not play at the public, nor does [illegible] "individualize," but he brings out every [illegible]nt of the work and lets it speak for itself. This may make him less directly popular than some other conductors, but it certainly makes him a greater musician.

Therefore the performance of the symphony was as near perfection as we can ever hope to have it. Even the contrabasses were clear in their difficult work in the second and third movements, and the finale was a whirlwind of triumph. Only there was a little exaggeration of contrasts of dynamic force in the third movement and the second seemed somewhat slower than we are accustomed to.

Richard Strauss's Rabelaisian bit of humor was also excellently given, although it did not obliterate the memory of Mr. Fiedler's remarkable achievements in this work. As one listened to its striking figures and their still more striking development; one could not but perceive how much greater Strauss (why need we always tack on the "Richard"?; there is but one symphonic Strauss) is, than all the Holbrookes, Regers, D'Indys, and other musical contortionists of the present. In fact one could find passages where they imitated him—afar off.

To us "Till Eulenspiegel" is one of the most graphic and amusing of tone-pictures. His irrepressible larks, his quaint disguises, his sudden fear when his enemies have him fast in their clutches, the inflexible, if bombastic, denunciations, the sentence and the final squeaks of the mercurial hero, were all brought out in picturesque vein, but, of course, one needed to understand something of the story to appreciate the work at its full; that is the weakness of programme-music.

At first we were afraid that there would be over-refinement in "Till Eulenspiegel." Strauss himself once said to this orchestra, after an exquisitely shaded rehearsal of "Don Quixote":—"I really didn't imagine it as fine as that!" He always liked a little freedom and even roughness in some interpretations. But the fears were groundless, for the last half of the work was glorously played, so that it created the greatest enthusiasm that has ever greeted it in Boston, and finally the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgment.

Weber's "Freischutz" overture, which began the concert, remains wonderfully fresh, considering that it is nearly 100 years old. Its dramatic power was infinitely greater than that of the other overtures of its day [illegible] except one or two of Beethoven's. When one thinks that its beautiful horn quartette (the begetter of many hymns) was composed before the valve horn was invented, it is doubly wonderful. The reading was a strong one. The contrabasses picked their foreboding "A," the trombones gave their threatening parody of the bright figure of Agatha's song, and it was altogether a fine beginning of a fine concert, and was greatly applauded. But the horn quartette was taken too slowly. Dr. Muck avoids the fault of Mr. Fiedler of over-driving an allegro, but he sometimes exaggerates an adagio.

Bruch has the proud preeminence of having written three modern violin concertos. The world could perhaps spare all but the first one. This D minor work is not quite as wonderful as the great G minor concerto by the same composer, but it is good and attractive music, nevertheless, and Mr. Witek made the most of it. What with Elman and Ysaye in recent Boston concerts, we are being educated to a very high standard of violin-playing, but Anton Witek need not fear comparison, technically, with any violinist however famous. He prances over the thorniest paths with the greatest ease. No amount of technical difficulties can shake his imperturbability. But we sometimes wish for more of sympathetic emotion and less of calm in his work. We would rather have more of inequality if something of pas-

But his pure tone, his surety, his breadth of style, carried this work to a triumph. Dr. Muck, too, caught up the martial style of portions of the concerto splendidly, so that it became more impressive than we have ever heard it.

Bruch is nothing if not martial; and, like the lame school-teacher of ancient Greece (Tyrtaeus) he looks the most peaceful man imaginable.

It was a delight to hear again, a concert of real and tangible music. There was nothing tending to overexert the grey matter of any cerebrum, or to lead to brain-fag, and we left the hall actually refreshed!!

GLOBE-
JANUARY 18.

BRILLIANT PLAYING AT THE SYMPHONY

Superb Reading of "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr Witek Plays Bruch Concerto in Scholarly Style.

The 12th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was one of unusual brilliance. When have the dry bones of Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz" been clothed with such semblance of vitality and distinction? The opening prayer for quartet of horns was taken with such grave deliberation and repose of style as might have fallen into heaviness and inertia under a less sensitive and authoritative hand; but with what purity of line it was sustained, with what tranquil beauty it was sung; how unobtrusive, how deep and unfailing the propulsive rhythmic flow.

Here were the symbols of classic form which were to give way to the romantic note in the music of the supernatural which follows, a note which marked an epoch in the development of the German, and of all musical art. It was yesterday as though years were spanned in Dr Muck's reading, and the old gave birth to the new.

Mr Brooke, the flutist, announced that since Mr Witek had been detained the "Till Eulenspiegel" would follow. The performance—the first this season by Dr Muck of a Strauss tone poem—was a marvel of virtuosity for conductor and players. It scintillated with brilliance of technic, and was instinct with the spirit of impudent daring and abandon. The hero rarely has seemed so amiable a fellow, not only for the impertinence of his triumphs, but for the certain finesse and aplomb with which he accomplished them.

The work was performed with a remarkable clarity of design and symmetry of structure, yet with plasticity and absorbing imagination. There was a graphic sense of climax, and there was a subtlety of graduation in the transitions from thought to thought that have not been heard here. This Till accomplished the sweet uses of incorrigibility by a machiavelian wit, as well as by brawn.

Mr Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, is always a player of thoughtful, well-considered style, which adds to purity and elegance no small degree of spiritual insight and inspiration. He appropriately varied his delivery of the three movements of Bruch's second concerto.

The sustained melodic writing of the slow movement, which in this case is the first, was played with great beauty of tone and breadth in bowing. The second movement was fittingly declamatory, and in the finale Mr Witek performed with true brilliance and abandon. It was good to hear the syncopated figure given out with such imagination and authority. The soloist was fortunate in the spirit of sensibility and comradeship which palpably actuated both conductor and orchestra and furthered the artistic character of his playing.

The symphony was Beethoven's fifth, which Dr Muck conducted with an epic dignity and beauty which carried a program that had begun brilliantly to a lofty hight of musical feeling at its conclusion. The audience was rightly appreciative throughout the concert of Dr Muck, of Mr Witek and of the orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 18,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW PERFECTIONS IN FAMILIAR PIECES

A Day in Which Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Seemed to Accomplish All That They Willed—The Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspeigel" in Remarkable Performance—Mr. Witek and a Concerto

WHEN Dr. Muck alighted in Boston last September, he told the waiting reporters that his first concern in the new season would be the orchestra. He would make it a perfect instrument for the music that it played and for his will with that music. For three months now he has pursued his task, and at almost every pair of concerts he has advanced toward his end. It has been a necessity to this process that familiar pieces should often fill a whole concert, since through them an orchestra is best exercised and made most supple to the conductor's will. Yesterday, for example, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," Beethoven's fifth symphony, and Bruch's concerto in D minor for violin made the programme—all classics of the orchestral repertory of 1913, and one at least—the concerto—a hackneyed and withered classic that deserves speedy banishment. But in these pieces, the orchestra attained to those perfections that the conductor has been seeking. It has attained them before, but perhaps the familiarity of the music made them outstand the more clearly.

The overture to "Der Freischütz," as the carpers like to say, is an old, old tune. But could human voices, with a very sensitive and adroit artistry behind them, have phrased the introduction and brought such impression of remote, long-drawn, glamorous beauty as did Dr. Muck and the orchestra Friday afternoon? Not merely was the tone of the horns exquisitely soft and rich, not merely were the strings like whispers on the air, but imagination, sensibility and expert skill in the conductor and the men were shaping this tone into beautiful and expressive utterance. In a moment came the passage of spell and mystery—the passage of the boding drum-beats. And the music crept into the hearer's ears with its low-voiced and fantastic suggestion. The "main body" of the overture ensued, aglow with rhythmic swing, bright with color, eloquent of emphasis and contrast; the heavy chords that pause before the end; the leap into the jubilant close. Dr. Muck had his interpretative will, making Weber's music like a tone-picture, all romantic suggestion of a drama that was to come. As music heard for its own sake and for its beauty of impassioned and ordered sound, the overture had reasserted its old thrill. The tone of the orchestra had been as eloquent as it was rich and beautiful. Human voices might not have been more sensitive and expressive. Here was the perfection the conductor sought.

Other sorts of perfection were to come. Strauss's rondo of the pranks and the fate of "Till Eulenspiegel" exacts the utmost orchestral dexterity. Almost every man in the band must play an exacting part and accomplish it as an expert virtuoso who knows neither technical hindrance nor shortcoming. Grant that he does that, and yet would he fall far short of his task. For he is playing his part in a characterizing and a narrative music. Strauss would visualize in tones. As we hear with the ears of the body, simultaneously must we see with the eye of the imagination Till teetering and swaggering along. He chortles or he insinuates as he speaks in this or that instrument or group of instruments. Strauss would have us know and feel the man, whether he oversets the stalls in the market, preens through his lovemaking, shivers and mutters before his judges. At the end he would even have us pity him. The orchestra that plays "Till Eulenspiegel"—every man in it—must characterize, must narrate in the fashion in which he plays. As for the conductor, what has he not to do? Strauss has written his rondo with due sense of form and structure. The music is closely knit. The conductor must hold its final threads unbroken and undistorted. At the same time, he must persuade his men to make Till live out of it and play his varied pranks. He ought to miss not a stroke of the characterization or the narrative. He should make his audience discover, feel, smile as it hears, and his chief means is the graphic power, the humorous and the ironic suggestion of the music. He must accomplish all these things and hold the balance between them. Strauss's music exacts mind and imagination as well as virtuosity and authority in him who leads it. These are a few of the tests that "Till Eulenspiegel" lays upon those that play it. Dr. Muck and the orchestra met them all.

Last of all came Beethoven's fifth symphony to ask and receive yet other perfections, divided once again between the conductor and his orchestra. As some would say, with a morbid liking for the discovery of "inner meanings" and the revelation of "personal interpretation," they played the symphony exactly as it stood. They did, but to play it as it stands is not to play it as so many notes on the engraved page. The conductor must find the pace that sets the music free, and even Beethoven could not write that upon paper. He must divine the modulations, the contrasts, the climaxes that notes only half express. He must feel the contending emotions, the stress of imagination of which the music is the voice. A conductor may discover all these things, as Dr. Muck did yesterday. He may by the magical telepathy of conducting infuse them into his men. Yet the performance will fall short unless they answer him with the projecting power that is the life and expression in any art. They and he must project upon their hearers the contrasts, the climaxes, the cumulation of the tumult of contending moods in the first movement of the fifth symphony. They and he must give a shaded diversity to each repetition of the haunting phrase of the slow movement and a newly emphatic eloquence to each repetition of the dominating song. They must escape sound and fury, and yet touch fire and vigor in the scherzo. Then it must fall away under their hands into that dimness of hushed and expectant transition and then leap into all the glow and tumult of the finale. The whispering violins, the suspensive drum beats must sound as the voices of tone-poets. The big sonorities of the finale are small feats in comparison. Now these were the things that Dr. Muck and the orchestra accomplished yesterday. He ought to be satisfied with his men. It is not his way to be ever satisfied with himself.

By way of intermezzo, and yet in accord enough with the rest of the concert, Mr. Witek played Bruch's concerto in D minor, in which a submissive orchestra accompanies the violin in passages songful, displayful, declamatory. There is not an idea or emotion in the piece, except the idea of the violin and well-sounding music for it, and the emotion that the violinist may experience in display of his own virtuosity. He need not think or feel. He need only play with suavity of tone and dexterity of technique in the adagio; with clean-cut articulation in the recitative; with artful transition into the finale, and then through it brightly and elastically. Mr. Witek is capable—and much more—of all that the concerto asked of him. He did not try to put into it what was not there, as one who would have Bruch another Beethoven or Brahms with the violin. Taking the concerto for what it was, he left it naked and sterile to a world that is weary of it—except as his own playing clothed and graced it.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 18,

MR. WITEK AND THE SYMPHONY

For the twelfth pair of Symphony concerts the program includes the overture to "Der Freischuetz," von Weber; concerto No. 2 for violin and orchestra, I. adagio ma non troppo, II. recitative, III. finale, allegro molto, Bruch; "Till Eulenspiegel," op. 28, Richard Strauss; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven.

Once more the Symphony orchestra provided all the program for its regular concerts, for Anton Witek, concert master, was the soloist. Dignity, thoroughness of technique, scholarliness of interpretation and true, solid musical feeling are felt in Mr. Witek's playing, and his Boston public, which hears him at his Symphony appearances and his chamber music recitals, rejoices with him in the strength of his grasp on wholesome readings.

Mr. Witek has the technique to set off fireworks on his fingerboard and nobody rejoices more than he in the clear, metallic-sounding trills his swift fingers call forth. He feels the joy of the skilful artist in the even scampering of his fingers over the strings and the sonorous chords of difficult double stops appeal to his pride of artistry. He takes delight in his good right arm and its ability to draw the horsehair in astonishing slowness and clarity of tone or to push it lightly in bounding bow through rapid passages. Yet Mr. Witek with and in spite of these accomplishments is a big, strong player. And herein is he much more than this. that he recognizes these tricks of skill for what they are worth and values them merely for the ability they give him to bring out the meaning of the music.

The second Bruch concerto calls for breadth and depth of understanding to make it interesting. It demands also good technical equipment of the sort Mr. Witek has, rather than the flashing nimbleness of wrist and finger we are wont to call virtuosity. In the stately dignity of the first movement is the true, wholesome music of the kind in which Mr. Witek delights.

The form of the concerto is not elaborate; the piece is simply and some say tiresomely written. It resembles somewhat the Brahms violin concerto in the importance of the orchestra part. The development of the motives and the working out of the recurring themes fall equally to the solo instrument and the orchestra, and both Mr. Witek and Dr. Muck found real joy yesterday in working together to make a well-balanced whole. Through a transposition in the program this was made to follow the Strauss number, through which the orchestra rollicked, and the effect was an even happier bit of program making than Dr. Muck had provided.

Of the overture to "Der Freischuetz" and the "Till Eulenspiegel" not much need be written. Dr. Muck showed apparent fondness for Strauss yesterday in the way he led the orchestra through the gambols portrayed of the merry rogue whose pranks Dr. Strauss thought diverting enough to translate into music. There might be criticism of the tempo of the overture, for the slow music seemed too slow. The beauty of the passages for the horns was brought out with clearness and satisfaction.

In comparatively recent months Boston has had the opportunity of hearing Beethoven's magnificent fifth symphony interpreted by many conductors. The memory of Mr. Fiedler's reading is fresh, and Mr. Weingartner's, Mr. Nikisch's and Mr. Stransky's have all in turn delighted us. In some ways Dr. Muck's is far ahead of all. He seems to have paid unusual attention to perfection of detail, he draws from his players just the shade of expression he has outlined in his thought and yesterday, although the score must be perfectly in his memory, he used notes seemingly with the intention of getting more closely into the depths of the meaning of this majestic work. The first and second movements went well enough. One recognized here and there new force in certain passages and especially in the first a definiteness and emphasis that brought out new ideas as though Dr. Muck were searching for some new aspect that he could set forth more prominently than his hearers had noticed before. In the third movement, however, Dr. Muck showed a grasp and intensity of feeling that transcended all the other work of the afternoon. This movement is admitted to be the most difficult and in this the interpreter put his best effort.

Miss Maggie Teyte is the soloist for the next concerts.

HERALD,

JANUARY 18,

MR. WITEK PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Twelfth Rehearsal Marked by Brilliant Performance of Orchestra.

BRUCH CONCERTO GIVEN

Beethoven's Great Symphony in C Minor Given in Admirable Manner.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Witek, the concertmaster of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program as announced was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischnetz"......Weber
Concerto for violin, No. 2...........Bruch
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".Strauss
Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven

On account of some misunderstanding Mr. Witek was tardy, and the order of the concerto and Strauss's Rondo was therefore reversed.

All the compositions were familiar, but the interpretation gave freshness and brilliance to the orchestral works. The performance of Strauss's Rondo was especially brilliant. It seems as though "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklaerung" were still the highest achievements of the composer in program music. The opening of "Also sprach Zarathustra" is stupendous; there is music in "Heldenleben" that reminds one of Beethoven; the episode describing Don Quixote discoursing nobly of the soul and the death music of the knight are beautifully imaginative; the love music in the "Domestic" Symphony is superbly sensuous, but no one of these later compositions is so perfectly rounded, so complete a work of art as the three above mentioned. And in "Till Eulenspiegel" the composer shows himself a master in the expression of the humorous and the grotesque. The episode in which the rogue is brought to justice and dances his last dance in air is enough to stamp Strauss as a genius. How effective in folk simplicity are the introduction and the postlude! As though the narrator began: "There was once a rascally fellow named Till Eulenspiegel" and ended: "Now I have told you the story of this rogue." The Rondo was read by Dr. Muck with the keenest appreciation of its character, and the performance was one of astounding brilliance, a performance by an orchestra of virtuosos played on at will by a master hand.

Admirable, thrice admirable in another vein was the performance of the great symphony. There was no attempt on the part of the conductor to introduce new readings, to discover hidden voices, to surprise or startle. Beethoven spoke as no one since him has spoken. Especially impressive was Witek gave a carefully considered and excellent performance of the concerto. As ever, he showed himself an accomplished violinist. He played with breadth and spirit the more dramatic passages, and his sentiment in cantilena was never mawkish. But is it not high time to put this concerto on the shelf? This music is empty in its pomp and commonplace and spineless in themes and thematic development.

The program of the concert next week will be as follows: Dvorak, "Carnival" overture; Debussy, Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Strube, two symphonic poems, "Narcissus and Echo," and "The Loreley" (first performance); Charpentier, Air "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"; Sinding, Symphony in D minor. Miss Maggie Teyte will be the singer.

JOURNAL-

JANUARY 18,

BRILLIANT PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

First Half of Season Ends This Week in Blaze of Glory.

GREAT OVATION IS GIVEN ORCHESTRA

Concert Master Witek Surpasses Himself in Violin Concerto.

This week's concerts bring the first half of the Symphony season to an end with a blaze of glory sustained through the full four numbers of the program.

First came yesterday the most brilliant performance of Weber's "Der Freischeutz" overture in the memory of some of the veteran patrons of the concerts. The queen of overtures Berlioz called it half a century ago, and it still glows with undiminished beauty nad dramatic effectiveness, though its claim to first place may well be disputed. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, and so the orchestra played it with the result that all had to stand and accept the big tribute of applause.

One of those rare changes came next, when the Strauss rondo, "Till Owlglass's Merry Pranks," with its almost bewildering tone pictures of crockery going to smash, scudding market women, Don Juan adventures, the joshing of swollen-headed Philistines and finally Till's conviction in court and death on the gallows, was performed as the second number instead of the third, owing to the absence of Anton Witek, due to play the second Bruch violin concerto. The change made no difference so far as the performance was concerned. Its dashing spirit and great technical brilliancy was worthy of Strauss's genius. There, too, the orchestra deserved a special tribute.

Concert Master Witek surpassed himself in the performance of the concerto. The broad, suave style in which he played the adagio was beautifully balanced by the masterly technique displayed in the finale. Not since Ysaye appeared with the orchestra nine years ago has this concerto been given at these concerts, and its revival this time furnishes an excellent opportunity to realize the refined unostentatious yet polished artistry of the concert master.

The last number on this twelfth program is the Olympian Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, a sublime masterpiece, the performance of which by the Symphony Orchestra is always one of the red-letter events of the season.

POST

JANUARY 18,

PLAY STRAUSS AS MASTERS

Historic Performance of "Till Eulenspiegel"

BY OLIN DOWNES

With an individual less sincere than Dr. Carl Muck, his expressed disapproval of the music of Strauss would be accepted as an affectation, for his performance of that master's "Till Eulenspiegel," yesterday afternoon at the 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, was an amazing feature of the occasion. What is the title of this piece in full? It is, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned Roguish manner, in Rondo form." It seems that since the time of Wagner modern Germany has produced noth-

[illegible] music, in fact, may well be taken as one of the first and finest fruits of the corrective advent of Freidrich Nietzche, in German literature, when he pierced the fat places of German vagueness and sentimentality to the nerve, and substituted in its place a nervous, merciless, and transcendant criticism which did not fail to make possible the genius Strauss, as the head of a certain magnificent element in the German art of today.

This Til Eulenspiegel is superb, first of all for its temperament. Here is a sardonic wit, irony, lightness, mordancy of style, hitherto sadly lacking in Germany. Here also, peeping out from under the comic mask, is the wisdom, the pathos and humanity which lifts the piece entirely away from the accusation of being an egotistical expression of a genius who is overwhelmed with biting contempt for the world. And it is seen that, contrary to becoming an individualist cut off by his mental superiority from his fellow men, Strauss has built his work upon the solidest, broadest and most beautiful elements of the lore of the German folk. He has drawn in fact as well as in title from the endless resources of the German storehouse of legend and song. He has produced a masterpiece which must surely live so long as any music written in accordance with the ideals of today exists, because of the fact that it is the result of such utter individual and artistic mastery, and because the subject matter itself strikes its roots deeply and inextricably into the soil from which all living art must spring.

A Microscopic Exposition

Surely, in spite of his asseverations, Dr. Muck feels a kinship in this music and in his own nervous mentality. At any rate, he gave a performance which was technically a microscopic exposition of each remarkable detail of the piece, the finest possible musical upbuilding and developing of its material and a most dramatic culmination of its development. What is there not in this music, this passionate comment upon life and all things that are? And who is there who will watch the mad career of the Rogue and not recognize it, Eulenspiegel, sometimes wantonly, sometimes by virtue of that uncontrollable dynamic force within himself, bursts traditions as he breaks crockery; sets all mankind and his neighbor at defiance. He makes love, grinning, grotesque, like the Harlequin; the weight of his misdeeds accumulates and gathers over his head; but surely the devil is with him, and he goes lilting off. He sets the world spinning like a top from his hand, but at last he has gone too far, and now the end is come. Nothing more dramatic, more sardonic and fantastical can be imagined than the condemning trombones, and your cheeks may split with pain while you laugh at the entreaties of the expiring Rogue. Yes! All this, and much more, is in these measures. The composer, in his earnestness that had gotten the better of him, had nearly dropped his mask of comedy. But the epilogue says, in the manner of a seraphic modern Mozart, "Once upon a time"—It has all been an amusing fairy tale, to be taken no more seriously.

Dr. Muck and Players Recalled

The performance was one of the finest that Dr. Muck has given since he has been in this city. The orchestra first bristled with curious effects, lightning-like witticisms, and then from all this fencing, this interplay of the most astonishing ideas, there stalked the tragedy. No wonder that the audience applauded so much that Dr. Muck was called back three times, and at last bade his men rise with him—the players who had given an exhibition of virtuosity hardly surpassable.

Following this, Mr. Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, played a very mundane piece of music—Bruch's 2d violin concerto—glibly, and too lengthily put together—played it with such extraordinary art that every bar interested the hearer, whether or not he protested at the boredom and sentimentality of the piece which Mr. Witek ennobled by his treatment. Very few artists now before the public approach him in his skill, his poise and artistic maturity.

The pace of the introduction of the Freischutz overture was too slow. The horn passage is sentimental enough as it is, without dragging it. The allegro, however, was given in a most stirring and sympathetic manner. Finally, Beethoven's 5th symphony brought the end of a notable concert.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [redacted]
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date .... JAN 913

For the January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Muck has arranged a program which is full of the atmosphere of the eighteenth century.

The impression will be heightened by the fact that Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano, who is to be the soloist, has chosen as her first number two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and the other by Gluck. Miss Gerhardt, who is making her first appearance in Washington at this concert, is a comparative stranger in America, for last season was the first time she visited this country. Her concerts then, however, were sufficient to impress the musical public with the fact that Germany had sent another valuable contribution to our musical life. Her first number will be two Italian arias, "Il Mio Bel Fuoco," by Marcello, and "O Del Mio Dolce Ardor," by Gluck. Her second number will be three modern songs by Richard Strauss, the accompaniments to which he himself orchestrated. These are "Morgen," "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie."

In the Bach Suite for the orchestra

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 - 1913

For the January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of unusual interest. Despite the presence on the programme of a work by Reger, one of the most modern of the moderns, the orchestral numbers are of true classical quality. Reger's concerto in ancient style, which is the last one of his compositions and has been printed only a few months, belongs in form to the eighteenth century, even if the thought is modern.

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano who is to be the soloist, has chosen as her first number two old Italian arias, one by Marcello and the other by Gluck. Miss Gerhardt who is making her first appearance in Washington at this concert, is a comparative stranger in America. Last season was the first time she visited this country. Her concerts then, however, were sufficient to impress the musical public with the fact that in her Germany had sent another valuable contribution to our musical life. The possessor of a very beautiful soprano voice, she has taste and intelligence in the interpretation of songs and arias that are the lot of very few artists. Her first number, as already said, will be two Italian arias, "Il mio bel fuoco" by Marcello and "O del mio dolce ardor" by Gluck. Her second number will be three very modern songs by Richard Strauss, the accompaniments to which he himself orchestrated. These are "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," and "Caecilie."

The Reger concerto in ancient style had its first performance in Frankfort-on-the-Main last October and has its first performance in America at an invitation concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York a month later, while its first public performances in America were at the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on December 13 and 14. It is a work in three movements with incidental solo violin. Reger has followed closely the model established by Bach and his contemporaries, yet despite its form the work breathes the spirit of modernity and different from most of Reger's works, it is full of beautiful melody. [illegible] other orchestral numbers will be Bach's suite in B-minor for flute and strings, and Mozart's immortal C-major symphony, commonly known as the "Jupiter." In the Bach suite the solo flute will be played by Andre Maquarre, the eminent flautist of the orchestra.

Nothing that Dr. Muck has done this time or in his previous stay in America has won him more praise and created more enthusiasm than his performances of this wonderfully beautiful old suite and Mozart's symphony. The programme in full is as follows: Concerto in ancient style (Reger); old Italian arias, "Il mio bel fuoco" (Marcello); "O del mio dolce ardor" (Gluck); suite in B-minor for flute and strings (Bach); three songs with orchestra, "Morgen," "Wiegenlied," "Caecilie" (Strauss); symphony in C-major, No. 4, "Jupiter" (Mozart). Soloist, Miss Ellna Gerhardt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 5 - 1913

revived.

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening presents several viewpoints of interest. The soloist will be Margarete Matzenauer, the great mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will be heard here then for the first time in concert. She will sing two numbers, the first being the Sextus aria, "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the aria of Leonora in "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin?"

The orchestral numbers include two works quite new to Philadelphia, one of them a novelty in several senses of the word. This is Max Reger's concerto in ancient style for orchestra, opus 123. In this work he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach.

The other work new here is the symphony in B minor, by the Russian "nationalist" composer, Borodin.

The full program for tomorrow night will be as follows:

Reger..................Concerto in ancient style
Mozart..............Aria of sextus from "Titus"
Brahms.............."Academic Festival" overture
Beethoven. "Abscheulicher, Wo Eilst Du hin?" from "Fidelio."
Borodin..............Symphony in B minor No. 2

Philadelphia Orchestra's Program

From BULL
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date JAN 4 - 1913

Owing to the illness of Dr. Muck, from which, however, he has quite recovered there has been a delay in announcing the program of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera House, as soloist. The program will comprise Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style, which will be heard in Philadelphia for the first time; Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture and Borodin's Second Symphony. Madame Matzenauer will sing as her first number the Sextus aria from Mozart's "Titus" and as her second number the "Abscheulicher" aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1913

OPERA and CONCERT

Operatic Activity Resumed—The Fellowship Club—Orchestra and Other Concerts.

THE third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy on Monday evening, and presents several viewpoints of interest. The soloist will be Margarete Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will be heard locally for the first time in concert. Madame Matzenauer's voice combines the qualities of contralto and dramatic soprano. She has been heard here in opera, and the opportunity to hear her in concert will doubtless appeal strongly to the musical public. She will sing two numbers, the Sextus aria "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the aria of Leonora, from "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher, Wu Eilst Du Hin?" The orchestral numbers include two works of special interest. One of them is Max Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style for Orchestra, opus 123. Reger shares with Strauss and Debussy the distinction of being ultra-modern. A man of wide musical learning, a contrapuntist of skill, his works often display skill at the expense of melodic value. This time, however, he is said to have gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century, and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach. The work was first produced in Frankfort, on October 4, 1912, and the Philharmonic Society of New York gave it privately on November 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts, in Boston, on December 13 and 14. The other work, which is new to Philadelphia, is Borodin's Symphony in B Minor, No. 2. It was written during the years 1871-77, and had its first performance in St. Petersburg on February 15, 1877. Borodin's vocation was medicine and surgery, and music was his avocation. Curiously enough, from 1862 to the day of his death he was a teacher of chemistry in the Academy of St. Petersburg. None the less he devoted much time to music, writing it in various forms. His music was always held in high esteem in Russia, and at this late date is rapidly gaining ground in Europe. In addition, the program will include Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

The operatic fast which has been kept

AMUSEMENTS

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, January 6, presents several features of inetrest. The soloist will be Madame Matzenauer, the extraordinary mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will be heard here then for the first time in concert. Madame Matzenauer's remarkable voice, which combines all qualities of the contralto and the dramatic soprano, has been heard here more than once in opera, and the opportunity to hear this great artist in concert will appeal strongly to the musical public. She will sing two numbers, the first being the Sextus aria, "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the great aria of Leonora in "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin?"

The orchestral numbers include two works quite new to Philadelphia, one of them a novelty in every sense of the word. This is Max Reger's concerto in ancient style for orchestra, opus 123. Reger shares with Strauss and Debussy the distinction of being the most interesting musical personality of our time.

A man of prodigious musical learning, a contrapuntalist of extraordinary skill, his works often in the past have displayed this skill at the expense of melodic value. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach. The work was first produced in Frankfort, on October 4 of last year, and the Philharmonic Society of New York gave it at an invitation concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on November 19. Its first public performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on December 13 and 14. The work is in three movements and employs one and two solo violins. It is scored for three flutes, three oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, three horns, kettledrums, solo violins and the usual strings.

The other work which is new to Philadelphia is Borodin's Symphony in B minor No. 2. It was written during the years 1871-77 and had its first performance in St. Petersburg on February 15, 1877. Borodin, who was born in 1834 and died in 1887, belonged to that Chauvinistic school of Russian musicians which rejected Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky as non-Russian and found its most eloquent expression in Rimsky-Korsakoff. The full programme will be as follows:

Reger—Concerto in ancient style.
Mozart—Aria of Sextus from "Titus."
Brahms—"Academic Festival" overture.
[illegible] "[illegible]scheulicher, wo eilst du [illegible] Fidelio."
[illegible]hony in B minor No. 2.

AGAIN POPULAR

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 5 - 1913

The third Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, January 6, presents several view-points of interest. The soloist will be Madame Matzenauer, the extraordinary mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will be heard here then for the first time in concert. Madame Matzenauer's very wonderful voice, which combines all qualities of the contralto and the dramatic soprano, has been heard here more than once in opera and, therefore, the opportunity to hear this great artist in concert will appeal strongly to the musical public. She will sing two numbers, the first being the Sextus aria, "Jetzt, Vitellia," from Mozart's opera, EMMY DESTINN WHO WILL SING THE TITLE ROLL IN "LA GIOCONDA".

"La Clemenza di Tito," and the great aria of Leonora in "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher, Wo eilst du hin?"

The orchestral numbers include two works quite new to Philadelphia, one of them a novelty in every sense of the word. This is Max Reger's Concert in Ancient Style for Orchestra, opus 123. Reger shares with Strauss and Debussy the distinction of being the most interesting musical personality of our time. In this work, however, he has gone back to the form made popular by the composers of the early eighteenth century and clothed modern thought after the manner of Bach.

The other work which is new to Philadelphia is Borodin's Symphony in B Minor No. 2. The full program will be as follows:—

Reger.............Concerto in Ancient Style
Mozart..........Aria of Sextus from "Titus"
Brahms.........."Academic Festival" Overture
Beethoven.."Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin?" from "Fidelio."
Borodin..........Symphony in B Minor No. 2

TRAVELER HERALD,
JANUARY 18,

STRAUSS NUMBER SYMPHONY FEATURE

Anton Witek as Soloist Plays Bruck No. 2 Concerto.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

An unusually attractive program and the chance to hear Anton Witek, concert master of the Symphony orchestra, as soloist drew a capacity audience to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon at the 12th public rehearsal. The audience was given a bit of a scare after the opening number, a splendid reading of the Weber "Der Freischutz" overture, when the librarian of the orchestra was seen to come forth and consult with Dr. Muck, the latter to leave the platform, only to be followed by the summoning of Mr. Brooke, the official announcer of the orchestra.

But the scare proved groundless, for Mr. Brooke simply announced that Mr. Witek had been delayed and instead of the Brush concerto for violin being the second number on the program, the orchestra would play the third number, the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." The number proved to be the feature of the program. It is Strauss all over and was excellently given, so pleasing to the audience that it not only insisted upon Dr. Muck bowing acknowledgement of its applause several times, but also had the pleasure of seeing him call upon the orchestra to rise.

Mr. Witek played the concerto in his usual style, yet when it was over one could but wish he had chosen a more

---

POST,
JANUARY 25,

URACK LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Maggie Teyte Sings—Two Pieces by Strube

BY OLIN DOWNES

Otto Urack again conducted at the public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, for Dr. Muck's unfortunate illness had again attacked him, and he had been obliged to take to his bed. The soloist was Maggie Teyte, known as a singer of distinction in concert and in opera, and her songs were the lament of Lia, from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and the air, "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise." Two symphonic poems of Gustave Strube, "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Lorelei," were played for the first time, and the composer conducted. Mr. Urack interpreted Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and the Dvorak "New World" Symphony.

The air of Debussy was sung with unusual appreciation of its style. It is not dramatic. It is a pleasant task for a singer, and a singer so intelligent, with such appreciation of its style, can make it interesting. Later in the afternoon Miss Teyte undertook an air of more dramatic character. In her treatment of Debussy's phrases, in her command of nuance, she represented the music excellently. The music of Charpentier was superbly sung. Other singers have voices with more body and sensuous beauty, although Miss Teyte's upper tones are exceptionally well placed and produced, but few, indeed, have made this air so instinct with the sensuous passion which is the breath of Louise, and none has done more justice to its melodic line or achieved a more thrilling climax. And Miss Teyte colored her tones admirably. After the glowing climax the last words were of a haunting and voluptuous tenderness. Much had been expected of the singer's intelligence and knowledge of modern French idioms, but her dramatic singing of this air was somewhat of a surprise—and a very gratifying one. Miss Teyte was repeatedly recalled.

[147]

The first of Mr. Strube's pieces, "sketches" might be a better term, is conspicuous for effects of color, and the mood implied by the thought of the dreamy and contemplative Narcissus invites such treatment. The concluding passages of the piece are the most effective, and at a first hearing have the most pronounced character. The ideas of the second piece, in accordance again with the title, have more substance and outline, but this piece is to us too long. Its development toward the climax is tortuous, often unprofitable. The ideas are very small. Their treatment always shows a pretty taste and a predilection for harmonies and instrumentation of the modern French character, but it is possible to refine ideas down to the point where the ideas have almost ceased to exist.

Mr. Urack has by now shown himself to be worthy of the trust reposed in him by Dr. Muck and the management of Symphony Hall. He conducted two effective compositions, and the first of which brought him several recalls at the beginning of the concert. Dvorak's "New World" symphony is always delightful for its blend of classic and romantic elements, for its charming melodies, its brilliant or poetical instrumentation.

GLOBE—

JANUARY 25.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mr Strube Brings Forward Two New Tone Poems.

Miss Maggie Teyte Sings With Fine Vocal Art and Imagination.

Dr Muck conducted the Saturday evening Symphony concert a week ago with a high fever. He developed a case of grippe during the week and permitted Mr Urack to appear again as conductor at the 13th public rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company was the soloist. The program was as follows: Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy, recit and aria of Lia from "The Prodigal Son"; Strube, two symphonic poems, "Narcissus and Echo," "Die Loreley" (first performance), conducted by the composer; Charpentier, air "Dupuis le Jour" from "Louise"; Dvorak, Symphony No. 5 "From the New World."

Since his symphony in B minor Mr Strube's trend toward a more modern musical expression has been well defined and constant. The "Puck" showed keener imagination and greater lightness of touch. The two symphonic poems of yesterday, played for the first time, disclosed an indisputable tinge of Gallic feeling and idiom in the increasingly exotic flavor of the harmonic vocabulary and in the refinement of style.

Although based upon an ancient fable, the first piece has been inspired, we are told, by the glamour and atmosphere of a poem by Malfilatre and a painting on a similar subject by Watteau. Mr Strube has expressed the impressionism, the pastoral loveliness and the fugitive charm of the flowering imagination of this period, although in musical symbols that developed two centuries later. His work is not imitative. It has individuality. There are fugitive tonalities of a rare and haunting beauty and novel orchestral tints, some of them reaching a strange mystery, or perhaps the forgotten music of a dream.

As a colorist Mr Strube has made marked progress. He uses his orchestra now as a painter of technic and imagination mixes the colors upon his palette. The Narcissus is a miniature, and it keeps within its frame. The lines of the principal subject are not graven too deeply. The treatment has coherence and continuity, yet it holds the elusiveness of graceful artificiality.

"The Loreley" is a longer work than its companion and built on a larger scale. Though treating of a personage who is said to have flourished on the banks of the Rhine, and now more particularly in German literature, it also shows the influence of the French musical speech. There is a dramatic scheme, and if there are some pages of repetitions in development, there are well developed climaxes. The themes have character, particularly that representative of the siren, which by a strange but happy fancy is given to the viola, and afforded Mr Ferir opportunity to display his art. How impressive the final return of the theme in this somber color, and we shudder at the fate of the hapless boatman.

Miss Teyte did well to pass by the temptation, if there were one, to sing the tenor's familiar air from Debussy's cantata. She sang the Lia's lament and cry for her son with a fine intensity of feeling in the dramatic climax, yet with unforced and beautiful tone. She differentiated between recitative and aria, and her diction was expressive. Miss Teyte's singing of the Charpentier aria was admirable vocally, polished in its nuances, and given in the true vein of intimate confession. It was an exquisite piece of dramatic singing in a lyric mold, and it is not to be forgotten that Boston recently has heard this music sung with wholly satisfying art.

Mr Urack gave a finely composed performance of Berlioz' overture and was particularly fortunate in his treatment of the first two movements of Dvorak's symphony. The nostalgic character of the largo was beautifully interpreted, and there were few in the acrid controversy over this work who denied that the composer while in America suffered sickness of heart for his native land.

The orchestra will be absent on its Western trip next week. The next program is to be announced.

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 25.

URACK CONDUCTS THE SYMPHONY

DR. MUCK AGAIN ON THE SICK LIST

Miss Maggie Teyte, Soloist, Offered a Debussy Number With Rare Artistry.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz. "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.
Debussy. Aria from "The Prodigal Son."
Soloist, Miss Maggie Teyte.
Strube. "Narcisssus and Echo," "Loreley."
Charpentier. Air from "Louise."
Miss Teyte.
Dvorak. "From the New World" Symphony.

One cannot expect Astyanax to be Hector, and it would be unjust to demand of Mr. Urack the wonderful conductorship of Dr. Muck. The latter has taken to his bed again, a victim to New England climate. This necessitated a change of programme and the Sinding symphony was shelved in favor of Dvorak's much-debated, but thoroughly beautiful American symphony. We do not think that the auditors were losers by the exchange, for we always enjoy the work which the Bohemian built up on plantation melodies.

If these melodies are not identifiable as directly Southern tunes, we can at least always recognize their flavor. They are most of them of the cotton-field, and the hearty rhythm, and the simple sadness, that permeates the true plantation music is there. The exquisite English horn melody (which was beautifully, but too softly, played) that ushers in and ends the slow movement, is, for example, not a darkey song, but it has exactly the plaintive style of "Swing low, sweet chariot," and many other songs of the South.

"Palmum qui meruit ferat"! Dvorak was not the first to introduce the plantation effect into classical music. Mr. Chadwick had done this in symphonic work long before Dvorak came to America. The largo is, to our mind, the best movement of the symphony. Yet one must commend the skill with which Dvorak brings in reminiscences of preceding movements in the finale. Dvorak's work is melodic, and some day music will come back to melody. It was a pleasure to listen to a tuneful work in the large forms once more. Yet one must beware of sentimentalizing it. The orchestra was always playing very loudly or very softly. Much of the blame for this must be laid upon Dvorak, but the advanced conductor ought to correct the crudities of the composer, as far as possible.

The Song of Lia introduced Miss Maggie Teyte to a Boston symphonic audience. This is not a setting of one of Roosevelt's speeches to music, but a selection from Debussy's most melodic opera. That Miss Teyte leaned heavily to the French school may be judged by the fact that she followed this with the song which Louise sings on Montmartre. It was pleasant to hear a selection from the epoch when Debussy used to write melodies. And Miss Teyte sang the number most beautifully. Here was a fresh and expressive voice, used in the dramatic school, without any screaming or forcing, without any wobbly tremolo, and evidently owned by a musical nature.

If the air from "Louise" was the less perfect of the two, the blame may be put emphatically upon the shoulders of Charpentier himself. He has deliberately made some of the passages not only unvocal, but almost vocally impossible. The widest skips take place, from the lowest to the highest register, and vice versa. Miss Teyte achieved wonders with this difficult number, and the many recalls that followed were made with very evident and spontaneous enthusiasm. She certainly won an immediate success at this concert.

But this was not the only success; Mr. Strube won another. He led his own two compositions. "The Loreley" is a subject of which Germans never tire. Whenever they are very joyous they sing the lines—

> "I know not what spell is enchanting,
> That I am to Sadness inclined."

If only Mr. Stube could give us a melody such as Liszt used in picturing this subject his tone-poem would be a joy forever. But such tunes are growing very rare in this 20th century. The composer certainly has achieved two very successful works in modern impressionist vein, and he is more logical in this school than the Holbrookes, and Bantocks, Delluses and Pfitzners that have preceded him. If Mr. Strube had his works performed in Germany or France he might become famous—he certainly deserves to. His ability in orchestral scoring is pronounced, and his development of themes far less fragmentary than that of many other moderns. His conducting too, was decidedly the best of the concert, although this is but natural since he was leading his own compositions.

"Narcissus" was a gentle bit of modern suggestion, that was able "To sigh, yet feel no pain." "Loreley" had premonitions of catastrophe, yet moments of tenderness as well. But herein lies the weakness of all "programme-music,"—had the pieces been played without any title, the audience might have been given 7000 guesses and never a one have unriddled the fact that "Narcissus" and the "Loreley" were being portrayed. But here again the blame goes higher up than the composer, it is the inherent weakness of pictorial instrumental music when weighed in the balance against poetry or painting. The public will need to hear Mr. Strube's works more than once to appreciate their power in their particular school.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which began the concert, is not comparable to its companion work, the "Carnaval Romaine" overture. It often seems blatant and forced, [illegible]

HERALD.

JANUARY 25.

13TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz Greatly Enjoyed.

MISS TEYTE PLEASES

Heard to Special Advantage in the Air from Charpentier's "Louise."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As Dr. Muck is still suffering from the grip Mr. Urack conducted. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"....Berlioz
Aria of Lia from "The Prodigal Son," Debussy
Two symphonic poems: "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Loreley"........Strube
Air from "Louise"............Charpentier
Symphony "From the New World".Dvorak

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" is 75 years old. An astonishing composition at the time of its birth, it is wonderful in its old age, a vigorous old age, more to be desired than the yeasty and futile youth of many recent works of the advanced French school. Berlioz had no one before him for imitation. He though his own thoughts; he invented his own expression. If he had not lived and written, what would many of our admired composers of latter days have done? The more Berlioz is studied, the more the wonder grows at his colossal originality. Yet there are some who still insist that he had little melodic invention. They have ears, and they do not hear. They should read the essay of Romain Rolland, and the essay of Felix Weingartner in his recently published volume "Akkorde," for there are many, unfortunately, who do not trust their own judgment and are eager to accept the sayings of others who are considered men of authority. The overture was played with spirit and with fine appreciation of the beauties in the detail.

Mr. Strube conducted his two symphonic poems which were written last winter. They were played for the first time. The first poem is illustrative of the old legend. As told in the encyclopaedias for the instruction of ingenuous youth, the beautiful Narcissus was "inaccessible to the feeling of love, and the nymph Echo, who was enamored of him, died of grief; but Nemesis, to punish him, caused him to see his own image reflected in a fountain, whereupon he became so enamored of it that he gradually pined away, until he was matamorphosed into the flower which bears his name." Mr. Strube was excited to composition by the poem of Malfilatre on this subject.

The two symphonic poems are like grace in the hymn: "a charming sound, harmonious to my ear." They are interesting chiefly as examples of fine coloring. The thematic material is not important, and "Narcissus and Echo" might have had another title or been played as a pastorale. The legend of the Loreley has fired the fancy of many composers, but when we hear the word Loreley we think instinctively of Heine's poem and Silcher's melody that has become a folk-song.

Miss Teyte, who gave a recital here last season, sang yesterday for the first time with the Symphony orchestra. It is to be regretted that she chose Lia's recitative and air. The music is neither good Massenet nor good Debussy. Miss Teyte made the most of it, and at the end gave the closing phrases emotional quality by the charm and expressiveness of her voice. She sang the air of Louise delightfully. The voice is a beautiful one, youthful, fresh, free, fraught with emotion. Miss Teyte sings spontaneously, with uncommon ease, with an intelligence that is as a second nature. It is a pity that we have not yet heard her at the Opera House. All Paris praised her as Melisande: "An innocent and poetic Melisande with a voice of delicious purity, with golden hair, a little princess of the amorous and mystic legend, giving in a marvelous fashion the sensation of the unreal." The modesty of her bearing and the effective simplicity of her dress enhanced yesterday the pleasure of hearing her.

An excellent performance of Dvorak's popular symphony brought the end to a concert that was not too long.

There will be no concerts next week.

JOURNAL. JANUARY 25.

Maggie Teyte Charms S
Audience by Her Ren

Orchestra's Program Includes New Symphonic Poems by Strube.

By E. F. Harkins.

The British prima donnas, Mary Garden, Louise Edvina and Maggie Teyte, have been the most successful interpreters of the vocal music written by Debussy and Charpentier, and all three of these signers have been features of the current musical season here. Miss Teyte yesterday entered the exclusive company of Symphony soloists, selecting as her entrance numbers the Recitative and Air of Lia, from Debussy's "Prodigal Son," and the Air "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Celebrated Melisande

Miss Teyte, who changed her name from Tate when she left London for Paris and who afterward married a Frenchman, Eugene Plumon, is one of the most celebrated of the Melisandes. Debussy has publicly shown his admiration of her artistry; he has dedicated songs to her and played accompaniments for her; and she pays him the compliment this week of singing for the Symphony patrons one of his least cryptic songs, familiar to many of them and particularly to those who have seen the cantata performed at the Opera House. The Charpentier Air is also familiar. But better than both of the songs yesterday was the singing.

For Miss Teyte has a rare voice. Its large range and power are the least of many remarkable qualities. Most impressive of all are the expressive shadings that make it fairly iridescent and that reveal the singer's thorough command of emotional utterance. The upper part of the voice is the most lovely, but equally to be admired are the darker and more emotional tones of her middle register.

Debut a Triumph

Miss Teyte's appearance—she is blond and girlish and sweet twenty-one—was as pleasing as her voice, and the applause lasted until she had returned to the stage and bowed half a dozen times after each number. It is not often that a singer makes so favorable an impression on a debut at the Symphony concerts. But this charming little Englishwoman has the art and personality that go to make enduring favorites in Boston.

Two new Symphonic poems, "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Loreley," by Gustav Strube, are also on this week's program. Mr. Strube usually is to be seen sitting modestly back among the first violinists. Yesterday he appeared only as composer and conductor. Mr. Strube has talent that enables him to turn his hand to different styles of composition, from the emotional and melodious tunes heard at the "Pop" concerts to works like these two new tone poems. The peculiar weakness of these pieces, written in the manner foster-fathered by Debussy, is that so many of them sound alike. Narcissus and Echo departing for the promised isle might be Pelleas and Melisande discussing Golaud's unprepossessing whiskers, and the Loreley's song, for the most part, might be that of Louise telling Julien about her old-fashioned father. But the dull, sickening thud of the boat striking the rock was unmistakable enough.

Friendly applause rewarded the composer as he left the conductor's stand.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, and Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World," were also performed, the orchestra being led by Mr. Urack, the 'cellist. Dr. Muck is convalescing rapidly out in the country from his attack of the grippe.

---

there for two weeks, beginning Fe
by J. Townsend Russell.

N. 11, AT 8:15
RICH, Violinist
Jan. 10, at 3:0
19 Chestnut.

[142]

TRAVELER HERALD,

JANUARY 25,

MAGGIE TEYTE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Scores Success in Debussey and Charpentier Selections—Urack Conducts.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

Maggie Teyte's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the conducting of two of his own compositions by Gustave Strube and Mr. Urack once again at the conductor's desk, owing to the illness of Dr. Muck, were the features of yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist scored a pronounced success singing the lament of Lia from Debussey's cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and the air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Mr. Strube directed the orchestra in his "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Lorelei" most successfully and was enthusiastically applauded at their close.

Under Mr. Urack the orchestra played the Berloiz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and the Dvorak "New World" symphony. The symphony afforded genuine pleasure with its melodious lines and artistic interpretation. They may debate until kingdom come about the merits of the plantation melodies, but so long as they afford such pleasure as was the case yesterday afternoon the debate is harmless.

There will be no concerts the coming week.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 25,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Miss Mggie Teyte, soprano, soloist, and with Otto Urack and Gustave Strube as conductors, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its thirteenth public rehearsal in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following program: Berlioz, overture to the opera "Benvenuto Celliui," op. 23; Debussy, recitative and aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue;" Strube, two symphonic poems, "Echo and Narcissus" and "Die Loreley," first performance; Charpentier, air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise;" Dvorak, symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.

Miss Teyte held the standard of soprano singing in Symphony concerts on the high level where Miss Gerhardt placed it a few weeks ago. More brilliant and free as a tone-maker than the German singer, she falls a little below the mark of that careful interpreter in clearness of verbal utterance. But as a reader of vocal melody Miss Teyte is an exceptional artist. In pure musical quality, in use of voice as an instrument she stands quite by herself. Though she fills every word of her text with an appropriate meaning, giving inflection to every syllable of the librettist suitable to his idea, she never allows speech articulation to interfere with the flow of tone. She may be said to represent a revival of the art of singing as practised in the days before the text of an aria had the inherent importance it has now. Perhaps the dramatic text has come to be taken too seriously in modern times as a collection of vowels and consonants. Artists have felt obliged not only to make a translation into singing tone of the thought of the lines but have considered that they must actually force the words into the understanding of the listener. It has not mattered whether the listener was familiar with the language in which the text was written or not; the words in their character of speech elements have been supposed to have high value.

The soloist of Friday afternoon seems to discard all idea of the mechanical importance of words. She puts mere articulation in a subordinate relation. And when a singing voice once appropriates a text to itself through the medium of the composer's melody and fills it with a hundred grades and shades of emotion, every one of them expressing the play of thought in the character that is speaking, has it not done enough? Why should we demand that it not only supply this emotion, but also put the word along beside it in order to prove to us that it is doing the thing right? So devoted to realism have we become that we insist on being taken to the places where the pictures which hang in our galleries were painted, that we may be sure they are correct and to the life.

Our modern recital interpreters have overdone the importance of words. Miss Teyte's beautiful, free vocal art is a convincing protest against these realists in song. She may yet liberate the musical world from an emphasis that warps enjoyment. She may recall us from a strained esthetic situation. She may help redefine the line that divides the singer's province from the reader's.

Mr. Strube's two new pieces were both applauded by the rehearsal audience, the work narrating the legend of the Loreley more than the one telling the myth of Echo and Narcissus, probably because the composition on the German theme closed in a lively mood, while the one on the classic theme ended rather in a mood of suspense. Mr. Strube conducted his music in an admirable manner and so did himself ample justice as far as presentation was concerned. As composer he reappeared in his character of a poet of the lighter moods and of the minor classification. Not a deep observer of his times, he discusses secondary aspects of the life around him. The greater issues of the day do not find statement in his work. If Mr. Strube with his kindliness of attitude, his geniality of disposition, were to remark how the nations today are troublously aware of the opportunities of self-denial showing up before them, if he were to note any of the ideas that are blocking themselves out in the thought of the twentieth century, and were to find room for them in his scores, he would have applause as great as has Richard Strauss. There is fancy and there are many more of the gentler gifts of imagination in the pages of the Boston composer. There is orchestral resource and originality. But where is the encouragement for the world to go on with its larger purpose? Where is the laughter that will make it alter its bungling manners?

Mr. Urack as conductor of the overture, the accompaniments of the arias and of the symphony repeated the success he has made on former occasions when acting for Dr. Muck. While he is not yet a great conductor, Mr. Urack is something far better than a man well drilled in the repertory routine. His interpretations have communicating quality. His readings represent a purpose thought out and commanded into utterance. There is original intention in his performances and technique for carrying it out. The "New World" symphony was given a most satisfactory presentation. There was an elastic phrasing of the themes, a sympathetic exposition of their melodic content, a welding together of the four moods of the work into a whole effect that proved abundantly Mr. Urack's understanding of the music and his mastery of the players. There was, moreover, that capacity for giving satisfaction at the time and in the place, which indicated his knowledge of his public and his interest in its aspirations.

The works to be played at the fourteenth pair of concerts, Feb. 7 and 8, were not announced in the program book.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 25,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS TEYTE AND NEW PIECES BY MR. STRUBE

Mr. Urack, in Lieu of Dr. Muck, Again—The Sum of His Conducting—Mr. Strube's Tone-Poems Out of Old Legend—One That Gives Pleasure; One That Is Tame and Obscure—Miss Teyte's Bright Singing

MR. URACK is a fortunate young man. The season through, he might have been no more than the titular "assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," leading in the few concerts in which a part of it assists a singer, a virtuoso or a dancer. As it has happened, in two months he has conducted in four pairs of the regular concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and in occasional concerts in other cities, with the whole "Western trip" of next week likely to fall also to him. Here and elsewhere, audiences have been cordial to him and the men of the orchestra have worked willingly under him. In Mr. Urack's eyes, the absent Dr. Muck is the paragon of conductors; and when the programme has enabled him to reproduce the "reading" his chief gave to a particular piece, he has been devotedly faithful to it. As the music came to the hearer's ears, the difference has been only the difference in the immediate and enkindling personality of the two men.

When Mr. Urack has prepared his pieces by himself he has shown intelligent grasp of the matter and the manner of the music, a correlating sense of design and detail, a laudable respect for the composer's clear purposes, and a measure of responsiveness to symphony, overture or tone-poem on its poetic, pictorial, emotional and imaginative sides. He has been discreetly individual and temperamental with his music; but always intelligence and care, rather than ardor and individuality, have been uppermost in him. He has seemed too conscious of his obligations to his chief, his audience, and his band to let himself go. He has controlled his men with like continence and discretion. His beat is clear; he has an excellent ear for the quality and the weight of tone; he is mindful of instrumental proportions and euphonies; he neither goads his band nor is careless with it. If only he was not quite so continent in all these virtues, if only imagination and individuality might warm them more and make them more supple. He has won the discreet admiration of his audience as he did with Dvoràk's "New World" symphony yesterday. He might stir it to a warmer feeling as he almost did with the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." It is hard to resist Berlioz's vivid music. Mr. Urack almost let himself go.

Mr. Strube, in turn, having a composer's solicitude for his own pieces, was not the most stirring of conductors when he led the orchestra through his two new tone-poems, though he might properly and truly reply that they required such delicate handling. The first, "Narcissus and Echo," is all filaments of sound. A French retelling, in the eighteenth-century manner, of the old Greek fable, stimulated Mr. Strube to composition. He sought first to make a tone-picture in the manner of Watteau—the wood of Venus, bathed in golden haze, while the tender green leaves rustled and the brook stayed its rippling course long enough to be Narcissus's mirror. Then Echo woos him vainly; her voice dies away complaining. And Narcissus, as vainly loving the image of his own beauty, pines and dies. Delineatively, Mr. Strube's tone-poem is easy to follow from a hint of the old legend and of a Watteau-like treatment of it. The beginning is the music of the golden-green wood of the Cyprian isle. The plaintive, wistful, introspective oboe and viola characterize Narcissus and his longing for himself, the warmer and more human clarinet is the voice of Echo; the muted trumpet bears back her plaints to Narcissus's ear as she wanders disconsolate; for an instant the viola repeats his pinings and repinings; a light stroke upon the drums is the light hand of releasing death; the music sighs itself away. Poetic delineation and musical development keep united pace through the little tone-poem. The delineation is no more than suggestion and the melodies no more than suggestions, too, that Mr. Strube clothes in the magic of timbres and harmonies. By the quality of these instrumental voices Narcissus and Echo have their imagined being and the fable runs its course. By the quality of these harmonies they and the tale move against the golden background of wood and isle. The instrumental colorings are almost always pale; the harmonies faint, fine, evasive. Out of a tonal mist, as it were, come these their voices of old legend. The music is all water-coloring in tones—the melancholy fancy of the eighteenth century in France in the melancholy harmonic and instrumental idiom of the twentieth century Parisians.

The other tone-poem, "Loreley," evidently intended as a companion and contrasting piece, is of stouter substance and larger voice. No mists veil the Rhine-land. The sun shines; the river flows; lusty is the life in the villages and on the hills beside it. Yet Mr. Strube is retelling old legend; the Rhine-land is the land of "once upon a time," good spirits and evil dwell in the stream and the cliffs, sport there. He does not lay on too hard with melody, rhythm, color. The picturing is glamorous, but somewhat thin and long-drawn. The Loreley sings, in the voice of the uncanny viola again and with some of the accents of contemporary French song. It is possible to conceive a more soulless, enticing fatal, melody than Mr. Strube has been able to invent for her. The fisher-folk stay work and play to heed; one lingers and is engulfed in the whirlpool beneath the cliff; the Loreley sings on—for other fishers. It is hard to follow the course of this second tone-poem. The delineation is tortuous; the music often obscure and prolix. Its melodies do not touch the imagination; they halt in repetitions rather than go forward in development. There is much less than the usual magic in Mr. Strube's timbres and harmonies. It is cloudy music of meditative reflection rather than quick imagination. It is not often uncanny. It is often tame.

Before and after Mr. Strube's melancholy fancies was the brightness of Miss Teyte and her singing. She is so simply and honestly young, so pleasantly comely, so unaffected of dress and manner, so very alert, so eager to please and be rewarded. And so seldom does a voice of unmistakably youthful timbre come into the Symphony Concerts. It was a much more agreeable voice than it seemd last winter when Miss Teyte sang here for the first time. Then some of her tones had sharp edges; some of them seem to come from a constricted throat; and she sought a penetrating power that hardened her song. Yesterday, she sang freely and smoothly without a hint of the old sharpness. Her voice had a brightness that individualizes it, and a vibrancy, as the French call it, to each changing contour of the music and each flash or streak of feeling behind that kept her singing full of vivid intonations. She sang first the plaintive air of the mother in Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son"—sweetly plaintive in the manner of the late Monsieur Massenet, yet touched here and there with a faint fleck of the more imaginative and more adroit pupil. Miss Teyte was imaginative and adept too. She spun the pretty phrases and made the deft little contrasts; but now and then the music glinted with her bright intonations as though Debussy as he wrote and the mother as she sang, might have had an emotion or two. Louise's rhapsody of happiness, from Charpentier's like-named opera, gave Miss Teyte emotion enough, expressed in music, that bears many repetitions by many voices. The sensuous beauty of this music thrills; it is elation made tones. Song and passion are at one in it. It is the voice of freedom and the voice of youth. Miss Teyte missed not a quality of it—the lyric sensuousness, the wringing passion, the free rhapsody that makes intricate intervals seem as nothing; the bright fire that is the glow of youth.

H. T. P.

CHICAGO OPERA SOPRANO IN BOSTON

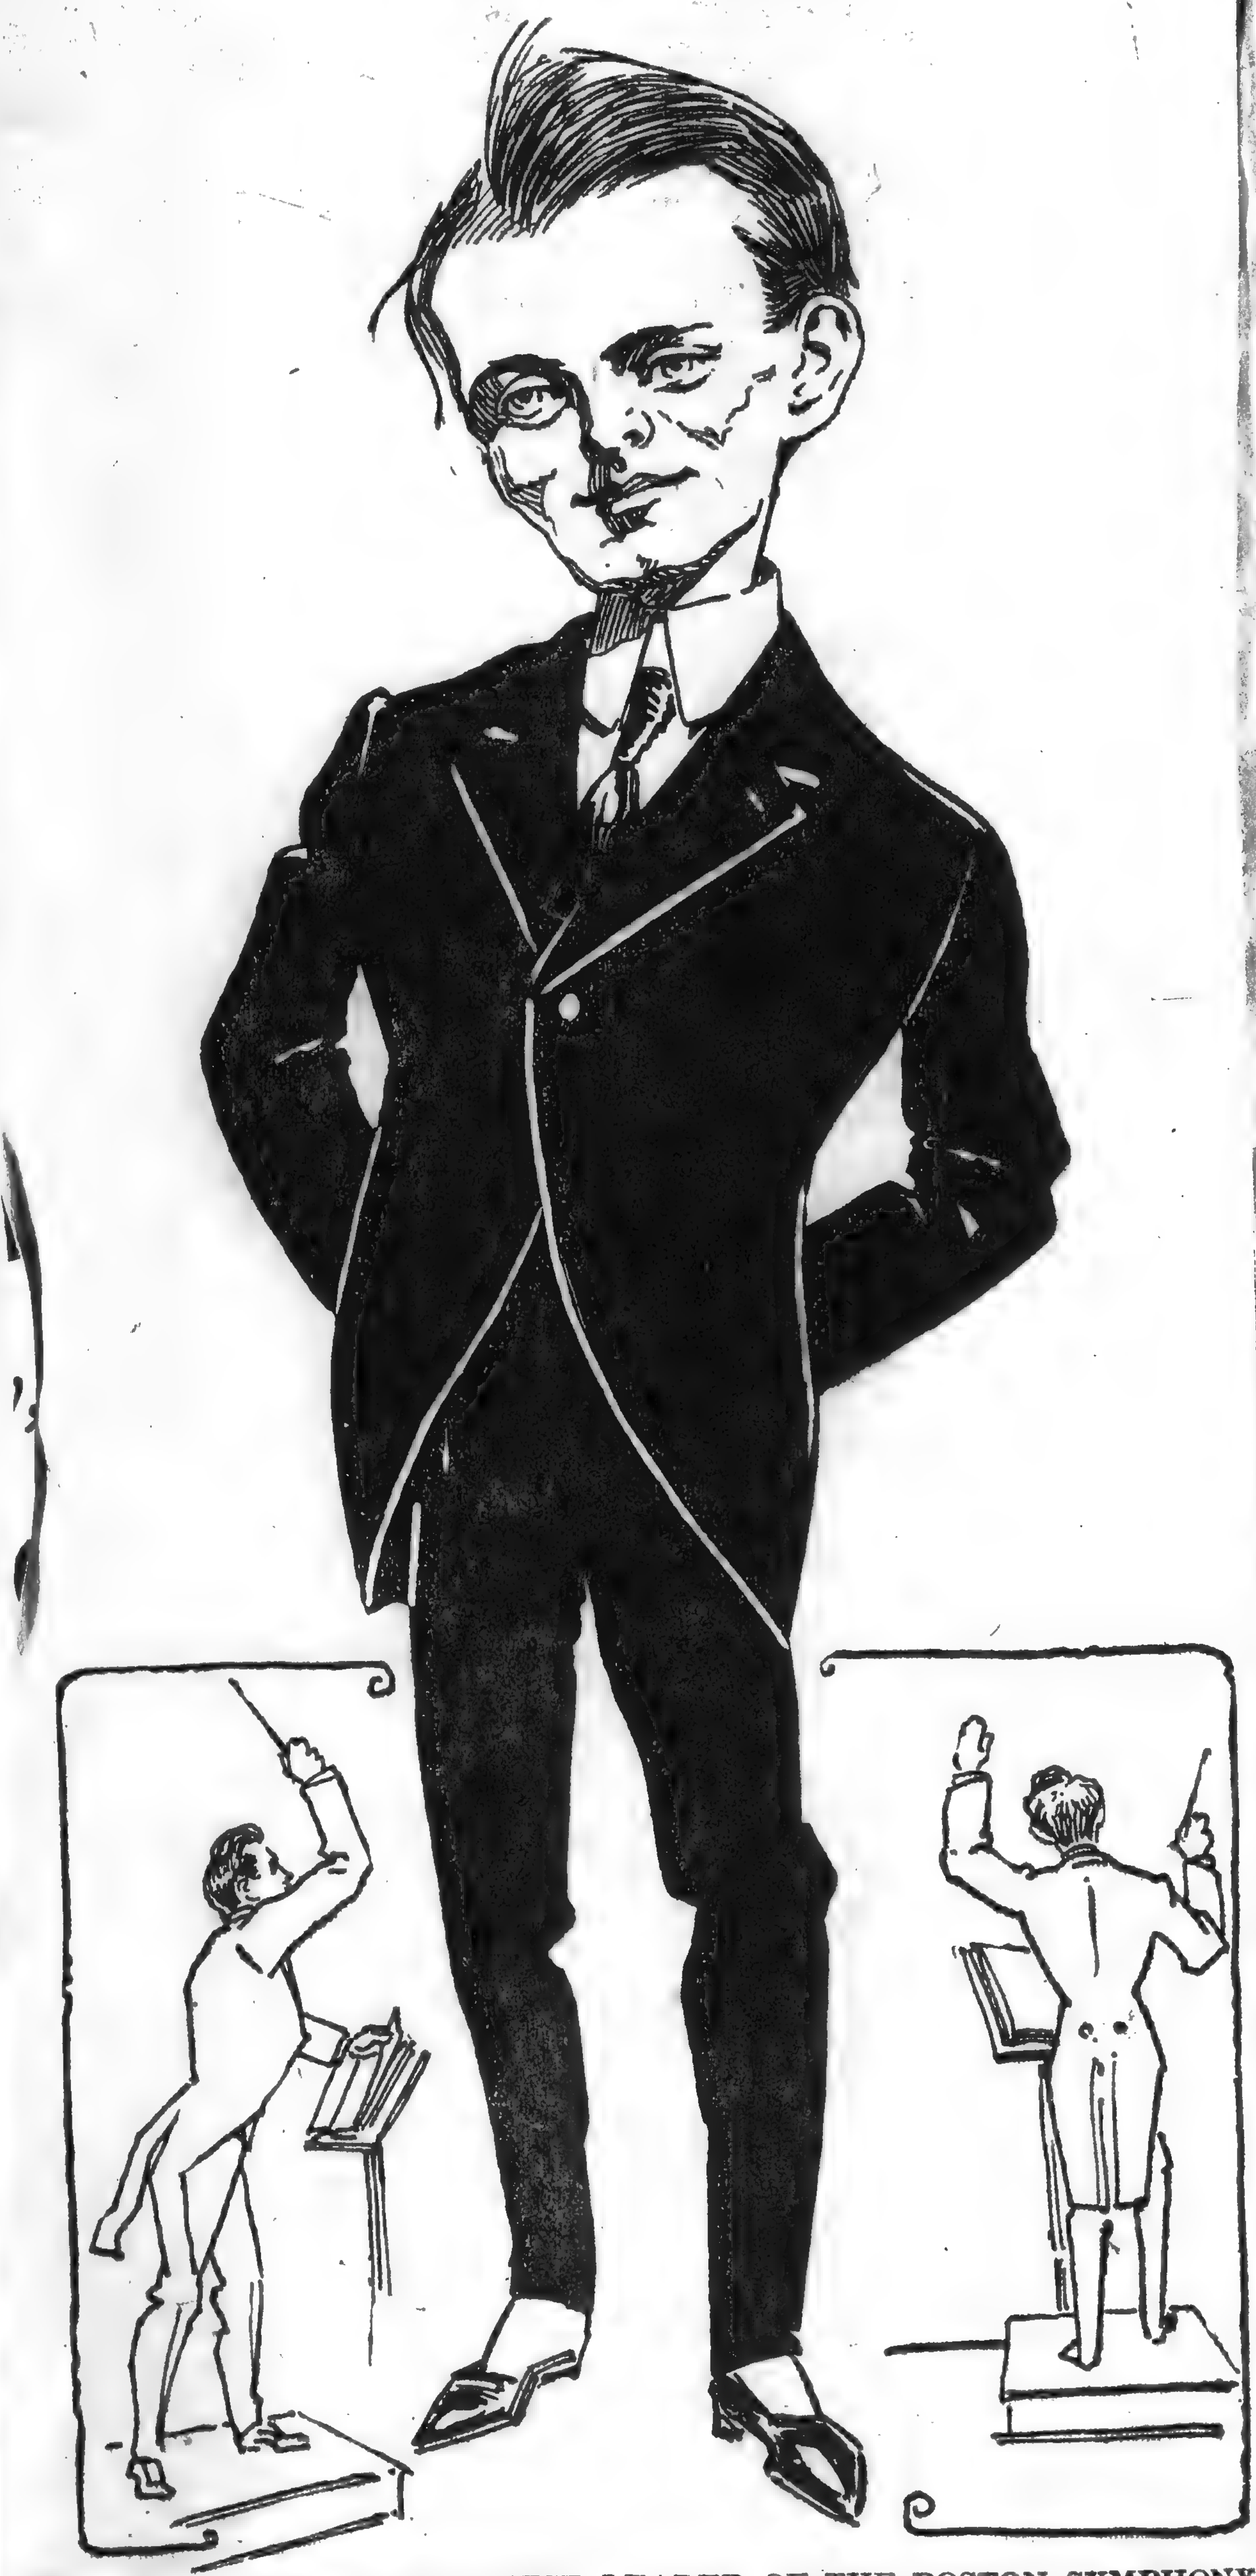
(Photo by Mishkin Studio, New York)

Miss Maggie Teute, interpreter of French pictorial roles,

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1913

Leads Symphonies and Likes "Movies"

Herr Urack, Dr. Muck's Youthful Assistant, a Regular Picture Theatregoer and Is Partial to Ragtime—Is Chummy With Edison



OTTO URACK, THE YOUNGEST LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Otto Urack, who is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of Dr. Carl Muck, and who possesses the unique distinction of being the youngest man ever to swing a baton over that famous body, delights in the "movies."

He said so Saturday night, after the Symphony concert, confessing to a Post reporter that he attends at least once a week with his young American wife, and also admitted that he likes ragtime and has written a comic opera which he hopes to have accepted in New York next year.

Herr Urack, who at 18 conducted the famous "chamber concerts" of the Royal Opera House orchestra in Berlin, paid a high compliment to Boston audiences, stating that they felt the music more than those in other cities. He is now conducting the Symphony Orchestra on a tour of six Western cities.

Dotes on Ragtime

Furthermore, he says he likes ragtime and is rather pleased with the idea that almost simultaneously with the appearance of some of his compositions which have won the praise of the most weighty musical classicists of Europe there will be published from his facile pen in this country two of what he calls "your American songs."

In one breath Herr Urack told of his hope that what will be up to the present his chef-d'oeuvre, his "Symphony in Four Moods," on which he is now at work, will be produced for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in April; and in the next he mentions with pride that he has been able to catch the spirit of ragtime music, native to this land, and hums a bit from one of his own "rags" as catchy as anything of the music comedy offerings.

Herr Urack's versatility as a composer hardly exceeds his wide range as a musical performer. While ranking as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Karl Muck, he is starring as one of the two principal 'cellists of the orchestra, following a splendid career as a 'cello soloist in Berlin and Bayreuth. If it were not for his excellence in this department he would be ranked as a wonderful pianist.

Yet Herr Urack's artistic temperament does not seem to burden him with the intense seriousness which is often the case. Although his English is still a trifle weak, he was able to understand when the Post artist told him the story of the German who had never been to America, and whose ideas of this country were so limited that when he met an American from New York he took it for granted that he must know an acquaintance of the German's in San Francisco.

Herr Urack chuckled delightedly. "Ah," he said, "that is my first—what is your word for wits—oh, yes, my first American joke."

Waiting for Terrier Pup

He took pride in showing his visitors Kitty, a big gray and white tabby, that is at present the pet of the apartment. "But I am soon going to have one of your Boston dogs," went on the conductor, "only he is not born yet." It appears he has been promised one of the offspring of a blue ribbon Boston terrier and is delighted with the prospect.

As the famous young musician talked his conversation ran the gamut of every musical centre of Europe from the North Sea to the Aegean; for few musicians of any age have come to this country with such a wide background of territory in which their reputation is established. He has conducted grand opera in Sofia and Bucharest, as well as in Berlin and Munich.

His comments on the Balkan capitals are amusing and almost Yankee in their practicalness.

"Sofia, ah, it is a beautifully situated city, but where one sleeps there are too many—what do you call them—bugs, yes, just the same in the best hotels." So the capital of the victorious Bulgars was casually discussed. Bucharest, the Roumanian [illegible] Herr Urack calls the "little Paris" of the Far East.

Deeply interested in, as well as familiar with, high German society, Herr Urack had some interesting comments to make on the present state of feeling with regard to the empire's rulers.

The crown prince, he says, with all his flippancy and love of a good time, is vastly more popular with the people than is his stern-minded father, the Emperor. On the other hand officialdom has little use for the crown prince and in the army barracks it is difficult to find a good word said for him.

America has yet to hear Herr Urack in the role of opera conductor, especially as a leader of Richard Strauss' operas, which in Germany is considered his great forte.

Herr Urack's extraordinary variety of interests during his brief stay in this country was enough to take the interviewer's breath away. In the midst of his disquisition on classical music in America he casually remarked that he hoped to have a comic opera accepted for production in New York next winter.

Then he went on to tell of assisting Edison in his New Jersey workshop in developing a remarkable improvement on the phonograph which is soon to be put on the market. Outside of singing, there seems to be no field in the realms of music in which in his brief life Herr Urack has not played a part.

The layman's impression of a conductor's task is not an especially flattering one. To his mind the conductor is the man who fictitiously makes a living by standing up and beating the air with a stick while others perform on instruments which he has not mastered. In other days, when orchestras were less marvellous and complicated machines than they are today, this was more true than now, although a great conductor has always been an inspiring force and the one element capable of changing a commonplace performance into an inspired expression of a composer's thought.

But it is safe to say today that the conductor who can lead such a modern symphony orchestra of some 100 members performs, in the first place, a mental feat as delicate, as complicated as the hardest thinking done by the brain of a mathematical genius or an inventor. This concerns only the purely mechanical mental process, which must take place with lightning-like quickness and accuracy as the music flies by. It does not deal with the numberless distinctions between a time-beater and an orchestral interpreter of the first order, with the thousand other considerations which enter into the conducting of even a simple symphonic work.

To one who is inexperienced the mere task of score-reading is difficult enough. The above example shows a comparatively simple passage from a modern symphony. It is seen that instead of two staves, such as the pianist reads, or three staves which the organist or accompanist must master, there are 18 parts, each written independently of the other, and some half dozen different clefs or keys represented. The orchestra is in three principal divisions, the strings, the wood-wind instruments and the brass. To these are added the percussion instruments.

Reading a score, often of 25 lines and more, the conductor must be able to immediately transpose what he reads, and to pursue his work with any success, he must be able to form immediately an accurate conception of the effect that will be produced by the various instruments employed together. In order to know this, he must first have a knowledge that is instinctive with him of the tone qualities of all the instruments—which usually vary greatly in their upper and lower ranges, some of them, such as the clarinet, having four distinct tone-qualities in their compass—and he must have a close acquaintance with the technic of every instrument in his band.

The conductor must have practically memorized his score, if he wishes to be able to give it a successful performance. He must have mastered every measure, and have thought out for himself every note and every phrase, however long and complicated the composition is, so that during performance he can feel absolutely secure and free to spend all his energies in obtaining exactly the effects he wishes from his men. Every instrument in that orchestra must treat its phrases and its solo passages with the delicacy and the feeling of a solo player, and yet these phrases, or inner voices, as they may be, of which there are often four or even more sounding at the same time, must be so balanced that all will show, in different degrees of sonority, without obscuring the principal melody, or detracting from the clearness of the composition.

JUST LIKES BOSTON

It has been almost a regulation pose of famous foreign music masters to pet Boston; but there is nothing of pose in the liking which this young conductor of grand operas and symphonies and composer of everything from sonatas to ragtime expressed for this city and its musical folk. He has been here nearly four months now, and he just likes Boston and Bostonians, that's all.

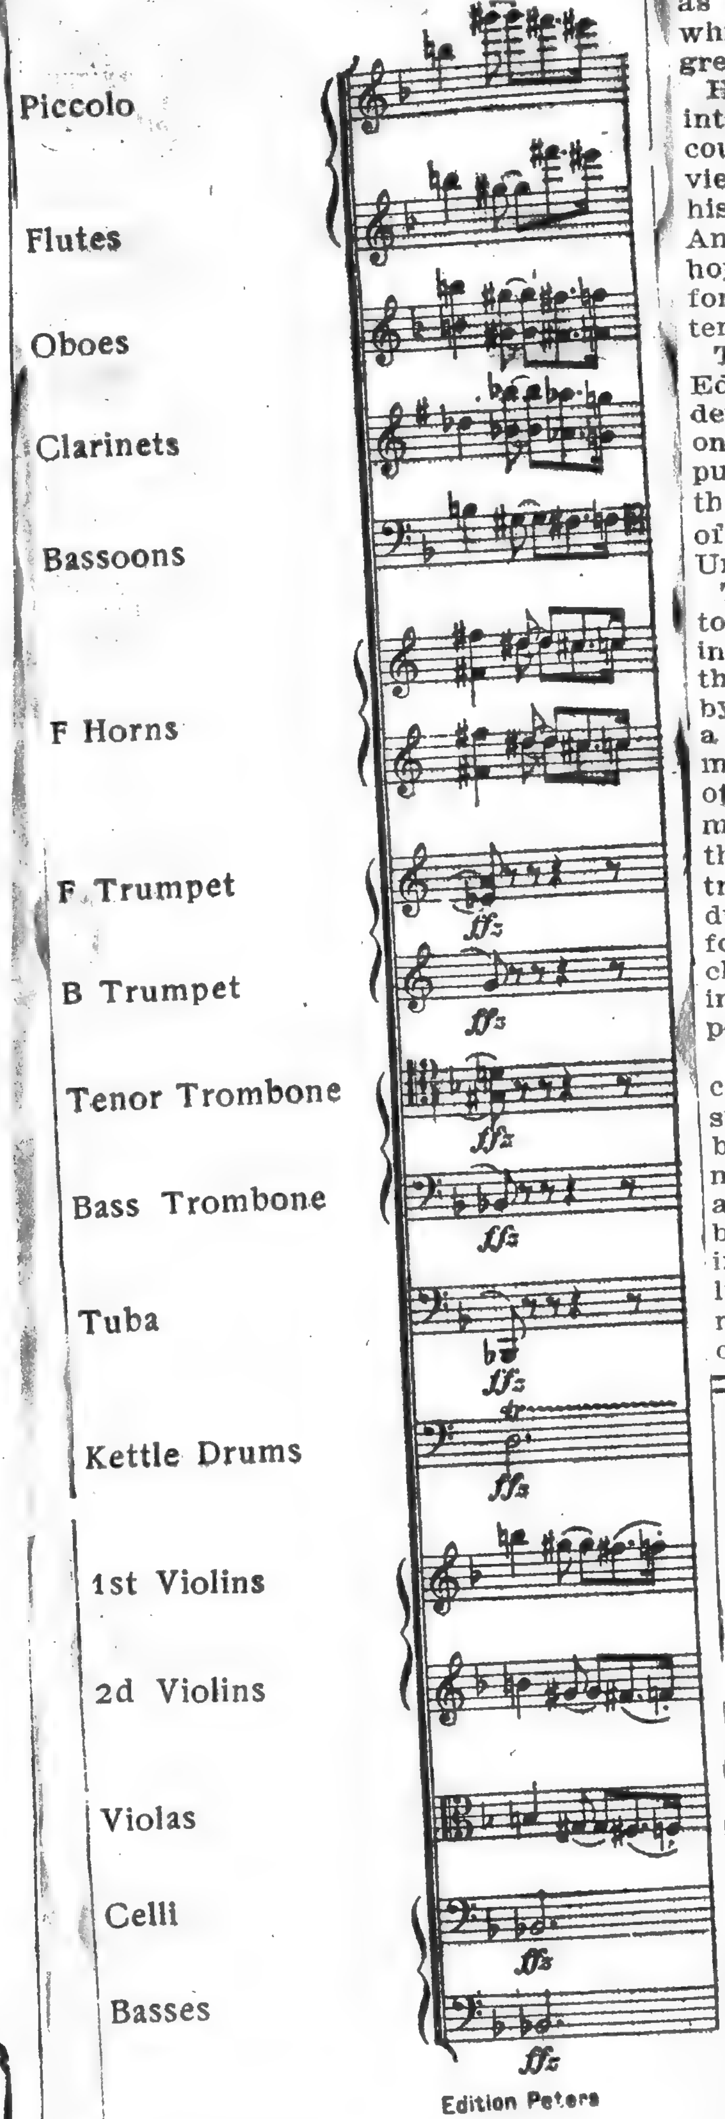
"I can feel it; but I can hardly tell it to you," Herr Urack said to a Post reporter.

Herr Urack is 28 years old, but hard-

Goes to the Movies

And this boy, who at 18 conducted the famous "chamber concerts" of the Royal Opera House Orchestra in Berlin, a musical distinction which before his day had never been granted to anyone under 30, does not seem to feel the slightest need of maintaining his dignity, or anything of that sort.

He confessed to delighting in the "movies," and that he goes at least once a week with his young American wife, daughter of Herr Hoppe, the old Metropolitan Opera House singer, whom he wed last May in Berlin.



Edition Peters

ONE BAR, OR MEASURE, FROM THE SCORE OF SINDING'S D-MINOR SYMPHONY, SHOWING THE 18 PARTS THE CONDUCTOR READS INSTANTLY.

BUFFALO COMMERCIAL,

JANUARY 29,

A RARE TREAT

Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra Was Enjoyed By Large Audience.

MR. URACK DID WELL

Assistant Conductor Took Dr. Muck's Place With Success—Heinrich Warnke Soloist.

The fourth in a series of six subscription concerts arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Elmwood Music Hall before a large and brilliant audience.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event always looked forward to by local music lovers with a great deal of delight. This famous organization has won a firm place for itself here and each season it makes a greater impression. Somewhat disappointed at first at the non-appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, who is confined to his bed in Boston, the large assemblage immediately recognized the talent of Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, and before the first part of the concert was finished he became a favorite.

Otto Urack, although young in years, has had a great deal of experience as a conductor. He is certain of his forces and he had the men under control at all times. He reads his score in a manner that commands respect and he possesses abundant temperament. Mr. Urack is a worthy assistant to Dr. Muck and he deserved the hearty applause given after each number.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is better this season than ever before. The work done by Dr. Muck seems to have improved the playing in every respect. The strings draw a round tone, full and pure, and the reed instruments play with such sweet, even tones that is a perfect delight. The brass instruments, even in the utmost forte passages, produce a tone that is never harsh or blurred and the effect on the whole is almost perfect. Such ensemble playing is rarely heard and in everything last evening there was a perfect unity that was indeed alluring.

The program opened with a splendid reading of Brahms's symphony in D Major. This was the first performance of this composition in Buffalo and to say that it was received heartily is hardly doing it justice. Especially delightful are the first and third movements of the symphony. The simple melodies and the unusual rhythmic antics make these parts stand out above the rest.

Webber's overtune to "Euryanthe" and "Espana," a rhapsody by Chabrier, were the other orchestra numbers and they were played magnificently.

Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist, was the soloist and he was heard to good advantage in Klughardt's concerto for violoncello with orchestra accompaniment. He is a master of his instrument. His style is of the elegancy which does not take from the fire of his temperament. Notwithstanding the technical difficulties of the concerto, he displayed a crystallic limpidity, grace and flexibility that was truly admirable. Mr. Warnke revealed a sonorous tone of much beauty and he succeeded in captivating his listeners and keeping them under a constant charm.

BUFFALO ENQUIRER,

JANUARY 29, 1913.

MUSICAL TREAT OF SEASON

Splendid Programme Given Last Evening at Elmwood Hall By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of the most brilliant musical events of the season in Buffalo was the annual concert at the Elmwood Music hall last night of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Of course it was regretted that Dr. Carl Muck, the director of the orchestra, was unable to appear because of his recent sickness. But his place was most capably filled by Otto Urack, the assistant director, who was accorded a hearty reception and who, indeed, created a most favorable impression as a thorough musician fully qualified to direct so excellent an

The hall was crowded with one of the most fashionable audiences of the season, and the applause throughout the splendidly arranged programme was generous and well merited.

It is rather unusual to open a programme with a symphony, but last night when the orchestra played for its initial number Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73, the effect was remarkably pleasing, and the audience undoubtedly was in a more favorable mood to thoroughly appreciate and enjoy this marvelous composition than it would have been had the symphony been preceded by a work less deep. By the time the wonderful strains from Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" began the audience was fully in the spirit of appreciation and from its applause it was evident that the atmosphere to enjoy this number had been created even during the symphony preceding.

Heinrich Warnke, violoncello soloist, merited the reception accorded his execution of the Klughardt concerto, Op. 59. It was an exquisite bit of melody from start to finish and in it the soloist revealed a splendid technique, playing also with excellent coloring and in perfect sympathy.

The programme was brought to a close with a splendid interpretation of the "Espana" rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier. This spirited number was rendered with a complete sense of the beauty of the melody and rhythm which it contains. While the programme was not of great length the audience left the hall entranced by the beauty of the numbers and the high quality of their rendition.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS

JANUARY 29, 1913.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT

Conductor Urack Shows Remarkable Ability—Warnke Clever 'Cellist.

The annual concert given in Buffalo by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Convention hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. It is significant that the organization that stands for the highest in American musical art is also the most popular in a concert series, a fact noted in every city where this great orchestra plays. Last night was no exception to the rule, the Bostonians attracting the most brilliant audience of the season the entire house being sold out.

It was a natural disappointment to those who remembered the former visit of Dr. Muck and his marvelous art as an interpreter, to know that illness prevented his attendance. The assistant conductor, Otto Urack, had the difficult task of filling Dr. Muck's place but his remarkable ability as a conductor was felt from the first and he succeeded completely in winning admiration of his audience.

The program opened with Brahms' D major symphony, the most immediately appealing of this composer's larger orchestral works, its beautiful, melodious themes and nobility of conception holding the hearers from first to last. As the final movement came to an end Mr. Urack was recalled again and again. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" followed a composition of indiscribably mysterious beauty.

Klughardt's 'cello concerto had the ablest of interpreters in Heinrich Warnke. The work itself, in one movement, has considerable variety, its tuneful themes being easily appreciated. Mr. Warnke is a 'cellist of fine powers, with warmth and variety of tone, certainty of technic and the style of a musician. The concert closed with a brilliant performance of that remarkable piece of orchestral virtuosity, Chabrier's Espana rhapsody, so daring and clever. It was received with a storm of applause.

BUFFALO EVENING TIMES,

JANUARY 29, 1913.

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA PLEASES LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

Splendid Organization Was Ably Conducted by Prof. Urack and a Large and Gracious Audience Assembled in Elmwood Music Hall to Enjoy a Fine Concert.

Owing to the illness of Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the new assistant conductor, Otto Urack, directed at the concert given at Elmwood Music Hall last evening, this being the fourth concert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. Many who were disappointed in the change of leadership were pleasantly surprised by Mr. Urack's masterly control of the orchestra. In the opening phrases of the first number the young leader showed a slight nervousness which quickly wore away. Intelligence, forcefulness, poetry and magnetism, qualities which belong to a successful leader, were not wanting.

The much criticized composer, Brahms, was represented on the program by his symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73, and it proved to be more "understandable" than Brahms' works usually are to the ordinary musician. The four movements were rich in beautiful melodies, but that which seemed to impress by its daintiness was the third movement with its minuet and presto so vividly contrasted. After the stupendous climax of this sympthony Mr. Urack was recalled again and again. The remaining numbers were Weber's "Overture to Ewryanthe," with its alluring largo; Klughardt's Concerta violoncello with orchestral accompaniment in which Heinrich Warnke was the soloist, and Chabrier's Espana, rhapsody for orchestra, truly Spanish in its fascinating rhythms and orchestration.

Mr. Warnke drew from his instrument a rich, lovely tone, colored by temperamental warmth and virility, which was admirably brought into relief by the exquisite background of the well-modulated accompaniment.

The fifth subscription concert of this series will takep lace Tuesday evening, February 25th, with Julia Culp, the celebrated Dutch lieder singer, and Edmond Clement, the distinguished French tenor, as soloists.

THE ARGUS: JANUARY 28, 1913.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVE CONCERT AT HALL

The Boston Symphony, the leading orchestral organization of America, paid Albany its first visit in two years last night at Harmanus Bleecker Hall. The fame of this orchestra is so established that the mere words "Boston Symphony" are like a trade mark (if one may apply a material term to things artistic) for the highest estate of musical expression. For 32 years this body of men has stood as a giant in its sphere, commanding the applause and praise of the musically erudite and the rapt appreciation of the mere laymen who, like Balzac, confess that next to the ability to produce a beautiful thing is the capacity to enjoy it.

All of musical Albany was present last night; much of its social element and hundreds of "true lovers" who crowded the galleries to the limit. The attendance on the floor was a bit disappointing, for while the body of the pit was occupied, there were vacant spots that should have been filled, considering the importance of the occasion.

Announcement of the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the famous director, tended to temper the anticipation of the audience at first, but his young substitute, Mr. Otto Urack, banished all feeling of regret by his splendid leadership. The first number was the Symphony No. 2 in B minor of Borodin. It was in four movements, allegro moderato, molto vivo, andante and allegro. Borodin was a Russian composer who expressed in this work the spirit of his people in a way that makes it a national composition. The first movement is ponderous, an epitome of ancient Russian knights in all their feudal grandeur. It is heroic in treatment, tender in shading and a theme of the sense of supremacy pervades it. The second movement is lighter in treatment and filled with lovely passages. In the third movement is introduced a strain of a horn, weaving its melody into the framework beautifully. The conclusion is a gorgeous massing of all the forms, with the various instruments bringing out the beauties of the Russian harmonies in a manner to thrill the listener. It was one of the most majestic and awe-inspiring compositions ever heard in Albany and the vast talents of the orchestra found fullest expression in its performance.

The Academic Festival Overture of Brahms (Opus 30) was the second number. This is a weaving of familiar melodies, such as "Gaudamus igitur" and "Was kommt fa von der Hoh." It is a new light on the genius of Brahms, who is usually for the musically elect who can follow him into the higher forms of tonal expression, and his work in a simpler mood is gracious and lovely in the extreme. The whole effect is restful and soothing, with the old tunes framed in the orchestral picture most exquisitely.

The concluding number was "Espana," a rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier. This is a gay, dashing picture of Spanish color, with arabesques of harmonies in waltz time. The rhapsody is based on two Spanish dances, the Jota, vigorous and fiery, and the Malaguena, languorous and sensual. The strings, the wood winds and the trumpets introduce the theme of the Jota; the horn takes it up, and finally the whole orchestra. The clink of castanets gives Castilian color to the whole and one is carried along in a whirlwind of musical expression. Chabrier composed this after a visit to Spain and a deep impression of its picturesquesness. All of this he reveals most vividly in his work.

The directing of Otto Urack was brilliant. He is but a boy, but his command of his men is masterly. At every moment he read his scores with an intelligence and symapthy which made one forget that the great Karl Muck was absent. At the end of each number he was given an ovation, which he accepted most modestly.

Norman Wilks, an English pianist, was the soloist. He played a concerto in A minor of Schumann, in three parts, allegro affettuoso, intermezzo; andantino grazioso and allegro vivace. Mr. Wilks approaches his piano with no affectations of the virtuoso, but with a sincerity which adds greatly to the effect of his playing. His fingers are short and hardly seem formed to produce the brilliant effects he gets. In expression, in technique and in a personal feeling that he transmits to the piano, Mr. Wilks impresses his hearers with the thought that here is a fine, if not a towering genius. The audience brought him back from the wings again and again after the conclusion of his number and the physical effect of his work was evident in his exhaustion as he bowed his thanks. The orchestra accompanied him in the concerto and added to its great beauty with a splendid interpretation.

It was a great concert from every point of view and one to gratify every yearning of the music lover for the best that art can give. All credit is due to Mr. Ben Franklin for his enterprise in bringing the Boston Symphony to Albany. To this local Gatti-Cazzaza and Loudon Charlton we makers, who will deliver a novelty in monologues.

---

[195]

THE GLOBE, TORONTO,

THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1913.

MUSIC and the DRAMA

CONDUCTED BY E. R. PARKHURST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, universally acknowledged by critics to be the finest orchestra in America, gave their second concert in Toronto last night at the Massey Hall to an audience of about two thousand people. The audience would have been larger had it not been announced that Dr. Muck, the conductor, could not appear owing to illness. The only previous appearance of the orchestra here was several years ago, when Herr Gericke was conductor. The organization is the same magnificent exemplification of perfection of technique and absolute beauty of tone, but it seems to have gained in virility on occasions where elemental strength and power are suggested. Their playing last night was a revelation of all the transcendental qualities of orchestral achievement. The wood wind was exquisite in its charm of tone, its delicacy of phrasing, its fineness of gradations of power. Nothing more entrancing could be imagined from practical experience than the voices of the flute, oboe and bassoon. And nothing more mellow, more round and velvety in tone has been heard from the first French horn of an orchestra, or more accurate in articulation. The strings were remarkable for brightness of tone, clear-cut execution, and sustained singing power. The great triumph of the orchestra as a marvellously trained organization was found in their accompaniment to the Mendelssohn violin concerto played by Mr. Anton Witek. There has not been even an approach to such an ensemble or harmony of adjustment between the solo instrument and the accompaniment since the day when Brodsky played the same concerto at the Grand Opera House, accompanied by the New York Symphony Orchestra. To the listener's delight every note of the violin solo was heard whether in cantabile or florid passage, the orchestra, although always distinct, subordinating its power to that of the soloist even when he played pianissimo. It was a marvel that this large orchestra of more than ninety players were able to so restrain their power in such sympathetic adjustment to the limitations in sonority of the solo violin. This treatment made conspicuous all the compelling allurement of the composition, and in the slow movement was a dream of lovely subdued tone tints that enforced the song of the violin, but never interfered with it. Mr. Witek was given an enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation at the close of the concerto, but he owed much of this triumph to the orchestra. He is a brilliant executant and plays with a uniformly clear, even and bright tone. The opening number for the orchestra was Beethoven's C minor symphony. Technically and in regard to tone the rendering was immaculate. The interpretation was conservative, in that the conductor apparently did not attempt to take liberties with the score indications left by the composer. To take an example, many conductors give the measures enunciating the main motive of the first movement more slowly than what follows, and also retard before the pauses, which are a feature. Mr. Witek directed the music consistently in the tempo of the general movement. And in the slow movement which was superlatively lovely in its successive unfolding phrases of contrasted tone from wood, wind, brass and strings there was no obvious attempt to infuse sentimentality. Richard Srauss' "Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a freakish composition full of strange and yet haunting effects, was splendidly performed. And the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," was a noble example of clear exposition of contrapuntal writing, and of grandeur in the climax. This is worth noting, because so many orchestras render this prelude in an obscure and confusing manner, the independent parts being enveloped in a mist of sound through which one cannot hear anything clearly. Mr. Otto Urack, who officiated as director in the absence of Dr. Muck, captured the critical verdict of the audience as a very gifted conductor. It may be assumed that he to a great extent followed the interpretation of the various compositions as laid down by Dr. Muck.

Buffalo

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CROWNS SEASON

Masterly Work of Members Enjoyed at Elmwood Music Hall.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the crowning event of Buffalo's musical season, therefore the concert given by this splendid organization at Elmwood Music hall last evening brought out a tremendous audience, which included large delegations from the surrounding towns.

It was a great disappointment to everyone that Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent conductor of the orchestra, was prevented by illness from being present. His place, however, was ably filled by Otto Urack, assistant conductor and a young musician of scholarly equipment. Mr. Urack was cordially received and created a deep impression by the authority and musicianly reading of a taxing programme, which opened with the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

In this masterly work all its lyrical quality was effectively brought out, and the four movements were marked by fine rhythmical sense, vivid color and an appreciation for its emotional content. The beauty of the first two followed by the exceeding grace of the third, led up to the imposing climax of the final movement, which aroused an enthusiasm rapturously expressed in such continued applause that the youthful conductor was obliged to return to the stage several times to bow acknowledgments, which, with a wave of the hand he indicated belonged also to the musicians he had directed.

Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was delightful, the ravishing beauty of the strings being a striking feature.

A memorable performance was the concerto for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment by Klughardt, Heinrich Warnke being the soloist, and who disclosed complete command of his instrument, from which he drew a luscious tone big and broad as well. It was great playing of great music, as its reception testified. The closing number, "Espana" Rhapsody by Chabrier, a work of entrancing melodization, left nothing to be desired in the way of musical enjoyment.

THE KNICKERBOCKER PRESS,
TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1913.

BOSTON MUSIC NIGHT ENDS ALL TOO SOON

Ninety Men in Ninety Minutes Finish Symphony Orchestra's Program.

EVERY NUMBER PRAISED

Audience Surging Out Half an Hour Ahead of Time Almost Paralyzes Motor Service.

It took the ninety men of the Boston symphony orchestra just ninety minutes to finish their concert program in Harmanus Bleecker hall last night. For the audience that almost filled the place this was all too short. To be sure, it was a typical assemblage of musical Albanians, with some of the same sort from Troy, Schenectady, Pittsfield and other points in the Capitol district, and therefore was not given to undue demonstration. And with the last note of the Espana rhapsody the concert was over. Men and women in the audience were tapping their feet on the floor and humming unconscously to themselves the fascinating air of the Spanish dance, when suddenly they realized that there were no more numbers on the program. There had been no encores. Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who had one number with the orchestra, aroused more enthusiasm than the men under the direction of Otto Urack the conductor. For Dr. Karl Muck was forced to remain in Boston on account of illness.

Carriages, motor cars, taxicabs and hacks had been ordered for 10:30 o'clock and when the crowd began to surge from the hall at 10 o'clock there was tall scurrying on the part of the transportation people. Garages were called up by telephone and scores of chauffeurs raced to the hall

Orchestra's Work Is Adequate.

The orchestra played with its usual spirit. Conductor Urack was adequate. The symphony, which opened the program, was the No. 2 work in B minor by Borodin. There was nothing lacking in the reading of the score. The Brahms Academic Festival overture was next, and was played with great beauty. The men seemed to enter into the spirit of the work and the conductor could not suppress a smile as they played the German student songs that are so cleverly worked into the overture, each one, perhaps, rousing memories of university days to some of the musicians.

Norman Wilks at the piano was received warmly. Though a stranger in Albany, he soon proved his worth in the familiar Schumann concerto in A minor. He showed great brilliancy in the intermezzo and allegro movement, but much of the success of his number is due to the very careful conducting of Mr. Urack, who kept the orchestra at all times in subjection, when it might easily have overshadowed the soloist with less intelligence back of the baton.

Metropolitan Singers Coming.

The Espana rhapsody was indeed a treat. It was this that made the audience really anxious for more. The interpretation of the dainty gypsy airs left nothing to be desired and the orchestra could stand alone on its record in this number. Of course, one could hear the woman on the right, her lorgnette aloft, declare with emphasis that the Boston Symphony could not compare with what she heard in Vienna, and someone on the left, loyal to the Albany Philharmonics, would make comparisons favorable to Frederick P. Denison's men, but the great majority gave the verdict that the concert of the Boston organization was about the last word in orchestration, here or abroad.

Residents of the Capitol district are fortunate in having these great musical attractions brought to their doors. Ben Franklin is entitled to credit for his persistence in providing them. And it is gratifying to note that the musical season will not close without another grand opera, for it is whispered that the Metropolitan organization, which a few weeks ago presented "La Boheme" with Geraldine Farrar, is coming again soon.

Likewise John McCormack, the Irish tenor, who charmed a large audience in Albany recently, will sing in Music hall, Troy, February 24, under the joint management of Mr. Franklin and E. M. Hart of Harmanus Bleecker hall.

THE TORONTO WORL.

JANUARY 30 1913

BEST ORCHESTRA EVER HEARD HERE

Boston Symphony Created a Wonderful Impression at Massey Hall Concert.

DE LA SALLE PROGRAM

Fine Entertainment Given by Pupils in Knights of Columbus Hall.

Boston did her best for us last night, but we did not quite do our best for Boston. There were a good many vacant seats in Massey Hall. We had just been to hear Harry Lauder the day before, and we cannot spend all oud money on music, especially as our musical standards are not thoroly adjusted. It was a pity, however, for Toronto's musical reputation that there was a single vacant seat. The greatest orchestra in the world, as musicians of international experience and reputation aver, played the favorite Beethoven symphony in C minor, with Richard Strauss' delightsome "Till Eulenspiegel"; Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Wagner's vorspiel to the "Meister Singers." And after the concert old musicians got together and hugged themselves and agreed they had never heard in London or Paris or Berlin such an orchestra. Still Toronto is cultivating a musical taste, and Harry Lauder was here the day before. There is a mistaken impression that "high-brow" people like such music as the Boston Orchestra performs. As a matter of fact, the high-brows are not half so keen on good music as the common herd. The first comment heard on leaving the hall last night was as follows: "That first number they played is called a symphony, and that symphony hal everything else skinned a mile." This is not the language of the high-brow, but the genuine musical appreciation of the masses. But it does not weaken our regret that there were empty seats.

It is absurd to say anything except in superlative praise of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is so complete, so perfect, so artistic, so generously conceived, so flawlessly realized that the only tribute one can pay is to form part of the audience. This marvelous balance of the various sections of the orchestra is noted by everyone. Sections that in other orchestras seem lacking attain their true proportions, with the effect of a noble roundness of tone and richness of contrast. Another feature was the great ease of movement in such a stupendous body of tone. The heaviest passages flowed along as gracefully as the lightest pizzicato on the strings. In the "Meister Singers" number the volume of tone from the double basses was a fine example of this ease of movement. In all the other questions' that go to make up perfection, precision, response, attack, release, light and shade, power, softness and sweetness, and if there be any virtue or any praise, the Boston Orchestra possesses it in abundance. It was announced that owing to Dr. Muck's illness, Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, would officiate, which he did with all the temperament and intensity of an Emil Paur. Anton Witek was the soloist of the occasion, and he played the Mendelssohn concerto. While somewhat formal in the allegro, his violin sang the andante melody with fine expression, and in the dainty tripping rondo then he was delightful. He had four recalls, and Mr. Urack had half a dozen at the close of the other numbers. A feature of the concert was the elaborate program with exhaustive notes on the pieces performed, and a delightful entr' acte by Richard Whiteing, "Sixty Years of the Music Halls." We regret to think that Boston will hear that there were vacant seats.

A. E. S. S.

THE BUFFALO EXPRESS,

THE BUFFALO EXP

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Otto Urack Wielded Baton for the Boston Organization.

DR. MUCK WAS ILL

Young Hungarian Assistant Took His Place With Success.

MIGHTY GOOD PLAYING

Beautiful Tone and Smoothness and Command of Varied Coloring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid Buffalo its annual visit yesterday and gave a concert last evening in Elmwood Music Hall, this being the fourth in Mrs. Smith's series of six concerts. While there was naturally a sense of disappointment in the fact that illness prevented Dr. Muck from appearing at the head of his organization, there was also friendly curiosity as to the work of his substitute, Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the orchestra. And if hearty applause and insistent recalls count for anything, it must be conceded that the young Hungarian made for himself a place in the favor of his audience, by his authority and sincerity, by his dignity and modest demeanor in a trying situation.

Successfully to conduct at comparatively short notice, such a body of players as those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many of them virtuosi on their chosen instruments, and intolerant of error or uncertainty on the part of him who holds the baton, is an achievement deserving no small measure of praise. To give so intelligent and musical a reading of the works on last night's programme as did Mr. Urack proves his possession of sterling musicianship and temperament.

It was a happy thought to open the musical feast with the solid meat of the symphony, placing the overture second as an entree, rather than first as an appetizer. With appetites fresh and unsated, the appreciation of the great Brahms work, which was the second symphony in D major, was unusually keen. Although it was the first performance in this city of the symphony, its bright and joyous nature, its charm of melody and its contrasting rhythms made it a very acceptable offering. The work possesses unmistakably certain Brahmsian characteristics, such as his liking for simple melodies of the folksong type and equally for the complex art forms evolved by creative genius from these simple elements. The marvelous development of the three-note figure of the first measure, the beautiful treatment of the two-principal themes of the first movement as they are carried through varying rhythms and changing tonalities, arouse the constant admiration of the musician, even at a first hearing of the work. "This chosen youth, over whose cradle the Graces and the Heroes seem to have kept watch," are the words in which Schumann wrote of Brahms way back in 1853, and they came to mind as one listened to the third movement, with its tenderly graceful theme, and to the closing Allegro, a splendid thing of life and grandeur.

[illegible] Euryanthe overture and Chabrier's Espana were the other orchestral numbers. Between them came a concerto for violoncello by August Klughardt, another novelty for Buffalo. The soloist was Heinrich Warnke, head of the 'cello force of the orchestra. The Klughardt composition was one of distinct charm, containing many lyrical passages of much beauty, and Mr. Warnke's performance of it proved very interesting and acceptable. He showed the possession of a firm and musical tone, capable of much color. At the beginning his intonation was a bit unsteady, but as the performance progressed, this defect vanished, and his warmth and mellowness of tone, as also his evident musical feeling, lent much interest to his interpretation. He was recalled several times at the close of his solo.

It goes without saying that the orchestra showed its customary virtues of beautiful tone, gratifying smoothness and sympathy, and command of varied coloring throughout the evening. The Weber overture was a trifle rough in places, but its beautiful largo received as lovely an utterance as could be wished.

The programme was brought to a close with a performance of Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, Espana. The melodies of this composition are souvenirs of a journey in Spain by Chabrier. They are original dance tunes, belonging mainly to the kind of dances known as the Jota and the Malaguena. The Jota is a dance of Northern Spain and the Malaguena is danced between rhymed verses, during the singing of which the dance stops. Espana was originally written for piano and later was scored for orchestra, with wonderful effect. It was played last night with tremendous dash and an abandon quite in the spirit of the composition.

M. M. H.

MAIL AND EMPIRE, TORONTO,

JANUARY 30, 1913.

GRAND ORCHESTRA SURPASSED HOPES

Famous Organization From Boston Was Heard in Superb Programme.

ONE STRIKING NOVELTY

Tone Poem by Strauss Given With Two Selections From the Classics.

In the minds of music lovers the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is connected with all that is best in its own particular realm of artistic achievement. Many fine orchestras have been heard here in recent years, but no matter how perfect they proved to be, people always reminded themselves that there was still a greater one which belonged to the Eastern city where "culture" was spelt with a capital "C." So high were the expectations of the audience keyed last night that it would scarcely have been extraordinary had the Boston Orchestra failed to satisfy them. This handicap, though flattering, was nevertheless a serious one, and yet the orchestra scored a tremendous triumph. One can only wonder if Dr. Karl Muck's presence could possibly have made it more complete. It is probable that the absence of the famous German conductor did not mean as much to Torontonians, whose attention was centred in the band, as it would have done to an audience in Boston, New York or an European city, so the excellent work done by Mr. Otto Urack may have been partially overlooked. Mr. Urack is very youthful in appearance, and his manner of conducting is intense and nervous, but he secures results that prove him to be a worthy pupil of the two great men, Muck and Richard Strauss, with whom he has studied.

It would be difficult to give even the slightest impression of the impeccable performance of the Boston Orchestra. The wonderful purity and the superb richness of its tone seems to lend itself with equal facility to the production of the most delicate pianissimos and to the sweeping, rocking strains of the giant climaxes. The programme had been well chosen. It contained two numbers which are widely known and always welcome, as well as one novelty of peculiar interest. Beethoven's C Minor Symphony (No. 5) opened the evening, and it was interpreted with a perfect feeling. The strangely turbulent moods of the opening movement were given with a fine passion, and [illegible] the beautiful song of the "Andante Con Moto," in which the melting quality of the tone secured was profoundly moving. The brilliance of the climax which the orchestra can build up was apparent in the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." The band produced a wonderfully thrilling crescendo in the massive harmonies which conclude the Wagnerian overture, and there was a striking splendor to the triumphant conclusion of the ever-popular selection.

The novelty of the evening was a tone poem by Richard Strauss bearing the rather astonishing name, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner." It is perhaps well that the wizard of the orchestra has left to the imagination of the hearers the exact nature of the escapades in which the vagabond of German folk-story is supposed to indulge. It would be a pity to tie anyone to a defined programme of the adventures, for the music is so stimulating to the mind that no one need be at a loss to picture the pranks. The pedants may condemn Strauss as an innovator who cares nothing for absolute music or the tradition of the orchestra, but at least they must admit that the composer has an astounding knowledge of the resources of a gathering of instruments. His effects are sometimes strange and new, but they invariably prove vivid. There was as much sense of mediaeval romance and humor in the tone poem presented last night as could be found in the coarse but picturesque tales of the period. It was indeed a merry story of a wild rogue that the orchestra unfolded, until the sinister picture painted by the horns told that the knave had gone to his deserts on the gallows and that he had "danced on air." Only an organization like the Boston Orchestra could have given life to the many and varied effects of this selection, with its odd phrases, its snatches of melody, its unexpected changes of emotion, and its flashes of musical humor. By those who were fortunate enough to hear the number "Till Eulenspiegel" will long be remembered as a jolly friend, so the man who created the music may well be described in spite of his critics as the "wizard of the orchestra."

The programme was completed by Mendelssohn's E. Minor Concerto, rendered by Mr. Anton Witek, a thorough master of the violin, who gave a fresh and graceful interpretation of the ever welcome solo. A background such as the orchestra provided must have served as an inspiration, and Mr. Witek aroused considerable enthusiasm. The concert was one of the most memorable of the present season. It is said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not paid us frequent visits because in the average Winter Toronto is so over-loaded with choral attractions. Many would gladly give all the choir festivals of any season in exchange for one such concert as that of last night.

CLEVELAND LEADER.

JANUARY 31, 1913.

OTTO VRACK LEADS WITH MASTER HAND

A PRECOCIOUS fire in a house across the street from the Grays' Armory that, like a musical prodigy blazed up in brilliant and spectacular fashion, brought all the fire apparatus in the down-town district clanging about the heels of those who were making their way to the armory last night for the Boston Symphony concert, tangled up all the automobiles going that way, made a late starting hour for the concert and then, still like a musical prodigy, died suddenly away into blackness and nothingness.

But the analogy of the youthful prodigy and the fire is not to be considered as extending to the young Mr. Otto Urack, who assumed the directing of the Bostonians because Dr. Karl Muck was home sick-a-bed. Just how much of the music that was made fitted the ideas of Dr. Muck, the aspirations of Mr. Urack or the convictions of the grizzled veterans among the rank and file of the seasoned bandmen would be difficult to determine.

Mr. Urack, pale of face, slight of build, his twenty-eight years lighting up his face with eagerness and enthusiasm despite his attempt to appear reserved and indifferent, came quickly from the wings almost unnoticed. Nor did it take his auditors long to discover that under his baton the Boston Orchestra was still that same gushing fountain of pure tone, still possessed that precision in attack, still could weave gauzelike fragment and thunder out sonorous tuttis and was still the same pliant, expressive instrument it has been these many years.

Tense and nervous in his beat, Mr. Urack used his baton at times as if he were drawing his melodies from a stringed instrument held under his chin. His score to him was but a reference sheet and he impressed what may be assumed to be his own readings upon the orchestra with a repression that belied his years and with a scholarliness and ability that did his years credit. The audience was unusually appreciative and demonstrated its discriminating wisdom in applauding him long and loudly.

No land like this with its blue lakes, its rolling grass covered plains and its orchards and vineyards could have produced the composer of the symphony that was offered. Sibelius is of a land of long and cold night, of sunless and cold days, of great stretches of white and barren places, of wilderness, and altogether of nature in her harshest and savagest moods. And all this is apparent in his E minor symphony, in the rolling drums that mutter in the opening, crash into thunder here and there through the movements and die down in sullen mutterings in the closing bars; in the themes that roll and surge and writhe or else sing mournfully; in the savage, fighting climaxes; in the strange and unique freaks of instrumentation that at times are almost ghastly; in the strings that wail in unison and in the abrupt breaking off and beginning of melodies.

There is a cold, heartless, relentless, even savage, primitive and pessimistic spirit throughout this work. That other hyperborean, Strindberg, might have spoken in such a way had he been a musician. Sibelius has many things to say in this big E minor work. Sometimes he says them abruptly and unequivocally; at other times he seems to lack the courage of his convictions. He is different, original, unique and a mighty and crude force.

There were also the Weber "Euyranthe" overture; the Brahms variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn for the displaying of the composer's and the orchestra's virtuosity; and the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude. They were all played well and directed with ability. But in the program notes that the wise Philip Hale, of Boston, wrote—was he not slipping in a sly piece of humor when he called attention to Herr Kalbeck's intimations that the Brahms variations and Flaubert's exotic "Temptations of St. Anthony" were simultaneous and telepathic products? Brahms and Flaubert! Here is a variant: Cold hard flint and warm perfumed flesh!

O'NEIL.

CLEVELAND PLAIN

BOSTON ORCHESTR GOOD UNDER URACK

Eastern Musical Organization Plays Well With Substitute Leader.

Tonsilitis Prevents Dr. Carl Muck From Directing Musicians.

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert at the Grays armory last evening. Consequently, it was one of the big musical nights of the season in Cleveland, many of the near-by cities contributing numbers to the audience that filled the big auditorium.

It is without doubt the leading orchestra of America and one of the best in the world. Most of the people present also anticipated seeing Dr. Carl Muck, the famous Berlin conductor, who had been announced as a special feature of the concert, but who was prevented from making the western tour with the organization on account of a severe attack of tonsilitis. The announcement was made in yesterday's papers and a small slip of pink paper in the program announced Dr. Muck's illness and the interesting fact that his place would be taken by Otto Urack.

Nobody hereabouts knew Otto Urack until 8:30 o'clock last evening; now the 2,000 attendants at last night's concert would declare a fine new conductor has "arrived." When he took his place at the desk last evening, before the ninety-eight players, all of whom have been specially picked for their fitness, there was a titter throughout the house, which finally melted into applause as the young man, looking not a year over 30, bowed his acknowledgments and quietly rapped his baton for the opening measures of the symphony which began the program. He is a slim little chap with a boyish face and hands almost transparent.

If there was the impression, however, that the orchestra, which prides itself on being made up of virtuosi, would lead the leader, whatever his years and experience, that impression quickly faded away, as inside of the first quarter of an hour he thoroughly established the fact that he is a splendid musician, knows the tricks of conducting without the mannerisms and monkeyshines so common to the youthful, and absolutely had his players in hand from the first scratch of the fiddles. Several times during the evening there seemed to be a tendency of the players to pay little attention to his beat, but he exerted an authority that visibly impressed his players and showed them that a man had the stick in hand who knew his business.

It was quite an event for Otto Urack and it was interesting to be present and observe his successful debut in this city, for he is assuredly to be reckoned with in the future. Musical history is full of similar circumstances. Mary Garden got her first chance to sing in opera when a prima donna was taken ill and examples might be multiplied. The thing is to be ready when the opportunity comes; but opportunities to direct the Boston Symphony orchestra are few, and with the successful termination of this tour Urack is "made" so far as his reputation as a conductor goes.

He did not just spring up overnight. Several celebrated musicians have had an eye on him for several years. He is a close friend of Richard Strauss, who has doubtless whispered a word in the right channels. He played the solo cello at Bayreuth last year, has been a cellist under Dr. Muck at the Berlin opera for several years, and last year, after conducting opera at Sofia, Belgrade and Bucharest, he had the opportunity to conduct at Barmen in Germany.

With performances of Wagnerian operas and the difficulties of Dr. Strauss, he soon attracted attention from all the connoisseurs of the country. Thus it is not strange that when Dr. Muck came to America, he made him his assistant at Boston, probably never thinking, however, that his illness would give his protege such a chance as has now come to him.

His first number was the Sibelius symphony, number one, a magnificent work not frequently played in America, but having much popularity abroad, where the Finnish composer is coming to be one of the most talked of musical writers of the day. Outside of Aino Ackte, the Finnish mezzo whose most famous role is Carmen, Finland has not contributed much to modern music. As might be expected, Sibelius throws into his work many national characteristics, as Liszt did with Hungarian themes, Dvorak with Bohemian, and Rachmaninoff with the Russian. In the first movement there is the melancholy of oppression, a mournful intensity that lingers throughout the work.

There is a more cheerful mood expressed in the second movement, but it is drowned by the heavy instruments, although the harp, a solo cello and other lighter ones continually attempt at least a melody of resignation. The third movement breaks into wildly humorous themes in which the drums play an important part. But even in this schero, there is an echo of the melancholy of the first themes, although treated in a manner that suggests the folk dances. The last

Mail + Empire
Jan 30, 1913

CLEVELAND PRESS, JAN. 31, 1913.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BY WILSON G. SMITH

The fifth concert of the symphony course was given by the Boston symphony orchestra at the armory Thursday night. The program being exclusively orchestral accounted for the absence of the audience-overflow that prevailed at the previous concerts. Regular patrons were on hand, and most seats were occupied.

In the absence of Muck, who was detained in Boston by an attack of tonsilitis, Otto Urack, assistant conductor, directed. As an understudy, Urack did creditable work with the baton. That he gave evidence of directorial talent was quite evident, but that he was at all times master of the situation cannot be allowed.

The only number that he directed with assurance suggesting an authoritative familiarity with the score was the Meistersinger prelude. In this he seemed to forget his responsibilities, and it was no question as to which led—he or the orchestra—as kept one guessing in the symphony.

One thing is certain, however, the Bostonians developed more symptoms of tonalitis than on former occasions and made sporadic incursions into the domain of real noise.

The Boston orchestra is such a splendidly drilled machine that I really believe it could have played the entire program without anything more than time indication from the conductor.

Urack at present lacks the impressive and commanding power of mature authority, and he does not possess to an eminent degree the dominating assertiveness of dictatorial genius. To direct the Bostonians—a living machine of perfect artistic lubrication—is really no more a test of directorial ability—saving the handling of the baton—than a pianola manipulated by the feet is a test of the player's digital technic.

The Sibelius symphony—heard for the first time—proved an interesting if not an epical work. It is conceived and constructed on large architectural lines. Many of its leading themes are broad and full of emotional suggestion. What it seems most to lack is logical continuity. Its big themes too often evaporate into mere constructive development.

Architecturally speaking, marble, cement and stucco are too promiscuously blent in its construction. As a representative work of Finland, it undoubtedly stands pre-eminent, but placed in the world's art cosmogony, represented by Brahms, Strauss and Tschaikowski among the moderns, it can not be considered a master work.

As to its presentation—as well as the other numbers of the program—the orchestra fully sustained its reputation as the leader among America's orchestras. Muck's absence did not make it Hamlet without the Dane.

CLEVELAND NEWS

GRIP DOESN'T STOP CONCERT; URACK LEADER

BY JAMES H. ROGERS

Consternation seized upon symphony concert patrons when they read their morning newspaper, Thursday.

JAMES H ROGERS

La grippe, the insidious, holds Dr. Muck, the peerless leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its clutch.

But the orchestra was here, with all its splendor of tone, and all its unfailing vitality and enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck's place at the conductor's desk was taken Thursday evening by his assistant, Otto Urack, a young man whose evident ability and unassuming demeanor won him many friends.

Chief Number Is Somber

The E minor symphony by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, was the chief feature of the program. It is a somber work, pitched in an emotional key so tense, that it might well be called tragic. There are few light or ingratiating moments. But the themes are eloquent and significant, and power, pathos and noble sincerity pervade the entire composition. The orchestration is masterly, and, what is more, individual, with free use of the harp, and highly original and effective employment of the woodwind.

Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn are, of course, skillfully made, and show the hand of the master of musical form. They are not particularly stimulating, although there are ingenious and cleverly elaborated episodes.

The other two program numbers, both familiar, were Weber's Euryanthe overture and Wagner's Meistersinger prelude. These were played with the Boston orchestra's accustomed virtually, the latter being taken at an unusually and rather surprisingly rapid tempo.

Harry Meyers, Youngstown, su[illegible] Sharon and Newcastle Street R[illegible]way Company in federal court Friday for $10,000 for loss of [illegible]rvices and companionship of [illegible] wife, Annie, injured in a [illegible]reck on the road, Novembe[illegible], 1910.

TORONTO

JANUARY 30.

GLORIOUS MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Great — superfine indeed—is Boston Symphony Orchestra wh delighted a very large audience could have been larger) at Mas Hall last night. But in the amber of the golden music there was a single fly, which will be noted and commented on later. In the meantime let it be remarked that the music enthusiasts of Toronto, a city which has heard all the great orchestras of the English-speaking world, including the London Symphony under the conductorship of Nikisch, were treated to new orchestral wonders by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chief amongst these new musical sensations and delights was first, the perfect solidity and balance of the orchestra, the ensemble of tone both in the various choirs and in them all combined sounding, so to speak, with the absolute consistency of one mighty instrument, which could thunder or storm nobly, or whisper with the faintest pianissimo zephyrlike and sweetly. Even the tympani "tones" had aesthetic qualities of sensation in them, powers of musical expression, they were not used merely to mark rhythm or to increase the dynamics but added their own special color to the harmonies and expressional nuances. Next, in the perfections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came the astounding perfections in the quality of the dynamic gradations. Usually the hearer can observe when one section begins and another takes up the carrying of a crescendo to its acme and then back again to its faintest diminuendo. But the Boston Symphony choirs showed no such "cracks" in the gradations—the tone seeming to be carried on by each section, as each took it up, with the rise and fall of intervals moving closer than chromatics. Again, the precision and unanimity of the Boston Symphony were flawless and yet human in workmanlike accuracy—the attack and the cut off in a finale did not have even a "hair of tone" hanging to them. Finally, whatever [illegible] in the quality [illegible]

With the Masters.

All these virtues were observed in the playing of Beethoven's C. Minor Symphony, in Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and in the prelude to "The Meister Singers." The band took the tempo of the symphony motive in the first movement at a rather unusual tempo—rather rapid, but they gave the movement expression of noble moral force, and in the andante con moto transported the audience to Elysian fields with the most moving ethereal melody and expressive nuances in emotion. What Richard Strauss can do, beyond all others, in absolute "instrumentation," the orchestra demonstration with a virtuosity which transmitted mere musical noise from comedy into the sphere of extraordinarly novel and masculine description or dramatic music. The Wagner "Prelude" was accomplished with a beauty and dignity which made its themes take on a unity in expression that gave the whole the significance of a work of art

Fly in Amber.

The soloist was Mr. Anton Witek. He must have been reading Mrs. Moodie's "Roughing It in the Bush," published in 1852, and have thought that Toronto was still in "the Bush." He played the Mendelssohn E. Minor Concert carelessly, especially the first movement. As he played he smiled to someone in the audience. (This is amateurish.) He drew from his violin a dry, hard tone, and he was flat both in intonation and in temperament. Following, as he did, the great Ysaye, Mr. Witek should have known that Toronto's music-lovers are not tyros in appreciation and that he should have played up to standard. His solo playing was the only fly in the amber of the otherwise golden music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As for Mr. Wrack, who took Dr. Karl Muck's place in conducting, there is nothing but praise. His readings of the scores were sane and masterly, and he conducted with the virility of Emil Paur and the abandon of Arthur Nikisch.

L.

MME. BUTT RETURNING.

Mme. Butt is heralded by her managers as the "greatest living contralto," and that the claim is not unjustified is shown by the description applied to her in the newspaper reports of her Canadian and American concerts as "the finest contralto of the century," "one of the most unusual singing voices of the present generation," "not only the greatest contralto, but the greatest singer of her type in the world." Mr. Rumford has been no less successful in winning the approbation of the critics, as well as the public, and with such an attractive programme as has been arranged in conjunction with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for their second appearance at Massey Hall on February 6th, there should be a great treat in store for those who attend.

TELEGRAM

JANUARY 30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A prince among orchestras visite Massey Hall last evening and gave one of the best programmes heard thi season.

What bigger names in the realms of music could one find than Beethoven, Strauss, Mendelssohn and Wagner? However, to even the person who only goes occasionally to hear such voluminous compositions as Beethoven's 5th Symphony, every moment was filled with delight, first with a sonorcus passage from the violins, then a solo by the oboe, an attack in the brass and by the numerous beautiful effects which are continually being secured from such a wonderful organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The outstanding feature of the orchestra is the absolute artistic finish it gives to every detail and each member being a soloist makes this possible. As the different ideas come crowding one upon another in the Strauss composition, which bears such a long name, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Every trick and joke Strauss has tried to depict in his music and many times he does with extraordinary clearness. All the resources of the orchestra are used and a playful tune which lasted somewhat longer than any of the descriptive intricacies served as a landing place for one to catch his breath.

GRAND ORCHESTRA SURPASSED HOPES

Famous Organization From Boston Was Heard in Superb Programme.

ONE STRIKING NOVELTY

Tone Poem by Strauss Given With Two Selections From the Classics.

In the minds of music lovers the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is connected with all that is best in its own particular realm of artistic achievement. Many fine orchestras have been heard here in recent years, but no matter how perfect they proved to be, people always reminded themselves that there was still a greater one which belonged to the Eastern city where "culture" was spelt with a capital "C." So high were the expectations of the audience keyed last night that it would scarcely have been extraordinary had the Boston Orchestra failed to satisfy them. This handicap, though flattering, was nevertheless a serious one, and yet the orchestra scored a tremendous triumph. One can only wonder if Dr. Karl Muck's presence could possibly have made it more complete. It is probable that the absence of the famous German conductor did not mean as much to Torontonians, whose attention was centred in the band, as it would have done to an audience in Boston, New York or an European city, so the excellent work done by Mr. Otto Urack may have been partially overlooked. Mr. Urack is very youthful in appearance, and his manner of conducting is intense and nervous, but he secures results that prove him to be a worthy pupil of the two great men, Muck and Richard Strauss, with whom he has studied.

It would be difficult to give even the slightest impression of the impeccable performance of the Boston Orchestra. The wonderful purity and the superb richness of its tone seems to lend itself with equal facility to the production of the most delicate pianissimos and to the sweeping, rocking strains of the giant climaxes. The programme had been well chosen. It contained two numbers which are widely known and always welcome, as well as one novelty of peculiar interest. Beethoven's C Minor Symphony (No. 5) opened the evening, and it was interpreted with a perfect feeling. The strangely turbulent moods of the opening movement were given with a fine passion, and then followed the beautiful song of the "Andante Con Moto," in which the melting quality of the tone secured was profoundly moving. The brilliance of the climax which the orchestra can build up was apparent in the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." The band produced a wonderfully thrilling crescendo in the massive harmonies which conclude the Wagnerian overture, and there was a striking splendor to the triumphant conclusion of the ever-popular selection.

The novelty of the evening was a tone poem by Richard Strauss bearing the rather astonishing name, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner." It is perhaps well that the wizard of the orchestra has left to the imagination of the hearers the exact nature of the escapades in which the vagabond of German folk-story is supposed to indulge. It would be a pity to tie anyone to a defined programme of the adventures, for the music is so stimulating to the mind that no one need be at a loss to picture the pranks. The pedants may condemn Strauss as an innovator who cares nothing for absolute music or the tradition of the orchestra, but at least they must admit that the composer has an astounding knowledge of the resources of a gathering of instruments. His effects are sometimes strange and new, but they invariably prove vivid. There was as much sense of mediaeval romance and humor in the tone poem presented last night as could be found in the coarse but picturesque tales of the period. It was indeed a merry story of a wild rogue that the orchestra unfolded, until the sinister picture painted by the horns told that the knave had gone to his deserts on the gallows and that he had "danced on air." Only an organization like the Boston Orchestra could have given life to the many and varied effects of this selection, with its odd phrases, its snatches of melody, its unexpected changes of emotion, and its flashes of musical humor. By those who were fortunate enough to hear the number "Till Eulenspiegel" will long be remembered as a jolly friend, so the

It was a severe disappointment to many that Dr. Karl Muck was unable to conduct. Owing to his illness the assistant conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Otto Urack, was on the conductor's stand and was greeted with applause and enthusiasm, which was a great honor to him. Though of youthful appearance, he handled the orchestra with the authority of a master. Once or probably twice, one heard the bass section pulling away from the violins and woodwind, but throughout this exceptionally difficult programme the work of Mr. Urack was above reproach. His active temperament, which was always used with excellent discrimination, seemed to be a never-failing inspiration to the men under his baton. He evinced perfect familiarity with all the scores, which is a prime requisite to hold the attention of both orchestra and audience.

The much beloved and also much played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor was rendered with the traditional interpretation by the soloist of the evening, Mr. Anton Witek. The concluding number was Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and in it the orchestra again held the audience spellbound with its wonderful and glorious tone effects and the piling of climaxes one above another until the final crash.

Toronto
The Globe
Jan. 30, 1913

MUSIC and the DRAMA

CONDUCTED BY E. R. PARKHURST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, universally acknowledged by critics to be the finest orchestra in America, gave their second concert in Toronto last night at the Massey Hall to an audience of about two thousand people. The audience would have been larger had it not been announced that Dr. Muck, the conductor, could not appear owing to illness. The only previous appearance of the orchestra here was several years ago, when Herr Gericke was conductor. The organization is the same magnificent exemplification of perfection of technique and absolute beauty of tone, but it seems to have gained in virility on occasions where elemental strength and power are suggested. Their playing last night was a revelation of all the transcendental qualities of orchestral achievement. The wood wind was exquisite in its charm of tone, its delicacy of phrasing, its fineness of gradations of power. Nothing more entrancing could be imagined from practical experience than the voices of the flute, oboe and bassoon. And nothing more mellow, more round and velvety in tone has been heard from the first French horn of an orchestra, or more accurate in articulation. The strings were remarkable for brightness of tone, clear-cut execution, and sustained singing power. The great triumph of the orchestra as a marvellously trained organization was found in their accompaniment to the Mendelssohn violin concerto played by Mr. Anton Witek. There has not been even an approach to such an ensemble or harmony of adjustment between the solo instrument and the acompaniment since the day when Brodsky played the same concerto at the Grand Opera House, accompanied by the New York Symphony Orchestra. To the listener's delight every note of the violin solo was heard whether in cantabile or florid passage, the orchestra, although always distinct, subordinating its power to that of the soloist even when he played pianissimo. It was a marvel that this large orchestra of more than ninety players were able to so restrain their power in such sympathetic adjustment to the limitations in sonority of the solo violin. This treatment made conspicuous all the compelling allurement of the composition, and in the slow movement was a dream of lovely subdued tone tints that enforced the song of the violin, but never interfered with it. Mr. Witek was given an enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation at the close of the concerto, but he owed much of this triumph to the orchestra. He is a brilliant executant and plays with a uniformly clear, even and bright tone. The opening number for the orchestra was Beethoven's C minor symphony. Technically and in regard to tone the rendering was immaculate. The interpretation was conservative, in that the conductor apparently did not attempt to take liberties with the score indications left by the composer. To take an example, many conductors give the measures enunciating the main motive of the first movement more slowly than what follows, and also retard before the pauses, which are a feature. Mr. Witek directed the music consistently in the tempo of the general movement. And in the slow movement which was superlatively lovely in its successive unfolding phrases of contrasted tone from wood, wind, brass and strings there was no obvious attempt to infuse sentimentality. Richard Srauss' "Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a freakish composition full of strange and yet haunting effects, was splendidly performed. And the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," was a noble example of clear exposition of contrapuntal writing, and of grandeur in the climax. This is worth noting, because so many orchestras render this prelude in an obscure and confusing manner, the independent parts being enveloped in a mist of sound through which one cannot hear anything clearly. Mr. Otto Urack, who officiated as director in the absence of Dr. Muck, captured the critical verdict of the audience as a very gifted conductor. It may be assumed that he to a great extent followed the interpretation of the various compositions as laid down by Dr. Muck.

Toronto
Daily Star
Jan. 30, 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORED A TRIUMPH

Delighted Large Massey Hall Audience, and Proved Title to Name, "Symphony."

A NICE MUSICAL TREAT

If any orchestra has the right to the name "symphony," it is the Boston Symphony Orchestra that played before a greatly-impressed audience in Massey Hall last night.

Its smoothness and unity have not been equalled in Toronto, except perhaps by the London Symphony that visited that city last season. It is not an orchestra, but one vast instrument. Dr. Karl Muck was absent from the conductor's stand through illness, and Herr Otto Urack ably took his place. But no conductor could be credited with all the results achieved last night. Every unit of the orchestra is an artist. This was apparent in the Beethoven Symphony in C Minor, a melancholy, fateful work, keyed up to an intense emotionalism throughout, and makes particular demands on the strings. These answered with a power of expression that was astonishing.

The orchestra is an unusually large one, particularly in the strings, and is consequently unwieldy; but the smoothness and variation of tone were impeccable. This Beethoven number, quite well known to Toronto audiences, was the artistic triumph of the evening.

Strauss, for the first time, received a proper introduction to Toronto. Orchestras of lesser size and scope could never dare to play "Tyll Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," one of Richard Strauss' descriptive pieces. It is humorous music, telling of the adventures of a merry scamp of a tinker. Last night's audience sat up in astonishment before the orchestra had played a half-dozen bars. Consecutive fifths and downwright discords are not despised by Strauss. One minute it seems as if some one had stepped on a dog's tail, and then comes sweet melody. One minute it would seem as if Orpheus had strayed into a tinsmith's, and started the cans and pans a-rolling him [illegible] then comes a passage of [illegible] andeur. At the close of [illegible] er, played flawlessly and [illegible] fidence, the audience applauded until the orchestra rose in a body and bowed.

The Boston Orchestra is famous for the number of artists in its wood and wind instrument departments. This feature, combined with the large number of strings, made Wagner's prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg" in keeping with the master's intention. The Boston horns and woods are competent to interpret any Wagner. The crescendos in this "Mastersingers" number, which so often bulge into chaos, were as clear-cut as the simplest melody.

The Mendelssohn concerto in E. Minor, with Herr Anton Witek playing solo violin, was equally well rendered. This work does not permit of any display of power to the soloist, but Herr Witek distinguished himself as a master of the instrument and its technique.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date ....

The fourth and last but one of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 21, and it will be the occasion of the first appearance here of Max Pauer, the eminent German pianist, who had such a really sensational success at his debut in Manhattan with the Philharmonic Orchestra, and a few days later in his recital in that borough. Pauer is in this country for the first time, and from all accounts he is one of the very few great pianists in the world. He will play the seldom heard Mendelssohn concerto for piano and orchestra.

Esta 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York.

Date ....

Dr. Muck is rapidly recovering from the illness which prevented his going with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its annual Western trip the past week. He was a sick man when he was in New York in January and after his return to Boston his condition caused a great deal of anxiety among his friends. He has had, however, a complete rest in the country for the past two weeks and is quite himself again.

At one of the next pair of concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on February 20 and 22, he will introduce to New York a Symphony by Lenvai which is shortly to have its first performance in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

From News

Address

Date PROVIDENCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Although Dr. Muck was not able to go with the Boston Symphony orchestra on its western trip this week, there seems to be at present no doubt that he will be able to conduct the symphony concert in Providence next Tuesday evening. Dr. Muck for the past week has been in the country getting not only a change of air, but a thorough rest. He has improved rapidly and it is hoped that he will resume his work next Monday.

Norman Wilks, the eminent English pianist, who is to appear with the orchestra is sure to make a profound impression with his performance of the Schumann concerto.

HERALD,

FEBRUARY 8,

DR. MUCK AGAIN WIELDS BATON

Conductor Welcomed Back at 14th Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra.

The 14th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck resumed his place as conductor. There was no soloist. The program was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3............Bach
Symphony in G major, No. 3......Haydn
Three German Dances..............Mozart
Symphony in D major, No. 2....Beethoven

It was a pleasure to see Dr. Muck again at his accustomed place, and a large audience welcomed him heartily.

The program of classical pieces was performed by the orchestra, brilliantly and with finesse. Bach's suite was vitalized and faultless execution was not the only feature of its performance, for Dr. Muck, a sensitive interpreter and a master of phrasing, emphasized with rare skill the contrasting character of the movements, while beautiful effects continuously succeeded each other. In the overture, Mr. Witek displayed his art to advantage in the passages allotted to the solo violin, and the famous air for strings alone was played with superlative beauty of tone.

There is much charm and quaintness attached to the three German dances by Mozart. The third is perhaps the most picturesque with its posthorns and bells in imitation of a sleigh-ride.

An admirable performance of Beethoven's symphony completed the program.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Lendvai, symphony in D major, (first time in America); Wagner, "A Faust Overture," Mendelssohn, concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor; Dvorak, overture "Carnaval." Max Pauer will be the soloist and will then make his first appearance in Boston.

From EVG. SUN

Address: New York

Date FEB 3

KARL MUCK is rapidly recovering from the illness which prevented his going with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its annual Western trip last week. He was a sick man when he was in New York in January, but after a complete rest in the country the conductor is reported quite himself again.

W. B. CHASE.

1884

From TIMES

Address: New York

Date ....

Dr. Muck is rapidly recovering from the illness which prevented his going with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its annual Western trip the last week. He was a sick man when he was in New York in January, and after his return to Boston his condition caused a great deal of anxiety among his friends. He has had, however, a complete rest in the country for the last two weeks and is quite himself again. At one of the next pair of concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall, on Feb. 20 and 22, he will introduce to New York a symphony by Lenval, which is shortly to have its first performance in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

Estab

[149]

JOURNAL- FEBRUARY 8,

SYMPHONY GIVES CLASSIC PROGRAM

Dr. Muck's Return Added Zest to Matinee Production by Orchestra.

BRILLIANT CONCERT

Debut of Max Pauer and New Symphony by Lendvai Next Week's Features

Dr. Muck is himself again, and the fourteenth Symphony matinee went off yesterday with all the brilliancy the orchestra was displaying before the conductor took sick. Three weeks out in the country have done Dr. Muck a world of good; and there were many marks in the performance yesterday to indicate that the orchestra was as glad to see him back as the audience. His presence tones the orchestra up.

This week there is a decided change—almost a novelty—in the shape of an all-classic program comprising the Bach suite in D major, the Haydn symphony in D major, Mozart's "Three German Dances" and the second Beethoven symphony, which Berlioz described as so "noble, energetic, proud."

Dr. Muck himself had to smile over the post-horn and sleighbells introduced in the third of the Mozart dances, called "The Sleigh Ride." An ingenuous effect, but thoroughly delightful! Probably also Dr. Muck had his little joke—reminding the audience of the sleighing that used to be enjoyed hereabout.

Dr. Muck will present on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening one of the most important novelties of the season, a symphony by the Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai. The work is one of large dimensions, employing not only the utmost means of the modern orchestra, but the organ as well. Lendvai is a Hungarian who now lives in Berlin, and is in his early thirties. He has studied in Italy with Puccini and in Paris, as well as in Berlin. With the performance of this particular symphony at one of the big festivals in Germany last spring. Lendvai became at once a notable figure, and Dr. Muck selected this work as one of his principal novelties of the season. Dr. Muck characterizes it as being a work of greater power than the Bischoff symphony.

Another very interesting feature of the concerts of the coming week will be the first appearance in Boston of Max Pauer, the German pianist, whose elegance of style is celebrated abroad. He will play Mendelssohn's concerto in C minor, a work that especially suits his style.

Other numbers on the program will be "A Faust Overture," by Wagner, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

BOSTON GLOBE- FEBRUARY 8,

DR MUCK CONDUCTS CLASSIC PROGRAM

Plays Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Haydn Symphony and German Dances by Mozart Give Pleasure.

Dr Muck played a program yesterday afternoon from the classicists, men who composed in the fear of God and harmonic laws. Is this to prepare one against the new symphony by Lentral. who is a Hungarian, and, it is said, takes both music and life seriously?

The numbers yesterday were these: J. S. Bach, suite in D major, No. 3; Haydn, symphony in G major (B and H No. 13); Mozart, Three German Dances (K. 605); Beethoven, second symphony.

What a pleasure to hear this music of quaint and formal elegance played with such discrimination and mastery of style, such clarity in figuration and beauty of tone as in the suite of Bach. Did the overture suggest rhythmic formulas or the progression of six chords to Handel, as in his overture to "The Messiah" that followed it by a score of years? The Air familiar to all violinists still retains its noble purity of line, its dignity of harmonic background. The profile is that of a piece of classic marble and how perfect the proportion and the symmetry of it yesterday. Classic in form it may be, but who will

A hundred years hence, when some new scale may recognize a smaller interval than a semitone, will symphonies of today—for example, the second of Sibelius—be revived as ministers of light and healing unto the ear? What simplicity of enjoyment in these various humors of Haydn and what clarity in his expression of them. The slow movement sings a melody of an exquisite and tranquil beauty, revealed yesterday in all its loveliness by the incomparable phrasing of Mr Longy, and later in the repetitions by the strings; nor does each return repeat merely, but adds new embellishing devices and never to excess

What fantastic play of fancy in the minuet, particularly the trio with its droll drone bass. One of the most informing and illuminating attributes of Dr Muck's genius as a conductor is his insight into the spiritual significance of subtle accent. With him these darting flashes of emphasis on certain tones—some of them irregular—are more than obedience to printer's ink in the score; flashes of wit they are; irrepressible youth disporting itself in the formal figures of the dance behind the sober backs of its elders. And the finale—the tempestuous, bustling fury of it. One can imagine Haydn leading his band at the Esterhazy's through it, wigs and pigtails bobbing with the vigorous bowing, and every fellow fiddling for the dear life of him.

The third of Mozart's dances is the one in imitation of a sleigh ride and small bells were called into play, to the delight of the audience. Beethoven's second symphony contains little to foretell the maturity of thought in the third, but the slow movement is of uncommon beauty.

The concert next week promises to be one of great interest. Its program will include these pieces: Lentvai, symphony in D major (first time in America); Wagner, "Faust" overture; Mendelssohn, concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor; Max Pauer, soloist (first appearance in Boston); Dvorak, overture, "Carnival."

ADVERTISER. FEBRUARY 8.

DR. MUCK AGAIN IS AT HIS POST

BIG WELCOME FROM SYMPHONY AUDITORS

Current Programme Is One of "Classical" Numbers and a Rest for Jaded Nerves.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bach. Suite in D major.
Haydn. Symphony in G major.
Mozart. Three German Dances.
Beethoven. Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Yesterday was "Classical Day" in Boston's music. Bach, Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart at the Symphony concert, and Mozart at the opera. We are glad to note that the public appreciate the pure old school only the more keenly, after a long course of modern strivings.

"Happy are those nations which have no history," said the wise old Frenchman. Happy are the concerts which need no analysis or defence, says the sane musician. There is very little to write about the above programme, but there was very much to enjoy. It was the more enjoyable because Dr. Muck did not try to inflate the toad into an ox; he did not yield to the demon of "individualization," but transmitted the composer's ideas to the auditor without endeavoring to invest them with modern passion or intensity.

Dr. Muck was welcomed back from his sick-bed with very spontaneous enthusiasm. Of course there was something of selfishness in the ovation, for our symphonic music languishes while he is ill. The concert might well have begun with the congregation singing: "We need thee every hour," altering the last words to "Friday" and "Saturday."

The entire programme was a rest to jaded nerves, but especially we found serenity in the Bach suite. There is something so calm in the melodies of parts of this suite, and such a lack of straining in the counterpoint, that even the gigue is soothing.

Perhaps something of this tranquility was due to the fact that Dr. Muck read the work rather more slowly than we have been accustomed to hear it. This caused a little lack of contrast between the gavottes and the bourree of the suite. The overture, however, was very clear and well-balanced, and its fugal work was clear as crystal.

The Haydn symphony was one which is very seldom heard and was especially interesting on that account. The first movement was more developed and dramatic than one expects from this Wordsworth of music, and at times seemed to anticipate Beethoven. The Largo was somewhat familiar, however, because its chief theme has been turned into a hymn and is sung in many churches. The thoroughly rustic musette of the trio of the minuet was made the most of and the finale was very brisk and fiery. The old work was received with hearty applause.

The three dances by Mozart seemed to suggest the "Pops" rather than the regular symphony concerts, but they were most enjoyable in their simplicity. The final one with its sleigh-bells came very pat as signalling the beginning of our long-deferred winter. These little bits of musical confectionery were evidently very welcome to the audience, and in fact the entire programme was heartily enjoyed, although there was some exodus before the finale of the Beethoven symphony.

Beethoven's second symphony is not among the greatest of the nine. But it has its glories nevertheless, and it is a great advance over the first symphony, which came two years earlier. The larghetto is the best movement. To develop figures in such a slow tempo is in itself a severe test of musicianship. This second movement was taken at a commendable speed, not too slow or dragging. We imagine that Beethoven chose 3/8 rather than 3/4, for the rhythm mark, in order to suggest an avoidance of extreme slowness.

The scherzo of this work is the first appearance of this particular form, to replace the minuet. The innovation was made conservatively enough, for the minuet of the first or of the fourth symphony is much more free than this scherzo. The wood-wind played charmingly in the trio of this movement, where Beethoven has chosen an old-fashioned style, as if to emphasize the freedom of the body of the scherzo. The whole of this movement was taken much quicker than is customary.

The old symphony may not be very thrilling to the veterans in music who have become inured to the hardships of modern works of three times its length, but we must remember that there are many newcomers in these concerts, many who need to hear and to study the classic works. It is perhaps the chief evil of programme-making in America, at present, that young concertgoers are plunged at once into the modern cauldron, hearing the most audacious progressions, unresolved dissonances, and extremely heavy orchestration, at the very beginning of their concert life.

If only these could hear more concerts such as this one of yesterday it would give them a surer foundation and they would learn comparison of schools in a healthy manner.

Dr. Muck certainly does a good educational work in occasionally giving to them such a conservative programme.

DETROIT TIMES!

FEBRUARY 8,

Boston Orchestra Delights Big Audience

The Boston Symphony orchestra has a name with which to conjure every music lover from the highways and byways, and so, on the occasion of the annual visit of the famous organization, Saturday evening, the Light Guard armory was filled.

Announcement had been made that Dr. Kahl Muck, who was due to receive a great welcome, for he is a favorite orchestral conductor in Detroit, was unable to appear on account of illness, and that his place on the director's stand would be taken by his assistant, Otto Urack, but, even the regretted absence of Dr. Muck had no material effect upon the attendance. After all, the occasional absence of a great conductor from a great organization, cannot seriously interfere with the artistic ensemble of a well-trained body of musicians like the Boston orchestra.

It was not the fault of the usually prompt Detroit Orchestral association concertgoers that half of the audience arrived a half hour late, but. the perverseness of street car traffic, which was held up for 40 minutes, or so, just at the hour when everybody was anxious to be in his seat in the armory. The hour of beginning was delayed as long as possible by the management, but with all the untoward circumstances the first number, Sibelius' Symphony in E minor, was almost completed before ticket holders were all in the armory. The manner in which the steam pipes "acted up," during the evening, rumbling, hissing and spitting while the orchestra played, completed the general scheme of annoyance.

Mr. Urack, who conducted, was cordially received, and recalled several times. He is a young man who does not appear to be within ten years of his acknowledged 29. He is very slight and looks like a young school boy. His work was all that could be asked.

The soloist was Anton Witex, who played Bruch's Concerto for violin, No. 2, beautifully. The orchestral accompaniment was a joy to hear. The Sibelius symphony was heard for the first time in Detroit, and whetted the appetite for a repetition. Brahms' Academic Festival overture and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody were the other orchestral numbers. The rhapsody has been played in Detroit before, by the Boston orchestra. It is a spirited and colorful work on Spanish themes, and the audience liked it so well, that it tried hard to win a second playing of it, but had to be content with the bows of Mr. Urack and his players.

The next concert in the Orchestral association series will be given by the Minneapolis orchestra, with Emil Oberhoffer, as conductor, Wednesday evening, Feb. 26.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

Detroit Journal
February 3, 1913

Greatest Crowd of Season Greets Boston Orchestra at Armory

The annual Detroit appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra was made in the Armory Saturday night before an audience whose size and enthusiasm made it plain that the Boston orchestra is the Boston orchestra in Detroit, regardless of whose baton waves over it. It was a pledge of faith to the orchestra and a pretty compliment to Mr. Otto Urack, who directed, that the attendance was not perceptibly less owing to the absence of the great Dr. Muck.

Mr. Urack repaid the compliment by reading in a manner that left little to be desired and the orchestra rewarded the faith by performing—within the limitations of the program—as its most ardent admirers would have had it perform. If there was any pang of regret at the close of the evening it was because of the program, which was not only not long but which did not at any time transport the audience to any very sublime hights.

Curiosity was centered, of course, in the Sibelius symphony (No. 1 in E minor), which was given its first Detroit performance. When the last barbaric bars of the final movement had been thudded from the drums, the verdict of the audience seemed to be that in its entirety the work was rather more interesting than impressive. It is a bit of Finnish emotionalism which means, per se, that it is somber and rough even in its most exalted moments. The first and last movements [illegible] reading, were most [illegible] first giving promises which the last fulfilled. The first was marked by wild crescendos, abrupt climaxes and rapid development of its themes, leaving the hearer distraught and anxious at the end of it. The second, andante, ma con troppo lento, began with an easy and refreshing melody which soon, however, gave way to noisy restless treatments of what seemed to be a multitude of different themes. The impression here was as of a novel with a too complicated plot, each thread traced to its end surely enough, but so intertwined with the others as to make the whole confusing and tiring. A few easy movements at the close were grateful. A short allegro followed, wilder and savoring even more of the north than anything that preceded it. By its very fury, drums and brass contending for supremacy, it swept the audience. Mr. Urack was almost in a frenzy at its close. Then came the last movement, picking up themes from the first and developing them impressively, seeming to portray an emotion more racial than individual, heavy, somber, chill, but shot through with the nervous bursts of passion which had characterized all that had preceeded.

Such, at least, was the general impression; the technically musical may have found other beauties or other deficiencies in it.

The remaining two offerings of the orchestra were light in the extreme. Brahms' potpouri of German college tunnes, called "Academic Festival" and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody, an idealization of Spanish dance themes which set many feet atapping and stood out in its vivaciousness in striking contrast to the music of the north.

There remained the playing of Bruch's concerto N. 2 with Anton Witek as the violinist. His accomplishment of its three movements pleased orchestra and audience alike and added another to the many pleasant memories which Detroit holds of Mr. Witek's musicianship.

Beethoven

[150]

DETROIT FREE PRESS.
FEBRUARY 2, 1913.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Music-Lovers Have Rare Treat in Masterly Rendition of Sybelius Symphony.

Boston loaned its symphony orchestra to Detroit last evening, the entire personnel of the band appearing here for the first time in the history of the Detroit Orchestral association and probably for the first time in the history of the city. The armory was crowded, as it always is when the Boston orchestra stops, more than one person making the event the occasion of his or her annual indulgence in real music.

Though the brilliancy of the occasion was a trifle dimmed by the absence of the regular conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who lies ill in Boston, the new assistant conductor of the organization, Otto Urack, gave an excellent account of himself, quite covering himself with glory by the able manner in which he managed his men, and the scholarly and poetic readings he gave his scores. Mr. Urack received two recalls after the symphony and one at the close of the program, the latter a rather rare honor for a Detroit audience to accord any orchestral conductor.

The Program.

The program was made up of Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Brahms "Academic Festival overture," Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody and the Second Bruch concerto for violin, the solo being played by Herr Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra.

The Sibelius symphony which was the piece de resistance is a work that should be heard twice or thrice to be fully appreciated. The thematic material [illegible] atmosphere of Finland, and throughout the whole of its capricious meanderings, the symphony fairly quivers with life. Sibelius plainly has something to say, and though possibly he is at times over-insistent in the repetition of phrases, he pleases and inspires immensely by his sincerity and ruggedness. The most characteristic things in the work are the opening theme which pervades almost the whole symphony and the wildly fantastic scherzo and the board open sweep of the finale.

Witek's Work Fine.

The orchestra played throughout with its usual wonderful sensitiveness to light and shade, building up climaxes with a delicacy and craft which forced admiration for their sheer perfection as art, sometimes breaking out into ponderous bursts of sound that were almost overwhelming, and again indulging in most elusive nuances.

Mr. Witek's playing of the Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to those who knew his work. He interpreted a most exacting work with fine repose, with most admirable display of technique, and with fine sensitiveness for tone. At the end he was given three enhusiastic recalls.

The Brahms overture, and the Chabrier rhapsody, works in the lighter vein, served excellently to give the program pleasing balance, and an air of joyfulness which it could easily endure after the general solemnity of the symphony.

DETROIT NEWS TRIBUNE,
FEBRUARY 2,

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Big Armory Audience

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra always marks the high point of interest in the Detroit Orchestral association series and the program offered by the masterly body of musicians in the armory last night proved sufficient to bring out the largest audience yet in attendance at any of the orchestral concerts this season.

That the Boston orchestra, as an organization of artists and musicians of the highest stamp is sufficient in itself to retain its local following, irrespective of conductors, was shown in the fact that even though Dr. Muck's absence from the director's stand was announced there was in no way a lessening of interest in the occasion. His young assistant, Otto Urach, was accorded a cordial reception.

The feature of the evening was the Sibelius Symphony in E minor, not so much because it was greatest in melodic appeal, as because this was the first time it was ever given in the city and because it is representative of one of the most noted modern Finnish composers. The composition has all the gloom and somberness of the north, and the composer, highly temperamental, has embodied in it melancholy, passion, desolation, with fiery passages calling out all the force of the great orchestra.

The other offerings were Brahms' Academic Festival Overture and Chabrier's "Espana Rhapsody."

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston orchestra, was the soloist. He played Bruch's Concerto No. 2 for violin with orchestral accompaniment with artistry and deep feeling.

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT

February 8, 1913

The Boston Orchestra.

It was only natural that much disappointment should have been felt at the non-appearance of Dr. Muck at the concert of the Boston Orchestra last Saturday evening, but as everyone knows that human flesh is humanly frail in all cases, Dr. Muck's illness could not be taken in any other manner than as a regrettable matter of course. When the giver of a solo concert is incapacitated, of course, the affair is called off. But no orchestra ever guarantees its conductor, but simply the orchestra itself, and in case of illness the concertmeister takes his place. This is one of the duties of a concertmeister. The Boston Orchestra is the only one in the United States that has ever aspired to an assistant conductor, however. This was a part of the stipulation with Dr. Muck, and Otto Urack, also of the Royal Opera in Berlin, was chosen by the doctor himself to fill this position. Although young, only 28 years old, yet he has had much experience, and was for some time a protege of Richard Strauss. That he was thoroughly master of himself and his orchestra was apparent to any listener last Saturday night. Even though an orchestra were thoroughly drilled, an inefficient conductor could easily make it listless and start the audience on the road to slumberland. Such was not the case with Mr. Urack, however, but he conducted with a verve and vim, and carried both orchestra and audience with an enthusiasm that made the concert a triumphant success. He was particularly successful with the Sibelius Symphony, a work almost overwhelming in the heart-gripping force of its melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and emotional appeal. No wonder Dr. Muck admires it. It is both old and new in its content. As a Finnish critic quaintly expressed it, "Its harmony goes its own way, but that is God's way, if one acknowledges that all good things come from Him." The more one hears it, the more beautiful it seems, and when it becomes as well known to audiences as are the symphonies of Tschaikowsky it will make an equally wonderful appeal.

What a delightful work is Brahms' Academic Fest Overture, which was heard also for the first time here. Although scholarly in the extreme, as is all of Brahms' work, yet how jovial, and how skillfully the student songs are introduced as secondary themes, and entirely incidental to the main business of the overture. It has always proven one of the most charming concert numbers in existence. Although the Chabrier Rhapsody Espana is becoming familiar, it is all the more welcome.

Mr. Witek, if possible, gave even more pleasure than in his playing two seasons ago. His concerto was not one of the well-known "war-horse" pieces, but all the more a compliment to the intelligence of his Detroit audience. Although entirely unfamiliar with it, yet the melodic beauty of the concert and the virtuosity and refined interpretation of Mr. Witek was thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed. Taken as a whole, the concert was certainly a memorable one.

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB 5 1913

SYMPHONY CONCERT VERY ENJOYABLE

Boston Orchestra Assisted by Norman Wilks, Pianist, Entertained Large Audience.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening and was enjoyed by a large audience. Dr. Muck is still ill and was unable to lead the orchestra and his place was taken by Mr. Urack, who conducted at the last concert and gave excellent satisfaction by his very creditabe and sympathetic work. That was true again last night, as the orchestra under his handling played with skill and showed the results of careful practice and discriminating leadership.

The programme was well arranged and effectively contrasted as regards both the composers represented and the character of the music. There were three numbers by orchestra and one by the soloist, Norman Wilks, an English pianist. These were as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73...Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Overture to "Euryanthe"..................Weber
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54..................Schumann
  I. Allegro effettuoso.
  II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
  III. Allegro vivace.
Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ....Wagner

Brahms's Symphony is thoroughly representative of the genius of the composer. Written in middle life, it shows the ripeness of his talent and is one of the best compositions which bears his name. Bright and cheerful in its nature, it is full of melody and charm and was played with feeling, all its meaning and musical qualities were brought out by the orchestra. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is a brilliant production replete with harmony and life and was rendered with an appreciation of its beauties which made it delightful. The prelude to "The Meistersinger" of Wagner is marked by force and fire and was given in a painstaking and capable manner.

Mr. Wilks, the piano soloist of the concert, is making his first appearance in this country. He has won success abroad and is making the same record here. He is still youthful and shows promise of a brilliant career. The Schumann Concerto, which was his number of the programme, is considered by many the most beautiful work of its kind in all the literature of music and it was rendered in a manner that clearly revealed his talent.

It will be two months before the next and final concert of the series will be given, the date being April 1.

LARCENY ALLEGED.

From TRIB
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1913
D

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large and representative audience of musical and society people assembled in Infantry Hall last evening for the fourth concert of the season. In the gathering were Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. R. Grenville Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mr. G. Richmond Parsons, Miss Parsons, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mrs. Charles G. King, Miss Wheelwright, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Mrs. Howard M. Chapin, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Miss Hunt, The Misses Lacey-Baker, Mrs. E. Tudor Gross, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Mr. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin H. Jewett, Mr. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Miss Louise Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. George Hail, Mrs. Orray Taft, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hunt Clarke, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. William M. Harris, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mrs. Frederick I. Marvel, Miss Edna Lewis, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Clarke, Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. A. Kinghorn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Over, Miss Ellen Anthony, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1913
Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourth Performance by Boston Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last night before the usual large and appreciative audience. Although Dr. Muck was advertised to conduct, it was decided at the last minute that his health was not sufficiently restored to admit of his doing so, and the baton was again in the hands of Mr. Otto Urack, who, as at the previous concert, proved an extremely competent and satisfactory substitute. The soloist was Mr. Norman Wilks, a young English pianist now on his first visit to this country, whose performance of Schumann's A minor concerto went far to justify the flattering reports that preceded his advent. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73....Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Overture to "Euryanthe"................Weber
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54................Schumann
  I. Allegro effettuoso.
  II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
  III. Allegro vivace.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ....Wagner

No fault can be found with the quality of this programme, for it is excellent music from first to last. Yet have we not a right to expect something a little less shop-worn at the hands of an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with an immense repertory to draw from? Every piece here has been played at our concerts over and over again. Is it too much to ask that one number, at least, on each programme, shall present a somewhat less familiar aspect? The last conductor of the orchestra endeared himself to us by the freshness and variety of his programmes. Is there any reason why Dr. Muck connot do as well?

The orchestra played, as its custom is, with almost flawless brilliancy. Mr. Urack's conducting was finished, musicianly and forceful. On the side of actual performance, therefore, no criticism can justly apply. The chief interest of the programme centred about the work of the pianist, which proved satisfactory in every way. Schumann's A-minor concerto is an agreeable work for the pianist, who is afforded fine opportunities for the display of skill in every direction, while not called upon to perform on a musical tight rope nor to engage in a losing battle with the orchestral tretti. The playing of Mr. Wilks was refined, elegant, musicianly. One feels that he possesses unusual ability, and that he would shine in recital.

The last concert will be given on the evening of Tuesday, April 1, at which time the orchestra will be assisted by Miss Julia Culp, the Dutch soprano.

W. A. B.

[illegible] programme for to-night is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, op. 73, Brahms; Overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54, Schumann; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; soloist, Norman Wilks.

DETROIT FREE PRESS:
FEBRUARY 2, 1913.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Music-Lovers Have Rare Treat in Masterly Rendition of Sybelius Symphony.

Boston loaned its symphony orchestra to Detroit last evening, the entire personnel of the band appearing here for the first time in the history of the Detroit Orchestral association and probably for the first time in the history of the city. The armory was crowded, as it always is when the Boston orchestra stops, more than one person making the event the occasion of his or her annual indulgence in real music.

Though the brilliancy of the occasion was a trifle dimmed by the absence of the regular conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who lies ill in Boston, the new assistant conductor of the organization, Otto Urack, gave an excellent account of himself, quite covering himself with glory by the able manner in which he managed his men, and the scholarly and poetic readings he gave his scores. Mr. Urack received two recalls after the symphony and one at the close of the program, the latter a rather rare honor for a Detroit audience to accord any orchestral conductor.

The Program.

The program was made up of Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Brahms "Academic Festival overture," Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody and the Second Bruch concerto for violin, the solo being played by Herr Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra.

The Sibelius symphony which was the piece de resistance is a work that should be heard twice or thrice to be fully appreciated. The thematic material is [illegible] of the [illegible] and atmosphere of Finland, and throughout the whole of its capricious meanderings, the symphony fairly quivers with life. Sibelius plainly has something to say, and though possibly he is at times over-insistent in the repetition of phrases, he pleases and inspires immensely by his sincerity and ruggedness. The most characteristic things in the work are the opening theme which pervades almost the whole symphony and the wildly fantastic scherzo and the board open sweep of the finale.

Witek's Work Fine.

The orchestra played throughout with its usual wonderful sensitiveness to light and shade, building up climaxes with a delicacy and craft which forced admiration for their sheer perfection as art, sometimes breaking out into ponderous bursts of sound that were almost overwhelming, and again indulging in most elusive nuances.

Mr. Witek's playing of the Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to those who knew his work. He interpreted a most exacting work with fine repose, with most admirable display of technique, and with fine sensitiveness for tone. At the end he was given three enhusiastic recalls.

The Brahms overture, and the Chabrier rhapsody, works in the lighter vein, served excellently to give the program pleasing balance, and an air of joyfulness which it could easily endure after the general solemnity of the symphony.

DETROIT NEWS TRIBUNE,
FEBRUARY 2,

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Big Armory Audience

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra always marks the high point of interest in the Detroit Orchestral association series and the program offered by the masterly body of musicians in the armory last night proved sufficient to bring out the largest audience yet in attendance at any of the orchestral concerts this season.

That the Boston orchestra, as an organization of artists and musicians of the highest stamp is sufficient in itself to retain its local following, irrespective of conductors, was shown in the fact that even though Dr. Muck's absence from the director's stand was announced there was in no way a lessening of interest in the occasion. His young assistant, Otto Urach, was accorded a cordial reception.

The feature of the evening was the Sibelius Symphony in E minor, not so much because it was greatest in melodic appeal, as because this was the first time it was ever given in the city and because it is representative of one of the most noted modern Finnish composers. The composition has all the gloom and somberness of the north, and the composer, highly temperamental, has embodied in it melancholy, passion, desolation, with fiery passages calling out all the force of the great orchestra.

The other offerings were Brahms' Academic Festival Overture and Chabrier's "Espana Rhapsody."

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston orchestra, was the soloist. He played Bruch's Concerto No. 2 for violin with orchestral accompaniment with artistry and deep feeling.

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT

February 8, 1913

The Boston Orchestra.

It was only natural that much disappointment should have been felt at the non-appearance of Dr. Muck at the concert of the Boston Orchestra last Saturday evening, but as everyone knows that human flesh is humanly frail in all cases, Dr. Muck's illness could not be taken in any other manner than as a regrettable matter of course. When the giver of a solo concert is incapacitated, of course, the affair is called off. But no orchestra ever guarantees its conductor, but simply the orchestra itself, and in case of illness the concertmeister takes his place. This is one of the duties of a concertmeister. The Boston Orchestra is the only one in the United States that has ever aspired to an assistant conductor, however. This was a part of the stipulation with Dr. Muck, and Otto Urack, also of the Royal Opera in Berlin, was chosen by the doctor himself to fill this position. Although young, only 28 years old, yet he has had much experience, and was for some time a protege of Richard Strauss. That he was thoroughly master of himself and his orchestra was apparent to any listener last Saturday night. Even though an orchestra were thoroughly drilled, an inefficient conductor could easily make it listless and start the audience on the road to slumberland. Such was not the case with Mr. Urack, however, but he conducted with a verve and vim, and carried both orchestra and audience with an enthusiasm that made the concert a triumphant success. He was particularly successful with the Sibelius Symphony, a work almost overwhelming in the heart-gripping force of its melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and emotional appeal. No wonder Dr. Muck admires it. It is both old and new in its content. As a Finnish critic quaintly expressed it, "Its harmony goes its own way, but that is God's way, if one acknowledges that all good things come from Him." The more one hears it, the more beautiful it seems, and when it becomes as well known to audiences as are the symphonies of Tschaikowsky it will make an equally wonderful appeal.

What a delightful work is Brahms' Academic Fest Overture, which was heard also for the first time here. Although scholarly in the extreme, as is all of Brahms' work, yet how jovial, and how skillfully the student songs are introduced as secondary themes, and entirely incidental to the main business of the overture. It has always proven one of the most charming concert numbers in existence. Although the Chabrier Rhapsody Espana is becoming familiar, it is all the more welcome.

Mr. Witek, if possible, gave even more pleasure than in his playing two seasons ago. His concerto was not one of the well-known "war-horse" pieces, but all the more a compliment to the intelligence of his Detroit audience. Although entirely unfamiliar with it, yet the melodic beauty of the concert and the virtuosity and refined interpretation of Mr. Witek was thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed. Taken as a whole, the concert was certainly a memorable one.

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date
Estabi

SYMPHONY CONCERT VERY ENJOYABLE

Boston Orchestra Assisted by Norman Wilks, Pianist, Entertained Large Audience.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening and was enjoyed by a large audience. Dr. Muck is still ill and was unable to lead the orchestra and his place was taken by Mr. Urack, who conducted at the last concert and gave excellent satisfaction by his very creditabe and sympathetic work. That was true again last night, as the orchestra under his handling played with skill and showed the results of careful practice and discriminating leadership.

The programme was well arranged and effectively contrasted as regards both the composers represented and the character of the music. There were three numbers by orchestra and one by the soloist, Norman Wilks, an English pianist. These were as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73...Brahms
  1. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Overture to "Euryanthe"................Weber
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54.................Schumann
  I. Allegro effettuoso.
  II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
  III. Allegro vivace.
Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"...............................Wagner

Brahms's Symphony is thoroughly representative of the genius of the composer. Written in middle life, it shows the ripeness of his talent and is one of the best compositions which bears his name. Bright and cheerful in its nature, it is full of melody and charm and was played with feeling, all its meaning and musical qualities were brought out by the orchestra. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is a brilliant production replete with harmony and life and was rendered with an appreciation of its beauties which made it delightful. The prelude to "The Meistersinger" of Wagner is marked by force and fire and was given in a painstaking and capable manner.

Mr. Wilks, the piano soloist of the concert, is making his first appearance in this country. He has won success abroad and is making the same record here. He is still youthful and shows promise of a brilliant career. The Schumann Concerto, which was his number of the programme, is considered by many the most beautiful work of its kind in all the literature of music and it was rendered in a manner that clearly revealed his talent.

It will be two months before the next and final concert of the series will be given, the date being April 1.

LARCENY ALLEGED.

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1913
D

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large and representative audience of musical and society people assembled in Infantry Hall last evening for the fourth concert of the season. In the gathering were Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. R. Grenville Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mr. G. Richmond Parsons, Miss Parsons, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mrs. Charles G. King, Miss Wheelwright, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Mrs. Howard M. Chapin, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Miss Hunt, The Misses Lacey-Baker, Mrs. E. Tudor Gross, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Mr. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin H. Jewett, Mr. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Miss Louise Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. George Hail, Mrs. Orray Taft, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hunt Clarke, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. William M. Harris, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mrs. Frederick I. Marvel, Miss Edna Lewis, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Clarke, Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. A. Kinghorn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Over, Miss Ellen Anthony, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown.

384

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Estab

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourth Performance by Boston Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last night before the usual large and appreciative audience. Although Dr. Muck was advertised to conduct, it was decided at the last minute that his health was not sufficiently restored to admit of his doing so, and the baton was again in the hands of Mr. Otto Urack, who, as at the previous concert, proved an extremely competent and satisfactory substitute. The soloist was Mr. Norman Wilks, a young English pianist now on his first visit to this country, whose performance of Schumann's A minor concerto went far to justify the flattering reports that preceded his advent. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73....Brahms
  I. Allegro non troppo.
  II. Adagio non troppo.
  III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
  IV. Allegro con spirito.
Overture to "Euryanthe"................Weber
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54.................Schumann
  I. Allegro effettuoso.
  II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
  III. Allegro vivace.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" .... Wagner

No fault can be found with the quality of this programme, for it is excellent music from first to last. Yet have we not a right to expect something a little less shop-worn at the hands of an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with an immense repertory to draw from? Every piece here has been played at our concerts over and over again. Is it too much to ask that one number, at least, on each programme, shall present a somewhat less familiar aspect? The last conductor of the orchestra endeared himself to us by the freshness and variety of his programmes. Is there any reason why Dr. Muck connot do as well?

The orchestra played, as its custom is, with almost flawless brilliancy. Mr. Urack's conducting was finished, musicianly and forceful. On the side of actual performance, therefore, no criticism can justly apply. The chief interest of the programme centred about the work of the pianist, which proved satisfactory in every way. Schumann's A-minor concerto is an agreeable work for the pianist, who is afforded fine opportunities for the display of skill in every direction, while not called upon to perform on a musical tight rope nor to engage in a losing battle with the orchestral tretti. The playing of Mr. Wilks was refined, elegant, musicianly. One feels that he possesses unusual ability, and that he would shine in recital.

The last concert will be given on the evening of Tuesday, April 1, at which time the orchestra will be assisted by Miss Julia Culp, the Dutch soprano.

W. A. B

384

[illegible] The programme for to-night is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major, op. 73, Brahms; Overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54, Schumann; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; soloist, Norman Wilks.

Feb 8, 1913

SATURDAY NIGHT—"The Paper Worth While"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

IT is said that the Boston Symphony is so endowed that it can never pass out of existence until the nations of the earth melt away. This may or may not be true; but all who heard this superb assemblage of musicians at Massey Hall recently will hope that it is a veracious statement of fact. A more perfect organization of its kind could not be conceived,—a more wonderful instrument for a conductor of genius to play upon was never formed. Illimitable wealth seems to be back of it. It is apparent in the magnitude of its string sections; in the ineffably beautiful quality of its woodwind and the exquisite mellowness of its brass choir. It was apparent, also, in its glorious unison playing,—in which not one performer of the hundred men composing it was a tenth of a note behind or ahead of anyone else,—in which not a note was played too loudly, and not a phrase interpreted weakly. Mr. Emil Paur, who was once its conductor, used to describe it as "Gericke's well-oiled machine," and assuredly it is in its perfection all that the description implies. Given a perfect instrument, it rests with the emotion and power of the conductor, to do the rest; and imagination fails in thinking of what a conductor like Arthur Nikisch, Josef Stransky or Mr. Paur himself could do with it. It was deeply to be regretted that Dr. Carl Muck, whose fame had gone before him (but who had never previously appeared in this city), was too ill to conduct, for he is reputed to possess a great emotional gift and a commanding personality. This is not intended as a reflection on Mr. Otto Urack, the young 'cellist of twenty-four who took his place. Fifteen years from now Mr. Urack, if he keeps his health, will probably be one of the great conductors of the world. At the present time he lacks histrionic quality,—that combination of authority and magnetism,— which add in an indescribable way to a conductor's achievements. He is angular and immature, but shows an abundance of emotional fire that may later resolve itself into the profound and steady flame that gives forth both heat and light.

To illustrate what one means by the histrionic quality, it is only necessary for the reader to recall the manner in which the experienced conductor walks forth like a leading actor to his desk; commands the attention of his entire audience by his pose the moment he takes the baton in hand; and at the psychological moment when every listener is at a nervous tension begins his attack. The mystical power of magnetism, which is a steady growth in the musician and the actor, if it flourishes at all, is as yet undeveloped in Mr. Urack, and that was why the concert of the largest and finest body of orchestral players that has ever visited Canada failed of its full effect. When Wilhelm Gericke brought the orchestra here seven or eight years ago his players numbered only seventy men. The added force of thirty heard under Mr. Urack on Jan. 29 exquisitely augmented the tone of an organization, always impeccable, with a thrilling and spiritual beauty.

Three of the four numbers of the programme were familiar to every concert-goer,—but at least one of them, the greatest of all symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth, can never grow hackneyed. So glorious and so perfect is it that it ranks among the few musical compositions to which a bar could not be added or a bar taken away without sacrilege. As a composition it recalls the apostrophe that the ill-destined Christopher Marlowe wrote to the legendary Helen:

> "O thou art fairer than the evening air
> Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars!"

These, the most beautiful lines ever penned since the English language was written, are not too glowing to describe this symphony. Of all its movements, the deep, appealing quality of the Andante movement, which is at once a message and a consolation, is the most satisfying. It was this movement that brought out most fully the exquisite tonal quality of all sections of the orchestra and that proved this mighty instrument to be more than a machine, but a living organism of which every member felt, as an artist, what he was expressing. The brilliance of its tone was shown and the perfection of its mechanism in the Scherzo which led into the stupendous and joyous final movement. Taken altogether, it was a glorious and satisfying achievement. One has heard greater conductors than Mr. Urack direct the work, but never previously an orchestra which gave the feeling that it could go ahead and do it in the dark, without sight of the conductor's baton.

The great novelty of the concert,—in the sense that it is a work never before adequately performed in this city —was "Tyl Eulenspeigel"'s Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss. Strauss has described it himself as "composed after the old-fashioned roguish manner,—in rondo form." The programme notes written for it by Mr. Philip Hale, of Boston, which the audience were provided with, are copious, and the kernel of the matter is to be found in the statement that in this case Tyl Eulenspeigel was Richard Strauss himself. Tyl, be it understood, is the legendary human rogue of German legend; just as was Reineke Fuchs among the creatures of the animal world in Gothic legend; and Brer Rabbit in the negro folk lore related by Uncle Remus. What necessity, therefore, to give a definite programme to a musical poem which depicts a merry and tricky being disporting itself to the confusion of everybody? The way to enjoy this composition is to sit back and listen to the composer playing his tricks upon the orchestra,—throwing to the winds all ideas of form and puzzling every listener and player with strange intervals and curious tonal effects. Make of it what you will, it is delightful, but almost impossible to musicians less highly trained than the men who constitute this orchestra. Taken as a whole, it is a work at once alluring, teasing and memorable. And that is what Strauss in all probability intended it to be.

The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" should now be familiar to every concert-goer, and it was in this composition more than any other that Mr. Urack showed his immaturity. Fatigue was apparent in his movements as he tried to exact the last essence of expression from his men. But in reality his exertions were not necessary, for they gave a very beautiful tonal rendering of the work. The quality of the strings in the melody of the prize-song, the majesty of tone in the great Lutheran chorale, which are the chief features of this wonderful tapestry of interwoven melodies, are glorious memories to those who heard the orchestra.

To speak quite frankly, one did not enjoy very much the interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto by Mr. Anton Witek, who ordinarily sits at the first desk in the orchestra. His tone is pure and sweet, his technique faultless, but he lacks the warmth which is necessary to make the Mendelssohn concerto (above all violin compositions of the larger type) acceptable. Many violinists take the precaution of omitting the first movement, which, unless extraordinarily well done, never fails to be tedious. Mr. Witek was not so circumspect, with the result that his audience was so weary of the work that before the concerto was finished they were not in a mood to fully appreciate his really brilliant technical performance in the last movement. Throughout the work, however, it was a compensation to hear the splendidly sonorous and always judicious accompaniment by the orchestra.

Many music lovers, who desire to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra an annual visitant, were somewhat disappointed that Massey Hall was not filled to the doors for this concert. Since the receipts did not fall very far below $3,000, and would have risen considerably above it but for the announcement that Dr. Muck was ill, there is not very much reason for discouragement; and there are good grounds for the hope that if it returns next year the public, which is ever changing and ever growing, will extend to it a very cordial welcome indeed.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date FEB 9 - 1913

The fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening Dr. Muck will present a symphony by Erwin Lendvai, which has never been heard in New York. The conductor from Boston considers this work one of the most important creations of the last two or three years. On Saturday afternoon Mo- [illegible] Beethoven

Establi

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date FEB 9 - 1913

SYMPHONY LEADER AND CHUM OF EDISON LIKES PICTURES

(Special Correspondence The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 6.

Otto Urack, who is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of Dr. Carl Muck, and who possesses the unique distinction of being the youngest man ever to swing a baton over that famous body, delights in moving pictures.

He said so after the Symphony concert, confessing that he attends at least once a week with his young American wife, daughter of Herr Hoppe, the old Metropolitan Opera House singer, whom he wed last May in Berlin.

Then he went on to tell of assisting Edison in his New Jersey workshop in developing a remarkable improvement on the phonograph which is soon to be put on the market. Outside of singing, there seems to be no field in the realms of music in which in his brief life Herr Urack has not played a part.

Est 84

Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 9 1913

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30, and it will be the occasion of the first appearance here of Max Pauer, the eminent German pianist, who had such a sensational success at his debut in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra, and a few days later in his recital in that city. Pauer is in this country for the first time, and from all accounts he is one of the very few great pianists in the world. He will play the seldom heard Mendelssohn Concerto for piano and orchestra.

E 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News
Address [illegible]
Date FEB 5 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Gives a Splendid Concert in Infantry Hall, Assisted by Norman Wilks, the English Pianist

E 1884

Once again Providence music lovers had an opportunity of seeing Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, do some splendid work in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, on the occasion of the fourth concert by the Boston aggregation of trained musicians. Again Mr. Urack proved himself to be a most worthy assistant to Dr. Karl Muck, who is still confined to his home in Boston by sickness.

Norman Wilks, the English pianist, was the soloist, and he choose for his introduction to a Providence audience Schumann's Concerto in A minor, and it was most happy. Schumann's concerto is by no means unfamiliar to the musical world, and it affords the pianist every opportunity to show real skill, knowledge of the instrument, and all the deep feeling that the work demands. In all of this Mr. Wilks was eminently satisfactory, for while a most able pianist, he does not allow a slavish adherence to technique to overshadow the real intent of the composer, as to the finesse of nuance and expression. Tuesday evening's program was:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73 .... Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Overture to "Euryanthe" .... Weber
Concerto, in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54 .... Schumann
I. Allegro effettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" .... Wagner

The orchestra, as usual, did some remarkably brilliant work, all of the compositions presented being received with marks of the most hearty appreciation. The Brahm's symphony was given admirably under Mr. Urack's direction, and very delightful indeed was the overture to "Euryanthe," of Von Weber, in fact it was the gem of the orchestral program. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" von Nurnberg" of Wagner, was all that was expected from this excellent orchestra.

The last concert of the series will be given on the evening of Tuesday, April 1, at which time the orchestra will be assisted by Miss Julia Culp, the Dutch soprano.

YOUNG ITALIANS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB 4 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Urack Will Again be the Conductor To-night.

Contrary to general expectations, Mr. Urack will again conduct the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall tonight. It had been thought Dr. Muck would be able to resume his work, but his physicians still advise strongly against his risking any travelling at this time. Mr. Urack has just won a series of notable successes, conducting the six concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Western trip in Albany, Buffalo, Toronto, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. The orchestra is indeed

Est 84

Feb 8, 1913 SATURDAY NIGHT—"The Paper Worth While"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

IT is said that the Boston Symphony is so endowed that it can never pass out of existence until the nations of the earth melt away. This may or may not be true; but all who heard this superb assemblage of musicians at Massey Hall recently will hope that it is a veracious statement of fact. A more perfect organization of its kind could not be conceived,—a more wonderful instrument for a conductor of genius to play upon was never formed. Illimitable wealth seems to be back of it. It is apparent in the magnitude of its string sections; in the ineffably beautiful quality of its woodwind and the exquisite mellowness of its brass choir. It was apparent, also, in its glorious unison playing,—in which not one performer of the hundred men composing it was a tenth of a note behind or ahead of anyone else,—in which not a note was played too loudly, and not a phrase interpreted weakly. Mr. Emil Paur, who was once its conductor, used to describe it as "Gericke's well-oiled machine," and assuredly it is in its perfection all that the description implies. Given a perfect instrument, it rests with the emotion and power of the conductor, to do the rest; and imagination fails in thinking of what a conductor like Arthur Nikisch, Josef Stransky or Mr. Paur himself could do with it. It was deeply to be regretted that Dr. Carl Muck, whose fame had gone before him (but who had never previously appeared in this city), was too ill to conduct, for he is reputed to possess a great emotional gift and a commanding personality. This is not intended as a reflection on Mr. Otto Urack, the young 'cellist of twenty-four who took his place. Fifteen years from now Mr. Urack, if he keeps his health, will probably be one of the great conductors of the world. At the present time he lacks histrionic quality,—that combination of authority and magnetism,— which add in an indescribable way to a conductor's achievements. He is angular and immature, but shows an abundance of emotional fire that may later resolve itself into the profound and steady flame that gives forth both heat and light.

To illustrate what one means by the histrionic quality, it is only necessary for the reader to recall the manner in which the experienced conductor walks forth like a leading actor to his desk; commands the attention of his entire audience by his pose the moment he takes the baton in hand; and at the psychological moment when every listener is at a nervous tension begins his attack. The mystical power of magnetism, which is a steady growth in the musician and the actor, if it flourishes at all, is as yet undeveloped in Mr. Urack, and that was why the concert of the largest and finest body of orchestral players that has ever visited Canada failed of its full effect. When Wilhelm Gericke brought the orchestra here seven or eight years ago his players numbered only seventy men. The added force of thirty heard under Mr. Urack on Jan. 29 exquisitely augmented the tone of an organization, always impeccable, with a thrilling and spiritual beauty.

Three of the four numbers of the programme were familiar to every concert-goer,—but at least one of them, the greatest of all symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth, can never grow hackneyed. So glorious and so perfect is it that it ranks among the few musical compositions to which a bar could not be added or a bar taken away without sacrilege. As a composition it recalls the apostrophe that the ill-destined Christopher Marlowe wrote to the legendary Helen:

> "O thou art fairer than the evening air
> Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars!"

These, the most beautiful lines ever penned since the English language was written, are not too glowing to describe this symphony. Of all its movements, the deep, appealing quality of the Andante movement, which is at once a message and a consolation, is the most satisfying. It was this movement that brought out most fully the exquisite tonal quality of all sections of the orchestra and that proved this mighty instrument to be more than a machine, but a living organism of which every member felt, as an artist, what he was expressing. The brilliance of its tone was shown and the perfection of its mechanism in the Scherzo which led into the stupendous and joyous final movement. Taken altogether, it was a glorious and satisfying achievement. One has heard greater conductors than Mr. Urack direct the work, but never previously an orchestra which gave the feeling that it could go ahead and do it in the dark, without sight of the conductor's baton.

The great novelty of the concert,—in the sense that it is a work never before adequately performed in this city—was "Tyl Eulenspeigel"'s Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss. Strauss has described it himself as "composed after the old-fashioned roguish manner,—in rondo form." The programme notes written for it by Mr. Philip Hale, of Boston, which the audience were provided with, are copious, and the kernel of the matter is to be found in the statement that in this case Tyl Eulenspeigel was Richard Strauss himself. Tyl, be it understood, is the legendary human rogue of German legend; just as was Reineke Fuchs among the creatures of the animal world in Gothic legend; and Brer Rabbit in the negro folk lore related by Uncle Remus. What necessity, therefore, to give a definite programme to a musical poem which depicts a merry and tricky being disporting itself to the confusion of everybody? The way to enjoy this composition is to sit back and listen to the composer playing his tricks upon the orchestra,—throwing to the winds all ideas of form and puzzling every listener and player with strange intervals and curious tonal effects. Make of it what you will, it is delightful, but almost impossible to musicians less highly trained than the men who constitute this orchestra. Taken as a whole, it is a work at once alluring, teasing and memorable. And that is what Strauss in all probability intended it to be.

The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" should now be familiar to every concert-goer, and it was in this composition more than any other that Mr. Urack showed his immaturity. Fatigue was apparent in his movements as he tried to exact the last essence of expression from his men. But in reality his exertions were not necessary, for they gave a very beautiful tonal rendering of the work. The quality of the strings in the melody of the prize-song, the majesty of tone in the great Lutheran chorale, which are the chief features of this wonderful tapestry of interwoven melodies, are glorious memories to those who heard the orchestra.

To speak quite frankly, one did not enjoy very much the interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto by Mr. Anton Witek, who ordinarily sits at the first desk in the orchestra. His tone is pure and sweet, his technique faultless, but he lacks the warmth which is necessary to make the Mendelssohn concerto (above all violin compositions of the larger type) acceptable. Many violinists take the precaution of omitting the first movement, which, unless extraordinarily well done, never fails to be tedious. Mr. Witek was not so circumspect, with the result that his audience was so weary of the work that before the concerto was finished they were not in a mood to fully appreciate his really brilliant technical performance in the last movement. Throughout the work, however, it was a compensation to hear the splendidly sonorous and always judicious accompaniment by the orchestra.

Many music lovers, who desire to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra an annual visitant, were somewhat disappointed that Massey Hall was not filled to the doors for this concert. Since the receipts did not fall very far below $3,000, and would have risen considerably above it but for the announcement that Dr. Muck was ill, there is not very much reason for discouragement; and there are good grounds for the hope that if it returns next year the public, which is ever changing and ever growing, will extend to it a very cordial welcome indeed.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News

Address Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 5 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Gives a Splendid Concert in Infantry Hall, Assisted by Norman Wilks, the English Pianist

Once again Providence music lovers had an opportunity of seeing Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, do some splendid work in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, on the occasion of the fourth concert by the Boston aggregation of trained musicians. Again Mr. Urack proved himself to be a most worthy assistant to Dr. Karl Muck, who is still confined to his home in Boston by sickness.

Norman Wilks, the English pianist, was the soloist, and he choose for his introduction to a Providence audience Schumann's Concerto in A minor, and it was most happy. Schumann's concerto is by no means unfamiliar to the musical world, and it affords the pianist every opportunity to show real skill, knowledge of the instrument, and all the deep feeling that the work demands. In all of this Mr. Wilks was eminently satisfactory, for while a most able pianist, he does not allow a slavish adherence to technique to overshadow the real intent of the composer, as to the finesse of nuance and expression. Tuesday evening's program was:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. ....Brahms
- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber

Concerto, in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54..........Schumann
- I. Allegro effettuoso.
- II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
- III. Allegro vivace.

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"........ ....Wagner

The orchestra, as usual, did some remarkably brilliant work, all of the compositions presented being received with marks of the most hearty appreciation. The Brahm's symphony was given admirably under Mr. Urack's direction, and very delightful indeed was the overture to "Euryanthe," of Von Weber, in fact it was the gem of the orchestral program. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" von Nurnberg" of Wagner, was all that was expected from this excellent orchestra

The last concert of the series will be given on the evening of Tuesday, April 1, at which time the orchestra will be assisted by Miss Julia Culp, the Dutch soprano.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York

Date FEB 9 - 1913

SYMPHONY LEADER AND CHUM OF EDISON LIKES PICTURES

(Special Correspondence The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 6.

Otto Urack, who is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of Dr. Carl Muck, and who possesses the unique distinction of being the youngest man ever to swing a baton over that famous body, delights in moving pictures.

He said so after the Symphony concert, confessing that he attends at least once a week with his young American wife, daughter of Herr Hoppe, the old Metropolitan Opera House singer, whom he wed last May in Berlin.

Then he went on to tell of assisting Edison in his New Jersey workshop in developing a remarkable improvement on the phonograph which is soon to be put on the market. Outside of singing, there seems to be no field in the realms of music in which in his brief life Herr Urack has not played a part.

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date FEB 4 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Urack Will Again be the Conductor To-night.

Contrary to general expectations, Mr. Urack will again conduct the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall tonight. It had been thought Dr. Muck would be able to resume his work, but his physicians still advise strongly against his risking any travelling at this time. Mr. Urack has just won a series of notable successes, conducting the six concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Western trip in Albany, Buffalo, Toronto, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. The orchestra is indeed

---

From PRESS

Address: New York

Date FEB 9 - 1913

The fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening Dr. Muck will present a symphony by Erwin Lendvai, which has never been heard in New York. The conductor from Boston considers this work one of the most important creations of the last two or three years. On Saturday afternoon Mo-

Bach, [illegible], Beethoven

Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date FEB 9 1913

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30, and it will be the occasion of the first appearance here of Max Pauer, the eminent German pianist, who had such a sensational success at his debut in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra, and a few days later in his recital in that city. Pauer is in this country for the first time, and from all accounts he is one of the very few great pianists in the world. He will play the seldom heard Mendelssohn Concerto for piano and orchestra.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 2 - 1913

THAT the present musical season is gradually drawing to a close is brought to mind by the fact that this week will see the fourth of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth in The Listeners' series of six. Students' recitals and meetings of musical clubs will provide the rest of the musical entertainment that the week affords. A few concerts are announced for the weeks of Lent, the third week in this month providing several attractions, in the second concert by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, the last recital in the Students' Course and a concert by the Place Mandolin String Quartet.

Norman Wilks
Piano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will be the last appearance of that organization for a period of eight weeks, as the date of the fifth and last concert of the series is April 1. Dr. Muck has recovered from the illness which has made him give up much of his work during the past five weeks and will conduct this concert.

The symphony will be Brahms's in D-Major, No. 2. Brahms was well on toward middle age before he ventured into the large form of the symphony, and his first in C-Minor, very serious in character, was followed by the D-Major Symphony, which came in the series of four in the nature of a scherzo. It is bright, melodious, joyful in feeling and exhibits the genius of the composer. The other two orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner.

The soloist will be Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who will play the Schumann Concerto. Mr. Wilks is making his first visit to this country; in fact, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is responsible for his coming. He is a young man who has won success in Germany and England. The programme in the proper order is as follows:

Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D-Major; Weber, Overture, "Euryanthe;" Schumann, Concerto in A-Minor for piano; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

* * *

Cablegrams to this country have announced the resignation of Emil Paur, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck last February, making his debut on Sept. 7, as leader of the Royal Opera in Berlin, although his contract has still a considerable time to run. It is said that the Kaiser, as head of the Royal Opera, gave many evidences of his dissatisfaction, including a demand for the substitution of another Rapellmeister only a few hours before the last production of "The Flying Dutchman," which Mr. Paur was [illegible]nduct. The reasons for the Em[illegible] dissatisfaction are unknown. Mr. [illegible]ceeded Anton Seidl as conductor [illegible]ew York Philharmonic Society [illegible]r severing his connection with [illegible]n Symphony Orchestra, of [illegible]. Gericke succeeded him as [illegible]. His last post in this country [illegible]onductor of the Pittsburgh Or[illegible]

* * *

[illegible] been definitely settled that [illegible]ski is to return to America next [illegible] for an extensive tour throughout [illegible]ntry. Paderewski has not been [illegible]erica since the winter of 1908-09, when he spent a few weeks in the East. His principal object in coming to America at that time was to have his Symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has not made an extended concert tour in America since the season of 1907-08. Since that time he has had tours in South America and South Africa, while giving many concerts in Great Britain and on the Continent.

* * *

Florencio Constantino assures us that we never can hope to hear the music we should, on account of our climate. "It is unfortunate," he says, "that the great musical centres of America and Europe are not in the climate best suited for song. With one or two exceptions the great cities where opera and concert of the highest order prevail are situated more favorably to commerce than art. The dampness that penetrates the coast towns and the sudden changes of weather in such localities make it hard for the singer to be always in uniformly good voice.

"Of course commerce comes first and [illegible] afterward and art will always flourish [illegible]its best close to the harbor. But there the voice of the opera star will never be heard at its best advantage. The vocal [illegible] is susceptible to the sli[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News
Address PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Date FEB 1 - 1913
FEB 4 - 1913

MR URACK WILL CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Contrary to general expectation Mr. Urack will again conduct the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall tonight. It had been thought that Dr. Muck would be able to resume his work, but his physicians still advise strongly against his risking any travelling at this time.

Mr. Urack has just won a series of most notable successes, conducting the six concerts given by the Boston Symphony orchestra on its Western trip in Albany, Buffalo, Toronto, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. The orchestra is indeed fortunate in having so talented a man to take Dr. Muck's place when the latter is ill. The program for tonight is as follows.

Brahms. Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73.
Weber. Overture to "Euryanthe."
Schumann. Concerto in A Minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54.
Wagner. Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
~~Soloist—Norman Wilks.~~

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MAX PAUER TO PLAY IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2, will be played at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday, February 19, at the Lyric. Max Pauer, the pianist, whose debut in New York a few weeks ago is a real sensation of the season, will make his first appearance in Baltimore at this time.

There were many things to add interest to the success of this pianist. Although he is a man in his forties and has been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout Continental Europe, this is his first visit to America. Moreover, he had the boldness to choose as the vehicle of his debut Mendelsohn's Concerto in G Minor, a work which by common consent had long since been relegated to conservatory students. When he played it at his appearance with the Philharmonic Society in New York his performance came in the nature of a revelation.

A few days after his orchestral appearance he gave a recital that drew a throng in Aeolian Hall. The impression he made with the orchestra was more than confirmed by his playing in recital and Krehbiel, Henderson, Aldrich, Finck and the other New York critics proclaimed him as one of the greatest pianists that had ever come to America.

Mr. Pauer is well over six feet in height and is really as much of an Englishman as he is a German, for, although he was born of German-Austrian parents, his father having been Ernest Pauer, the eminent musical pedagogue, his birthplace was London, where he lived for 15 years before he went to Carlsruhe to devote himself to his musical studies. Four years later he returned to England and matriculated at Oxford, whence he was graduated with high honors. For ten years he was the professor of piano in the Cologne Conservatory and for the last four years he had been head of the famous conservatory in Stuttgart.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

At its February concert, in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, on the 21st inst., the Boston symphony Orchestra will introduce to Brooklyn as its soloist a pianist who has had success in Manhattan not unlike that which was the fortune of Paderewski, when he came to America in 1891. What makes the success more than usually interesting is that Max Pauer, the pianist in question, has long been held in high esteem in Europe. This is his first visit to America. His career as a virtuoso has taken him the length and breadth of Europe, and, as the head of the Stuttgart Conservatory, he held one of the most honorable positions in Germany. He made his debut in Manhattan last month with the Philharmonic Society, playing the Mendelssohn Concerto, and immediately he was proclaimed a very great artist. That impression was more than confirmed at his recital. The mere fact that a pianist was bold enough to resurrect the Mendelssohn's "G Minor Concerto," excited interest in the beginning; he not only resurrected it, but he gave it new life.

Max Pauer, who is more than six feet in height, is a son of a celebrated pianist, composer and editor of music, Ernst Pauer. He was born in London, in 1866, lived there until he was 15 years old, went to Carlsruhe and began systematic study of piano and composition, his principal teacher being Vincenz Lachmer. He returned to England, matriculated at Oxford University, from which he was graduated with honors, in the meantime continuing his piano studies with his father. He was engaged to be head of the piano department of the Cologne Conservatory in 1887, and there he remained ten years, and in 1908 he was [illegible]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

OLD MUSIC IN NEW AND RARE PERFORMANCE

Bach, Haydn, Mozart and "Early Beethoven" Make an Eighteenth-Century Programme—A Symphony by Haydn as Such Music Has Not Been Played Here in Long Memory—High Trumpets and a Post-Horn—Mozart Homely and Beethoven Youthful PLEASURE was in the air from the very beginning of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, and there had been enough shrewd anticipation of this pleasure to fill the "transient" second balcony, though there was no soloist and only a programme that ran from Bach through Haydn and Mozart to "early Beethoven." Dr. Muck was conducting again, warmly received and in full possession of all his powers of mind and spirit, if not of quite his usual strength of body. Bach's Suite in D—the Suite of the familar air—stood first and the strings in particular swung into the music with fine, free stride that barely halted for brave, firm tutti. The overture flowed in long, elastic arabesques, turned lightly into the fugue that ends it while Dr. Muck quickened the pace and heightened the tone and Mr. Witek kept his semi-solo violin in lively play. The air—the celebrated and also the hackneyed air—followed, and not once did Dr. Muck overdraw it into sentimentality. It curved in fine gradients. It pulsed to the under-beat. There was beautiful refinement of tone, but Bach's manly voice was not emasculated. Then the two gavottes, brightly and firmly rhythmed in the strings and colored with one of the rarest and most neglected hues nowadays on the orchestral palette—the timbres of the old high trumpet beloved of the composers of Bach and Händel's time and still possible, as Mr. Kloepfel proved, to the trumpeters of the present day. Next the bourrée with its heavier beat and finally the light vigor and the smiling tonal marriment of the gigue. Bach glorified these dance-tunes when he made suites of them for little German courts; but being a homely man himself, he kept their homely pungency.

Haydn's turn came next, with the little symphony in G major, and it spurred Dr. Muck and the orchestra to one of the rarest feats of virtuosity that they have done in many a year. Once the sharp chords of the introduction had been struck and the pretty transition into the allegro made, Dr. Muck set the swiftest, the most spirited, the springiest pace for the music. On it raced, all flying accents, kaleidoscopic phrases—now soft and insinuating and again bright and pricking—flashing little suspensions and gay little resolutions. Yet there was not a blur or a roughness upon it all. So motes—and this time it was tonal motes—dance in the sunshine. The conductor and the orchestra did the feat again in the rondo of the finale. The strings seemed even fleeter and lighter; the woodwinds flecked the music with little jets of bright tone; for an instant the return of the refrain checked the race of the music; and then it was off again, gayer, more brilliant, more various in its smile than ever before. The end was breathless. And what had not the double-basses, for example, done to hold this pace and keep the music without blur or smear. And between whiles, the orchestra had sung the largo with the grave sweetness of tone and the gentle melancholy of mood that is the voice of the music. They had sung in the long lines of its flowing arabesque, now deepening and now brightening its beauty. The 'cellos had been most expressive voices; the drum-beats had accented the emotion of the whole. The minuet had been, too, like the dancing of tones to the grace of their own rhythms. Dr. Muck had made it a spirited and simple and not a stately and sophisticated minuet. Not within long recollection has a symphony by Haydn so renewed its freshness of delight. The conductor's imagination had summoned the very spirit of the music; the virtuosity of his men had sped it.

Next in this little procession of eighteenth-century composers marched—or rather tripped—Mozart, the Mozart of the three German Dances that Dr. Muck, alone among conductors, seems to know and to cherish. They are frank dance-tunes, written for actual dancing, and they deserve the adjective of the title. Mozart has written more lightly, elegantly, fancifully; but had he composed these dances so they would have lacked their homely tang of German bonhomie and a certain stoutness of fibre and rhythm that may have matched well with the dancers. The whimsical Mozart had his little inning in the play with the queer-timbred post-horn and the tinkling sleigh-bells of the third dance. He must have smiled like the happy child he was sometimes, as he contrived these little decorations and now after a hundred-odd years, they that hear—whatever their temper or their age—smile with him—in reward of his everlasting youth.

Finally the "early Beethoven" of the second symphony—the symphony of the "heroic lie" because the music is gladsome of spirit, when the composer himself was distressed of mind and sad of heart. Yet it may have been less "lie" than relief and soothing; for as he wrote he could live in his imagination and his tones. "Early Beethoven," it is true, but a Beethoven that is already departing from his eighteenth century models by the sheer promptings of his own temper. The musical canvas is stretched wider; the design of the symphony is bigger; the "handling, as the painters say, is more vigorous and free; the feeling outspoken, even exuberant, And there are tokens of the Beethoven who was to come in the "great symphonies." The pounding, reiterated chords, the occasional bursts of tone, the long-drawn course of the slow movement, the whimsical gaiety of the scherzo, twenty details of workmanship, as many more impulses of the imagination—all foreshadow him. Not yet, however, is he a Beethoven of sustained power. Invention flags at moments in this second symphony and it stands in a dry place. Or the manly energy does not dare quite yet to mould form wholly to its will. It was the Beethoven to come of whom Dr. Muck seemed to be thinking in his "reading" of the symphony and not of the Beethoven that might still be taking thought of eighteenth-century ways. Where the conductor might, he filled the music with a kind of anticipatory eloquence of the Beethoven of maturity. Yet he did not forget that it is a gladsome almost a gay symphony, not so far from Haydn and Mozart after all though it is written with the bigger spirit of a bigger imagination. The audiences of Beethoven's young years, who knew not his future, must have heard it so.

So ran what the old vocabulary of reviewing would call a "memorable" concert—"memorable," if it did consist almost wholly of eighteenth-century music and of familiar music, "memorable" because that music lived again in its own voice and image, and "memorable" for the mingled perception and virtuosity that accomplished this re-creation. Of course, it is true that Bach, Haydn, Mozart and even Beethoven wrote for orchestras of no such dimensions as that which played their music yesterday. Of course, suite and symphonies and dances "sounded" in Symphony Hall with a sonority of which they hardly dreamed. Yet Dr. Muck so coördinated these new sonorities that all this music kept its original proportions and shadings. The image was larger but no less beautiful; the lights and the shadows were still in their true, clear relation; each accent told if more instruments were making it; the long arabesques were only the richer for the many voices that curved and swelled them. Moreover, these eighteenth-century composers loved virtuosity in those that played their music and wrote sometimes to test it—not in the "difficulties" that the twentieth century sets for much-enduring orchestras, but in feats of fleetness and suavity, of graceful ornament and delicate intonation. Yesterday, they had the virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra to do these feats, and if they heard from the Elysian Fields their hearts must have warmed within them. For their music was sounding as they wrote it, like beautiful decorations in tones upon the air, to be heard, as the eye sees similar decoration upon a wall, for the sensuous pleasure of the hearing. Yet no Bach, no Haydn, no Mozart, no Beethoven could weave such designs in tones without kindled imagination and warming emotion. It is creation, it is self-expression still. Such a performance as that of yesterday sets the spark to it and to listening ears and feeling. Maybe, in such favoring circumstance, there is fuller response nowadays to this "old music" than there was in the days when it was the matter and the manner of the musical time.

[153]

PASTE OVER

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 8,

SYMPHONY CLASSIC PROGRAM

The Friday afternoon rehearsal of the fourteenth symphony concert was conducted by Dr. Muck with the following program: J. S. Bach, suite in D major, No. 3, for orchestra; Haydn, symphony in G major; Mozart, three German dances (K. 605); Beethoven, symphony in D major, No. 2.

It would be hard to build a program with more sheer mirth and lightheartedness poured into classic molds than this. The orchestra and perhaps the conductor seemed to get more and more into the mood of the dance and thus from the rather commonplace but spirited lines of the Bach overture to the finale of the Beethoven symphony there was a steady crescendo of rhythmical elan withal in elegant turning of phrases. For all the numbers have the hallmark of elegance, even the German dances commanded by an emperor from Mozart of "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," from Mozart, who was working out his "Magic Flute," finished a few months afterward. The wholeness of the program is what remains the strongest impression, how these dreamers of fays and flowers and of humanity set free to a joyful childlikeness do verily agree together.

The Bach suite was especially full of the dance feeling for those who saw Miss Duncan's interpretation two years ago, when Walter Damrosch led the music and Miss Duncan, with flowers dropping from her hands, trod these dancing measures, the very incarnation of lilting grace and serene joyousness. The famous and exquisite air, known to all violin and 'cello players, was played at the concert with a silken finish which made every cadenced close very Bach indeed. The men were happy playing it. The gavotte is the most charming of these dance movements. Possibly it lacked here a little of the "exultant joy" which the program says a gavotte connotes and which it certainly had when Mr. Damrosch led it for Miss Duncan. On the whole these dances here interpreted made pictures rather of elegance than of joyfulness. It is hard for a musician not to take his Bach very seriously; perhaps the world has not yet caught up with Bach enough to see that he is the humanest and in a sense the homeliest of composers. The gigue, allegro vivace, could have had a shade more vivacity, in spite of the whispered comment of a music lover, "I don't care much for dance music; it is so light."

There was, however, no lack of the vivacious urge in the Haydn symphony. From start to close it was life, loveliness, very Haydn.

The Mozart dances brought smiles, and Dr. Muck was himself plainly amused at the careful shading of the sleighbells, as neatly cadenced as were the violins.

The second symphony of Beethoven was surely never better played, from the announcement of the beautiful, pure-toned first theme, the exquisite flute work in the larghetto, the interplay of the instruments in the scherzo and trio to the noble breadth and cheer of the vivid last movement.

One noted the technical finish everywhere in this performance, as, for example, toward the close of the last movement, where the sforzando reinforced by the drums is suddenly echoed pianissimo by the strings and the orchestra plays for a few bars under its breath till the rousing close bursts in. And how wonderful that this work, full of naive octave arpeggios and tripping thirds, is yet very Beethoven.

Surveying one's impressions, then, one is aware that Dr. Muck and his men, indeed, know how to give you the composer who is in hand and to take twentieth century listeners back into the simple delights of earlier musical epochs.

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 9,

DR. MUCK AGAIN GIVEN OVATION

Programme of Classic and Polyphonic Periods

BY OLIN DOWNES

The warm greeting extended to Dr. Muck when he came before his Symphony audience on Friday afternoon after his protracted illness was repeated last night, if anything with greater emphasis than on the first occasion. A programme had been constructed which offered compositions entirely of the classic and polyphonic periods—the orchestral suite in D of Bach, which includes the celebrated air known to all violinists in particular and all lovers of music in general—the Haydn symphony in G major; Three German Dances of Mozart, which Dr. Muck produced in Boston with some success when he first visited this city, and the second symphony of Beethoven. A programme eminently harmless and requiring little labor of preparation on the part of a conductor not yet wholly himself, to say nothing of the necessary preparation of a new work for next week.

The music, for at least a space, gave pleasure. The prelude of Bach's suite is not only good, virile, two-fisted stuff. It has also melodic features and a poetic close which is enhanced by the brave blasts of the trumpets which have been heard throughout the piece. The famous air which, in spite of its forbidding popularity, remains one of the finest airs in Bach, was played as it should be—with no extraneous effort, with no attempt at hyper-refinement.

The music will speak for itself, if it is let alone. The Gavottes, the Bourree, the Gigue—all these were entertaining. So was the Haydn symphony, one of Haydn's finest works in this form, the last movement of which Dr. Muck made a display piece for his orchestra. This finale may well be taken rapidly. Nothing less is permissible; but in our opinion the blood did not boil quite so fast as Dr. Muck may have persuaded many of his hearers yesterday evening and Friday afternoon; nor is the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the few organizations which can play this piece at once so rapidly and so clearly necessarily a justification of the feat. The interpretation of the work was, however, generally an admirable one, always interesting and usually in entire accordance with the spirit of the composer, who had much good red blood in his veins, and perhaps a more profound appreciation of life than some historians would have us believe.

The Mozart dances are entertaining. They are written in the customary forms and rhythms of Mozart's day. They have swing and a bright, melodic character. The sleigh bells used in the last dance are prettily effective.

If there had not been so much of this sort of thing the Beethoven symphony had been more effective. As it was, the opening movement made an especially vigorous impression. The work was brilliantly played. Next week Lendvai's Symphony, much admired by Dr. Muck, will be performed for the first time in Boston.

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 9,

LENDVAI'S SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck, now fully recovered from the illness which has so interfered with his plans, has built up for the next Symphony concert on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening a programme of most notable interest. He will play for the first time in America a symphony by Erwin Lendvai, which he announced on his arrival in Boston last fall as one of the principal novelties of the season. The work is one of great difficulty and has demanded on the part of Dr. Muck and on the part of the orchestra an unusual amount of preparation, many rehearsals for separate choirs having preceded the first rehearsal of the entire orchestra.

Not much is known of Lendvai. He is a Hungarian in his early 30's, has studied with Puccini in Italy, also has studied in Paris and Berlin and has had, from all accounts, a long and bitter fight to secure recognition. The symphony which will be played this week was performed for the first time at one of the great musical festivals in Germany last spring, and Dr. Muck, securing the score, promised Lendvai that he would give it a performance in Boston. Dr. Muck regards this symphony as one of the most important novelties of recent years, of even greater importance than the Bischoff symphony which he admires so much!

The interest in these concerts will be heightened unquestionably by the debut here of Max Pauer, the German pianist, whose performances in New York have furnished a real sensation. Pauer is the director of the Stuttgart Conservatory, and for 20 years past has been greatly esteemed in Europe as a pianist. He is a son of Ernst Pauer, the famous conductor, and is a graduate of Oxford University. He made his debut in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra last month, playing, as he will here, Mendelssohn's Concerto in C-minor. His performance re-created this composition, which of late years has been relegated to conservatory examinations. From all accounts Mr. Pauer is one of the most notable personalities among pianists that has come to America in many years.

GERMAN PIANIST WITH C

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ……………………

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Pauer, the pianist, whose debut in New York a few weeks ago has been the real sensation of the season, will make his first appearance in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening February 19. There were many things to add interest to the success of this pianist. Although he is a man in his mid-forties and has been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout Continental Europe, this is his first visit to America. Moreover, he had the boldness to choose as the vehicle of his debut Mendelssohn's Concerto in G Minor, a work which by common consent had long since been relegated to conservatory students.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date …………………… FEB 9 - 1913

Boston Symphony February 18.

The fourth and last but one of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. It will be the occasion of the first appearance here of Max Pauer, the eminent German pianist, who had such sensational success at his debut in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra and a few days later in his recital in that city. Pauer is in this country for the first time, and from all accounts he is one of the very few great pianists in the world. He will play the seldom-heard Mendelssohn "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra."

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ……………………

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Pauer, the pianist, whose debut in New York a few weeks ago has been the real sensation of the season, will make his first appearance in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening February 19. There were many things to add interest to the success of this pianist. Although he is a man in his mid-forties ~~and has~~ been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout Continental Europe, this is his first visit to America. Moreover, he had the boldness to choose as the vehicle of his debut Mendelssohn's Concerto in G Minor, a work which by common consent had long since been relegated to conservatory students.

RT
THE TORIA
FEB. 19TH.

MAX PAUER.
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA. LYRIC

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

PAUER COMES WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At its concert in the Lyric Theater on February 19 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce to Baltimore as its soloist a pianist who has had success in New York not unlike that which was the fortune of Paderewski when he came to America in 1891. What makes the success more than usually interesting is that Max Pauer, the pianist in question, is a been held in high esteem in Europe. For one reason and another he has never come to America. Musicians, of course, have known of Pauer, for his career as a virtuoso has taken him the length and breadth of Europe, and as the head of the Stuttgart Conservatory he held one of the most honorable positions in Germany.

He made his debut in New York last month with the Philharmonic Society, playing the Mendelssohn concerto, and immediately he was proclaimed a very great artist. The impression he made at his debut was more than confirmed at his recital, which followed shortly after.

Mr. Pauer will play the Mendelssohn concerto with the Boston Sympony on the 19th. The symphony will be Brahms' in D major No. 2.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date …………………… FEB 9 - 1913

schools.

* * *

Max Pauer, pianist, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 17. His debut in New York a few weeks ago with the Philharmonic Society brought forth the most enthusiastic and unqualified praise. He holds a place of high esteem in Europe, not only as a pianist but as a teacher, for he is general director of the Conservatory of Music in Stuttgart. He has played in London and throughout the Continent. In New York he chose as his concerto for his first appearance Mendelssohn's G minor, a composition long since relegated to conservatory students. But he has given it a new lease of life.

He is the son of Ernst Pauer, the famous musical pedagogue, and was born in London in 1866. Max spent his first 15 years in that city. The next four years he was in Carlsruhe studying music, his principal teacher being Vincenz Lachmer. Then Pauer returned to England and matriculated at Oxford, whence he graduated with high honors. From that time he has devoted his activity to teaching and concertizing. For 10 years he was at the head of the piano department of the Conservatory at Cologne and since 1908 has been general director of the Stuttgart Conservatory. Here he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra.

* * *

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 9 - 1913

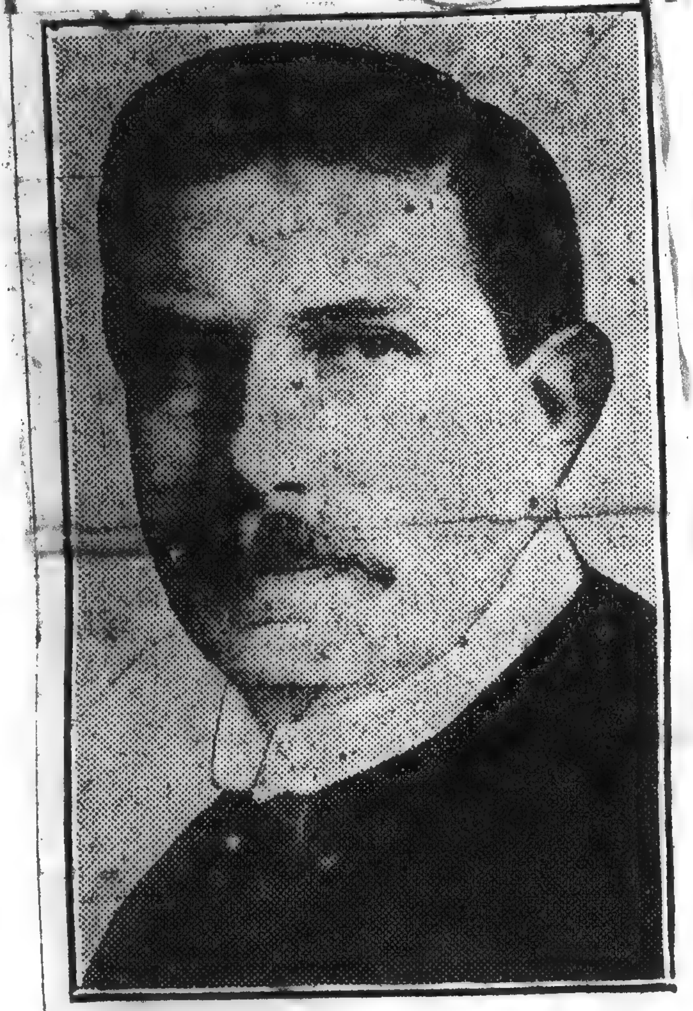
The Musical Calendar

Max Pauer, the pianist, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 17. His debut in New York a few weeks ago with the Philharmonic Society, which was followed a few days later by his first recital in Aeolian Hall, brought forth from the critics of New York the most enthusiastic and unqualified praise that has been given to a virtuoso in years.

Max Pauer and his experience in this country are another illustration of the fact that there are still great musicians in Europe of whom America knows little. Musicians, of course, have known of him for years, for he is a man in his mid-forties and holds a place of high esteem in Europe, not only as a pianist, but as a teacher, for he is general director of the famous Conservatory of Music in Stuttgart. He has played with great success in London and throughout the Continent, but America seems to have had no realization of his supreme qualities as an artist.

Moreover, as if to heighten the surprise he had in store for New York, he chose as his concerto for his first appearance Mendelssohn's in G minor, a composition long since relegated to conservatory students. He not only revived it, but he has given it unquestionably a new lease of life, for his extraordinary success with it will be sure to influence other pianists to place it in their concert repertory.

Pauer is a son of Ernst Pauer, the famous musical pedagogue. He was born in London in 1866 and spent his first fifteen years in that city. The next four years he was in Carlsruhe, studying music, his principal teacher being Vincenz Lachmer. Then he returned to England and matriculated at Oxford, whence he was graduated with high honors. From that time he has devoted his activity to teaching and concert appearances. For ten years he was at the head of the piano department of the Conservatory at Cologne, and since 1908 has been general director of the famous Stuttgart Conservatory. Here he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G Minor for piano and orchestra.



MAX PAUER,
Soloist, Boston Symphony.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Max Pauer, the pianist, whose debut in New York a few weeks ago has been the real sensation of the season, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17. There were many things to add interest to the success of this pianist. Although he is a man in his mid-forties and has been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout Continental Europe, this is his first visit to America. Moreover, he had the boldness to choose as the vehicle of his debut Mendelssohn's concerto in G-Minor, a work which by common consent has long since been relegated to conservatory students. It is significant that until Mr. Pauer plays this concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Boston next Friday it will never have been heard at a symphony concert in Boston. When he played it at his appearance with the Philharmonic Society in New York his performance came in the nature of a revelation. Pianists had come so to look on the concerto as a conservatory piece that they had forgotten its delightful melodiousness and the vast skill required to play it as it deserves. Mozart's "Jupiter" will be the symphony.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 9 - 1913

At its February concert in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, the 17th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce to Philadelphia as its soloist a pianist who has had success in New York not unlike that which was the fortune of Paderewski, when he came to America in 1891. What makes the success more than usually interesting is that Max Pauer, the pianist in question, is a man in his mid-forties, who has long been held in high esteem in Europe. For one reason and another he has never come to America. Musicians, of course, have known of Pauer, for his career as a virtuoso has taken him the length and breadth of Europe, and as the head of the Stuttgart Conservatory he held one of the most honorable positions in Germany.

Pauer made his debut in New York last month with the Philharmonic Orchestra, playing the Mendelssohn Concerto, and immediately he was proclaimed a very great artist. The impression he made at his debut was more than confirmed at his recital which followed shortly after. The mere fact that a great pianist was bold enough to resurrect the Mendelssohn G-Minor Concerto excited interest in the beginning, for this work seems of late years to have been relegated to the conservatory. He not only resurrected it, but he gave it new life, and we may expect in the future to see it frequently on concert programs. Pauer will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The symphony will be Mozart's immortal "Jupiter."

MAX PAUER.
Soloist
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ACADEMY of MUSIC.
Feb. 17 1913

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 14, 1913

Dr. Muck's Plans

DR. MUCK has ordered his programmes for the Symphony Concerts for a month to come and they promise much interesting music. Next week he and the orchestra will be making their monthly journey to New York and cities further southward. At the first pair of concerts after their return—on Feb. 28 and March 1 —Dr. Muck will revive Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea," unheard here since he produced them during his first term in Boston. The full programme for these concerts is:

Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea" .... Debussy
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" ...... Dukas
Indian Suite .... MacDowell
Overture, "In the Spring" .... Goldmark

At the succeeding pair of concerts on March 7 and 8, Mr. Ysaye, the violinist, will be "the assisting artist," and he will play two pieces—an eighteenth-century concerto by Vivaldi and Saint-Saëns's familiar concerto in B minor. Sinding's symphony in D minor withdrawn a few weeks ago on account of Dr. Muck's illness, will begin these concerts and Mr. Loeffler's "Devil's Round" will stand between the two concertos.

On the afternoon of Sunday, March 9, comes the second of the two annual concerts for the Pension Fund of the orchestra and here is the programme for it, with Dr. Muck, of course, conducting:

Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl .... Wagner
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" .... Strauss
Symphony in B minor ("The Pathetic").
Tschaikowsky

Finally, at the concerts of March 14 and 15, Dr. Muck will play for the first times here, the noted—or the notorious—symphonic burletta, "Max and Moritz," suggested by the comic figures of drawings and verses in "Der Fliegende Blätter." The piece is the outstanding item in this programme:

Symphoni[illegible] .... Mracek
Mephisto Waltz .... Liszt
Italian Impressions .... Charpentier

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1913

DR. MUCK GIVES NEW SYMPHONY

Lendvai's Work Played for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

Erwin Lendvai's Symphony in D major was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, for the first time in America. The other items of the programme of the 15th public rehearsal of the season were Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and Mendelssohn's G minor piano concerto, played by Max Pauer, who then made his first appearance as a virtuoso in Boston.

Over all this music, the "Faust" overture of Wagner loomed large, so that it dwarfed everything else on the programme. On the one hand, there was Lendvai's smyphony, prepared with the greatest care by Dr. Muck, and given a superb performance by him—a work of modern texture—but, at a first hearing, of doubtful value; and on the other hand there was the superficially brilliant overture of Dvorak and Mendelssohn's concerto, which no pianist has had the courage to reintroduce at the Symphony concerts in many, many years. Mr. Pauer justified his choice by his performance, but of that more anon.

Lendvai's name is unknown to American music lovers, or was unknown, until yesterday. He is a native of Budapest, Hungary; he is now in his 31st year. His early studies in composition were pursued under the guidance of Puccini—a somewhat strange precedent for a symphonic writer. But Lendvai was also a pupil of Hans Koessler at the Music Academy at Budapest. His compositions include some songs, chamber music, pieces for various solo instruments, a choral suite for female voices, "Nippon," the symphony heard yesterday, which is presumably his most ambitious work.

Almost a Free Rhapsody

This symphony is not in the classical form. It is almost a free rhapsody, built upon the basis of a chief theme served up in all possible guises. It is not, of course, possible to make an accurate estimate of the merits of a work at a first hearing. Nor is this, probably, ever possible. The music heard today, disliked tomorrow, may again come into favor when tomorrow has passed. This article does not deal with tomorrow or the ultimate worth of the symphony. It is concerned with the passing impressions of a reviewer, who is supposed to exercise but ordinary frankness and prudence in putting his impressions into print.

The symphony, then, did not make a convincing impression upon this reviewer at a first hearing. The opening movement seemed the strongest on account of the impressive statement of its broad, diatonic theme and its condensed proportions. This movement is concise, with telling contrasts, and containing only ideas that are evidently offshoots of the main melodic thought. There is at the end a sonorous resumption of the main theme.

One Beautiful Phase

Movement II. commences somewhat in the orchestral manner of Franck. There is no "programme" for the work, but it is easy to preceive that, like all other musical compositions, this symphony has its genesis in some mental state of the composer. At first the mood is mystical, the instrumentation simple, dark, quiet, enhancing the mood; but this mood changes, and as it changes the composer appears to have lost somewhat the thread of his ideas. But there are here a half dozen bars worth their weight in gold. I refer to the sudden, sensuous glow of a phase that has been heard before, played upon the strings, surging richly over an accompaniment given to the harp and some wind instruments.

The third movement is fragmentary, and so is the last. The last movement is flattest of all. There is no great theme to sustain the structure, to furnish its beams and arches, as it were; there is a succession of violent iterations of certain chords, sequences, harmonic progressions, which does not enthuse the hearer.

Work of an Honest Man

The symphony is instrumentated in a very modern and effective manner. It is a profoundly serious work, the work of an honest man, who may have much to say, but to us the contents of this score are rather intellectual than grandly emotional, in spite of the evident aspiration toward exalted and austere expression. And one is hardly sure of the composer. There is a tendency to indulge in orchestral tricks for their own sake, which would be in place if they had back of them the flaming temperament, the inevitable logic, that such effects assume, for instance, in the music of Strauss. Finally, and in spite of the cyclic manner of using one theme to bind movements together, there is little appreciable continuity of thought, little of the glorious flowering of theme from theme, branch from trunk, which is the great distinguishing mark of the truly symphonic style and which makes for greatness and durability in a work of art.

There was certain obstinate applause, so that Dr. Muck returned three times. Is it stating the matter unfairly to say that this applause was for Dr. Muck and his admirable performance, rather than for the work itself?

Played as Composer Desired

Mr. Pauer is the most daring pianist of modern times. He has done a decidedly original thing, for not the greatest poseur among all virtuosi—and Mr. Pauer is anything but a poseur—would have dared to bring the old Mendelssohn concerto before a Symphony audience of today. The piece was worth hearing on account of its form and on account of a performance which will probably never be duplicated unless Mr. Pauer is the performer. Fortunately, he did not "interpret" the music in the abused modern sense of that word; he played the old piece as the composer himself would have desired it performed, and making no pretence to heighten its coloring, to distort it into a work of make-believe significance; playing only the music that had been written, and playing it in so simple, old-styled music of a manner that the music for the moment regained its grace and the roses that had faded from its cheeks.

Posterity must always deplore the fact that Wagner never completed that Faust symphony of which the Faust overture originally composed the first movement! Only Wagner has shown his fitness for the musical treatment of this subject. As a boy of 27 he sketched out the Faust overture. Fifteen years later he remodelled the work. Hence we perceive in its pages the composer of The Flying Dutchman equally with the creator of Tristan and Isolde. And it will be a long day before this piece, these soul-struggles, these fitful reveries, the thought of salvation in love, the hint of the mocking Mefistofeles, are set forth so subtly, with such incomprehensible maste[illegible] for all the world.

ADVERTISER,

FEBRUARY 15,

BOSTON HEARS A NEW SYMPHONY

LENDVAI'S WORK IS BRILLIANTLY CONSTRUCTED

Young Hungarian Composer Has Succeeded in Scoring Work in a Manner That Rivals Richard Strauss.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Erwin Lendvai—Symphony in D major. (First time in America.)
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mendelssohn—Piano Concerto in G minor.
Soloist, Mr. Max Pauer.
Dvorak—"Carnaval" overture.

Musical giants in the domain of wonderful orchestration are springing up on every hand. Erwin Lendvai (a Hungarian, 31 years old) has not yet attained the honor of entering the musical biographical dictionaries; the new Grove's dictionary and Riemann both ignore him, yet here he is with a symphony that is almost as effective as those of Mahler or Bischoff, and is scored in a manner that rivals Richard Strauss. Here is its pretty little orchestra! —piccolo, flutes, three oboes, English horn, D clarinette, clarinettes, bass clarinette, bassoons, contrabassoon, horns, trumpets, basstrumpet, trombones, basstuba, kettledrums, drums, bassdrum, glockenspiel, triangle, cymbals, gong, harp, organ and the usual strings. And a good part of the time Lendvai keeps his whole assemblage working! He has also a manner of playing his trump cards first, and beginning a movement with unusual instruments. Thus he starts his symphony with harp and organ alone, bass clarinette following soon after, ond he begins his finale with bassoons and contrabassoon unsupported.

In spite of his overwhelming score Lendvai is not ugly in his themes, and at times is mellifluous. He develops his themes logically and writes in a comprehensible form. The chief fault to be found is that, like Mahler, he gives dramatic episodes that must have a meaning, abrupt pauses, sudden and ferocious crescendoes, that ought to have a "raison d'etre," and he gives no explanation of them. It is programme music with the programme, the story, left out. He is not very prolix in his work, although quite long enough to give all that he has to say. His work is not as difficult as that of Strauss or Bischoff.

In his scoring he adopts the ultra-modern plan with his wood-wind instruments, not often using them as a regular quartette,—flutes—soprano, oboes—alto, clarinettes—tenor, and bassoons—bass, but grouping them in families (generally groups of three) according to their tone-quality, three clarinettes, for single reeds, Oboe, English horn and bassoon, for double reeds. The harp he uses mercilessly, but our Mr. Schuecker is veteran enough not to be overthrown by any technical difficulties, and this part was splendidly played yesterday afternoon. The organ is used more continuously than in any modern orchestral work that we remember. It is very effective and fitting in the opening Andante Religioso, and in the finale. The solo violin passages in the first movement are striking and there are many melodious phrases, although they are sometimes fragmentary. There is a certain loftiness noticeable, particularly when the 6-4 rhythm enters, and [illegible] gentle and celestial touches leading to a very soft but ecstatic ending.

The second movement, "con moto," has a mysterious beginning on wind instruments, with violas and violoncellos furnishing a figurated accompaniment of considerable difficulty. This leads up to a sudden crash of the whole mighty orchestra. Again [illegible] mysterious soft phrase and the [illegible] anxious fore- [illegible] an overwhelming crash, followed by a long pause. What particular calamity this tells of, we have no means of knowing. We cannot believe that orchestral music was intended to be so mystifying as this. After this cataclysm we are in the con moto again, but now with a difference. Tempestous scales, on strings and wood-wind combined, lead to a culminating, very rapid, crescendo, which, in the course of five quick measures, leads from "pp" to "sfffz," a crash that will probably be registered in the seismatic office at Washington as "a strong earthquake shock somewhere within 500 miles." With this explosion the movement ends.

We have not fully described the melodramatic pauses, the difficult work of the strings, the strange pizzicato in fortissimo, on all the strings together; suffice it to say that our splendid string orchestra, for once, was taxed to its utmost, and came bravely through the ordeal.

And now, at the third movement, there comes a sudden change. At last we are landed in a sort of melancholy peace and a moderate score. The horn, excellently played, gives a tranquil theme against a simple figure upon the muted strings. The contrabasses are absent from this mournful passage, but not for long. The harp here is constantly in evidence against a soft shuddering of all the strings. Even the contrabasses shiver. Here we emphatically believe that the auditor has a right to know what the trouble is.

With all this intricacy of scoring there is a simplicity of some of the progressions that appeals even to the non-musician. Runs of thirds and sixths are plentiful, and the harp effects are celestial in almost every part of this movement. The Andante Misterioso, which forms part of it, is very striking. An English horn melody is supported by organ, harp, and four solo violins ("divisi"), while contrabasses and violoncellos give a strange, slow, diatonic figure in pizzicato. The movement comes to a peaceful, scarcely audible, ending. This third movement is the most attractive part of the symphony, and won considerable applause.

The finale begins oddly, with bassoons and contrabassoon unsupported, and at once deals in the mysterious pauses which seem to be a trademark with Lendvai. Hitherto there has not been much jugglery of rhythms in the modern vein (which makes the movements less difficult than many other large scores), but now there is considerable of it. The strings are divided in a manner almost rivalling Wagner's "Waldesweben." There is a mingling of three-quarter and four-quarter effects in a striking manner, resolutely martial in style, with the entire orchestra working. It is almost impossible to grasp the full meaning of this finale even with a study of the score. Of course, being an ultra-modern work it ends with the most powerful crash that can be managed, a crisp chord sounded "sforzandissississimo" ("sfffz") with all the vigor that nearly a hundred able-bodied men could give to it. The audience was stunned, but recovered in time to applaud, and the labor expended upon this work by conductor and men certainly deserved it. But music is going upon a strange path in these days. Tremendous skill is taking the place of great ideas. We believe that it was Herbert Spencer who said, not so very long ago,—"music is going beyond the physical possibility of the brain to comprehend it!" This is a true indictment, and these very spasmodic and fragmentary exhibitions of orchestration are a clear evidence of it. But Dr. Muck was recalled at the end of the work, the orchestra was obliged to rise, and the labor that had been expended on the task was abundantly recognized by the public.

It might have been sarcasm, but it was merely a happy accident, which caused Max Pauer, the classical pianist, to come into juxtaposition with this modern score with Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto. Melody, symmetry, intelligibility, these were in every measure of this work, which most modern artists have relegated to the advanced classes of the Conservatories. But from the entrance of that dashing octave scale figure in the eighth measure one felt that this was to be something far beyond the general estimate of this concerto. The dialogues between soloist and orchestra, in this first movement, were excellently balanced, and the fanfare leading into the Andante was brilliant. The manner in which Mr. Pauer embroidered his embellishments around the melody in the cellos and violas, in this Andante, was most beautiful, and we do not despise it because it was very tuneful. In the Finale the playing of the figure in broken chords, the subordinate theme, was the acme of delicacy. Again the antiphonal work between the piano and orchestra was an ensemble to be long remembered, and the return of the figures of the first movement was perfectly brought out. Mr. Pauer's playing was beyond criticism.

This concerto was written in the days when music was meant to be enjoyed, and Mendelssohn hated ugliness in art as he hated it in life. What wonder that the audience enjoyed it! They did not ask if it was the acme of difficulty, or if it conveyed some occult meaning, but they revelled in the tunes, their artistic presentation, their counterpoint, and their general elaboration. One feels grateful to Mr. Pauer for having courage to go back to Mendelssohn, whom foolish people imagine to be a sort of musical kindergarten. He made the concerto more virile than we have ever heard it, and he was recalled over and over again with the greatest enthusiasm. It proved that one school of music does not abolish another, and that Mendelssohn is still very much alive in these days of Strauss, Reger & Co.

These two important works (both practically new to the concert-platform) have deserved all our space today. The reader may take it on faith that the rather too heavy "Faust overture" and the rather too light "Carnival overture," were well played, but the fragmentary "Faust" coming after the fragmentary Lendvai, was a "wasteful and ridiculous excess."

BOSTON AMERICAN-

FEBRUARY 15, 1913.

WEINGARTNER GIVES PRAISE TO SYMPHONY.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The most competent critic in the whole world sat in judgment upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon and found it good.

It was Felix Weingartner, the conductor of the opera, a man whose reputation as a critic and a pamphleteer is almost as great as his fame as a conductor and composer. Weingartner occupied a seat in the centre of the hall and remained through the concert. He said later:

> It was my first chance to attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which I have heard so much in Europe. I was most tremendously impressed. It is a superb, glorious orchestra. It is one of the very greatest orchestras that I have ever heard. The beauty of the strings, the grandeur of the brasses, the fineness of the wood winds, all have made their impression upon me, and how that band can play. I was entranced. Dr. Muck is a fortunate man to have under his control such a glorious instrument.
>
> Dr. Muck and myself are old acquaintances. For some years we were conductors together in the Berlin Opera. I have heard him often in the past and it was a pleasure to attend one of his concerts again.
>
> I have a good orchestra at the opera. It is not, of course this, (with a sweep to include the Symphony), but it is a very good opera house orchestra and it improves all the time.
>
> The Symphony Hall is very splendid. It is admirably adapted for music of this sort. The acoustics, to me, seem very good, although I have not had time to study them. It has been a great pleasure to me to attend the concert.
>
> I have a deep admiration for Boston, which maintains institutions like this. I like the city as a place to live in, also. I am come to love America. I wish it were not so far from Europe, for in the Winter time the ocean is very rough and I am so seasick. Yet I think maybe I shall come back again next year.

The Symphony yesterday was Lendvai's Symphony in D major, performed for the first time in America. The soloist was Max Pauer, the pianist who is creating a sensation in this country. Pauer enjoys a great reputation abroad, is middle aged, but is making his first visit to America. He is a man of prodigious technique and splendid interpretive intelligence.

He played the Mendelssohn concerto in G minor, which had never before been played at these concerts. The reason was evident. It was bristling with difficulties that yet did not show, and is not to be compared for effectiveness with other Mendelssohn concertos. Pauer's performance was brilliant and worthy of the enthusiasm it provoked.

The Lendvai Symphony is rather attractive. It is full of unusual and original color, fine melody and brilliant effects. The second movement is especially fine music. The finals was least meritorious. It was horribly gruff.

BOSTON HERALD,

FEBRUARY 15,

PAUER PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Shows Fluency and Agreeable Touch in Vapid Mendelssohn Concerto.

FIRST APPEARANCE HERE

Lendvai's New Symphony Given American Premier Proves Disappointing.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Max Pauer, the pianist, played for the first time in Boston. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, op. 10......Lendvai
A "Faust" overture..............Wagner
Concerto No. 1, G major, for piano, op. 25..............Mendelssohn
"Carnival" overture..............Dvorak

Lendvai's symphony was performed for the first time in this country. The composer, born at Budapest, and now in his 31st year, was a pupil of Hans Koessler, and studied for a time with Puccini in Milan. The symphony was produced at Bonn, in November, 1909. A revised version was performed at Dantzic in 1912.

We know Koessler in Boston by a tedious set of orchestral variations, performed here 11 years ago, in which the composer endeavored to portray in music his first meeting with Johannes Brahms in Hungary, Brahms as a friend, Brahms as a lover of children, Brahms as a friend of nature and a humorist, and the example given by Brahms for emulation. Any man that would attempt to do all this in music is evidently not a safe teacher of the young.

When this symphony was first brought out the four movements bore titles: "Invocation," "Fantasie," "Naenie," "Bachanal." "Naenie," as Brahms's composition of the same name for chorus and orchestra, was inspired by Schiller's poem. We are informed that there was a descriptive program note for the audience at Bonn, but in the published score the movements are not entitled and there is no hint at a program. The symphony is unusual in this: the first movement is an Andante Religioso, and after the lively second movement, there is another "slow" movement.

The music as a whole is disappointing. No one of the movements has a decided outline, nor is there any example of vived impressionism. The structure of the first movement is shadowy and in no one of the three that follow is there a firm and substantial design. The vein of melodic invention is not rich. The chief motives seldom have a decided profile, nor is there the pleasing vagueness due to charming coloring and subtle hints and suggestions. The instrumentation, as a rule, is drab, clumsy, monotonous. The third movement is the one least open to this reproach, as it has certain pages colored in an original and interesting manner, so that there is a poetic impression.

There are a few effective climaxes in which the organ is an important factor. Lendvai unfortunately overworks the sonorous climax followed immediately by a piano or pianissimo effect. Mr. Robert Mueller-Hartmann, in an analysis of the symphony, says that Lendvai in his Finale is "grotesquely comical"; that there are rhythmic surprises; and he speaks of wit and humor characterizing the movement. The rhythmic surprises seem forced. As for wit and humor, the Finale is about as amusing as a railway accident. Everything seems labored, manufactured. There is little suggestion of unconfined joy and bacchanalian spirit.

The difficulties in performance—taxing entrances and rhythmic changes—are great. The symphony was well played, as was Wagner's overture after the opening, in which the phrase for the bass tuba was not clearly defined. The virtuoso qualities of the orchestra were more fully displayed in the brilliant performance of Dvorak's "Carnival."

Mendelssohn's concerto was heard for the first time at these concerts—once in 32 seasons. J. L. Hatton was the first to play it here, in 1848. After that it was played in orchestral concerts—Theodore Thomas's, and concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, by several pianists, of whom Anna Mehlig was probably the most celebrated. No doubt the fact that the concerto was a favorite piece of pedagogues, and was often heard at graduation exercises, deterred some pianists from including it in their repertoire. The wonder is that Mr. Pauer should have wished to appear in New York and Boston as a player of this vapid concerto with its insignificant first movement, its sentimental Andante and its tinkling rondo.

For Mr. Pauer is a pianist of high and indisputable attainments. He played with amazing fluency. His touch was agreeable. The delicate and rapid passages were distinct and crystalline. His phrasing was tasteful and elegant and in the Andante he did his best to save the music from the reproach of watery-eyed sentimentalism. The concerto, superficial in its sentiment and glitter, gave no opportunity of judging him as an emotional interpreter.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 28-March 1, will be as follows: Debussy, "La Mer"; Dukas "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; MacDowell, "Indian" suite; Goldmark, overture "In the Spring."

GLOBE

FEBRUARY 15,

NEW SYMPHONY BY LENDVAI IS PLAYED

Work of Striking Effects in Rhythm and Color.

Max Pauer Reveals Graceful Style in Mendelssohn Concerto.

The Symphony rehearsal was the 15th of the season. Erwin Lendvai's symphony in D major, op 10, was played for the first time in America. Max Pauer, the pianist, now director of the Stuttgart (Ger) Conservatory, made his first appearance in Boston, playing Mendelssohn's concerto No. 1 (G minor), which was heard for the first time at these concerts.

The new symphony is interesting for its daring individuality in form, its striking emotional contrasts, which at times approach incoherence, and for its vitality in rhythm and color, rather than for sustained loftiness of thought. Mr Pauer imparted distinction to a superficial and saccharine work by a pianism that for lightness, fleetness, and the grace of a duly artificial elegance, provided a rare and exquisite pleasure.

Lendvai is now in his 30th year. The plangent note of passion is still at times his master. At 31 Mozart had written such beautifully proportioned works as "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," but here was a creative mind of wondrous clearness of perspective. Few at that age will yet repeat in a mellow voice Wordsworth's lines of "the later years when these wild ecstasies have been matured into a sober pleasure." Here is a work apparently born out of various and opposing phases of experience. For the greater part it is the voice of youth that speaks. There is no fixed program.

Three moods appear as though contending for the mastery. At times they assume the definite profile of a personality. There is an impassioned spirit of conflict, reckless, inevitable, rebellious and elemental; sweeping to the summits of mighty climaxes that yawn over a sheer precipice of silence or of reflection.

Then there is the spirit of mysticism, a latent hungering to peer beyond the veil of the known. Sometimes it appeared just at this peak of the summit, and led the way back to tranquility and introspection. The third movement begins in the atmosphere of the cathedral. The first theme is in a minor scale with a flatted seventh, and there are modal harmonies. The composer is fond of a diatonic passage of chords, wherein he has so doubled his voices in the strings that they radiate a light as of mystery. In the last movement they are heard for a moment and are justled rudely by the recurring mood of the hero, the adventurer, the aspirant in a material world.

Lendvai has not permitted the hearer to forget furthermore that Hungarian blood flows in his veins. The Magyar's sense of resilient rhythm is his. There is a theme exposed in the second movement and developed in the last which is unescapable in its rhythmic vitality. The formula is that of an accented note leading into one of half its value, sometimes an interval below, sometimes a half-step above. With Dr Muck's accentuation it has character and appeal.

There are other themes, as that announced by the horns at the beginning of the third movement, that have strong rhythmic identity. Generally speaking, the development is disappointing.

This is true of the principal subject of the first movement, long, songful in character, announced by the graver voiced instruments—bass clarinet, 'celli and basses—and somewhat similar in character to the theme of the father in the opera "Louise." The composer has not restricted his invention by the demands of form, for the majestic return of this theme resembles a coda rather than the expected recapitulation. There is another sign of bold originality.

The composer has used dissonance with a daring hand. He makes a whole chord an embellishment to another, even when it sets two hostile tonalities clashing, as when he makes the organ, over a pedal in D, play a crashing chord in C sharp major, resolving, after a hair-lifting instant, to the tonic. There are other instances of biting harmonies, although it cannot be said that they are used purely for bizarre effect, or merely to incite nervous stimuli. With a less imaginative conductor than Dr Muck in anticipating their resolutions the result might be crass and brutal, and it is not strange that performances of the work in Berlin and Danzig, where the preparation probably was less careful, elicited adverse criticism.

There is considerable skill in the use of color, as in the passages for solo violin, and in the mysterious and sustained chord in the organ after an imposing climax, a sharp contrast. On the other hand the stroke of the small bell at the first of each measure of the English horn solo in the third movement is not fortunate. The harp or the higher tones of the violin might have given the effect more happily.

Not the least virtue of the work is the fact that it runs about 35 minutes as played yesterday. A modern symphony requiring less than an hour is worthy of great respect. The last movement is scrappy in construction, but there are beautiful pages in the third, and others in the first and second that prompt a desire for a second hearing. Dr Muck has rehearsed the music with Mr Pauer played in the vein as an interpreter of Mendelssohn and yet raised his individuality and authority as an artist above the plane of the composer and the concerto. The beauty of tone, the true limpidity of scale passages, the exquisite graduation of nuances, the clarity, sense of proportion and the finesse in style were all most admirable. The finale was played with great brilliance. How faithfully it has served girl graduates of boarding schools these many years, and how fitting its reward yesterday. The pianist was given an ovation.

Wagner's "Faust" overture was played with a fine sense of its character and with great beauty. Dvorak's Carnival overture closed the program.

JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 15,

IS SUCCESSOR TO PADEREWSKI

Max Pauer Makes Boston Debut at Symphony Matinees.

ACCORDED OVATION

Lendvai's Symphony in D Major Proves a Disappointment. Muck Conducts.

By E. F. Harkins.

"Paderewski's successor," Max Pauer, made his Boston debut yesterday at the Symphony matinee, winning a well-earned ovation and prompting the question why this great, mature, almost middle-aged artist was not introduced to Bostonians long ago. And the most remarkable thing of all is that this most polished of the German pianists scored a brilliant and popular cussess with a Mendelssohn concerto (No. 1) that was never before thought worthy of a place on a Symphony program.

Who is this giant who has sprung full-fledged into the American musical world? He is the son of Ernst Pauer, composer, conductor, pianist, editor, teacher, one of the most studious musicians of the last century; and Max was born while his father was living in London. After studying abroad he returned to London for a time, making that city his headquarters while he went on concert tours; but he interrupted his career as a virtuoso to take a position as teacher of piano in Cologne.

Won High Reputation

There he won a "high reputation as a pianist," but though he is only a few years younger than Paderewski he was allowed up to this season to rusticate in Cologne and Stuttgart. He did not blossom forth as a pianist of international distinction until a short time ago. Last month he made his American debut with the Philharmonic Orchestra in New York, playing this same Mendelssohn concerto in G minor, but since then he has revealed the deeper side of his art in recitals and concerts and has everywhere been hailed as one of the most impressive pianists of the day.

Warm applause greeted him when he stepped to the piano yesterday. He was sure then of a friendly audience, one that was pleased to welcome a man of such splendid attainments. It is safe to say that not more than a dozen persons in the audience had ever seen this very tall, shambling, kind-faced, unaffected man before. Dr. Muck himself never met him until this week. But before the performance of the concerto was over Pauer had everyone saying how splendid he was, how ravishing his cantabile showed itself, how sparkling his runs, how masterly his technique and romantic his feeling.

Less distinguished pianists have dubbed this Mendelssohn concerto old-fashioned—mere froth or piffle. Mr. Pauer, who is not only a virtuoso, but a profound student of piano music, makes so bold as to call the work beautiful. He chose it for his most important appearances in this country because, "first, it is beautiful; second, it is unhackneyed; third, it is too much neglected." He protests that the neglect of such "fine compositions" arouses a strong feeling of artistic revolt in him: yet he loves Reger and Richard Strauss.

Besides his irreproachable technique, which recalled the sparkling style of Professor Godowski, another famous teacher-virtuoso, who played at the Symphony concerts earlier in the season, Mr. Pauer displayed a poetic feeling that graced the andante movement of the concerto. Under his hands the revival of this Mendelssohn work as a public concert piece seems well worth while. But, like so many other works of the kind, it requires a superior grade of [illegible]

Charms Audience

Such feeling this blond giant exhibited yesterday to crowd his glittering technical equipment and charm an audience into applauding him until he returned to the stage half a dozen times.

The other much advertised feature of the program, Erwin Lendvai's symphony in D-major, which is new to America, was disappointing—a very rich setting for quite uninspired themes. The frequent dramatic climaxes remind the hearer of Lendvai's teacher, Puccini, but the young Hungarian composer displays indisputable talent in his mixing of orchestral colors. His bent seems decidedly operatic. The symphony, which aroused only moderate applause yesterday, might improve upon acquantance. It takes only half an hour to perform and is the first number on the program.

Wagner's "Faust Overture," which discloses the early development of true genius, and Dvorak's "Carnival Overture," are also on the program.

Dr. Muck's conducting throughout the concert was a model of grace and sympathy.

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 15,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LENDVAI'S NEW AND SINGULAR SYMPHONY

Music of Unmistakable Imagination and Individuality, Rhapsodic and Assimilated in Form, of a Strange Soft Tonal Texture and of Mystical and Fervent Mood—The Outstanding Singularities—A Large Pianist and a Small Concerto—Two Romantic Overtures, Besides

TO a strange new opera succeeds a strange new symphony. Zandonai's "Conchita" was produced at the Metropolitan, last Tuesday, and it seemed a very singular music-drama. Lendvai's symphony was produced at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and it seemed a very singular symphony. In one superficial respect, indeed, it proved most singular. Lendvai is a young composer obviously sensitive to the symphonic fashions of his time. One of them, in symphony or tone-poem, is length. A new orchestral piece "of large dimensions" that continues for less than an hour has become almost unthinkable. Yet in thirty-five minutes Lendvai has said in this symphony all that he had to say. He is as brief as Brahms, though otherwise he has not the smallest kinship with the elder composer. Some of his hearers, in fact, accustomed to the long-breathed modes of the hour, believed a movement hardly begun when it was drawing to its end. Lendvai's brevity, at least, will commend him to a nervous generation.

Lendvai the Modernist

In other attributes, Lendvai, so far as his music and a single hearing of it disclosed him, is a thorough-going modernist. Like most of his generation he cannot or he will not invent intrinsically beautiful or strikingly emotional melodic thoughts. His themes exist less for themselves than for the play of his imagination upon them. On the other hand, the chief melody of the symphony is as long-breathed as though Mahler had shaped it. He derives subsidiary motives from it, but his liking for brevity seems to check any tendency in him to worry scraps of them in purely cerebral music as many a young and old composer of our generation likes to do. Lendvai is an arch-modernist in his reliance upon rhythm as an expressive and diversifying means and in his ingenuity and imagination with it. Half the difficulty in the arduous preparation of the piece must have lain in the constant and abrupt changes of rhythm and counter-rhythm curiously interwoven. Lendvai is modernist also in the range and freedom, the imagination and the individuality of his harmony. He does not reap imitatively where others have sown daringly; but he is familiar with the harmonic progress of the last twenty years that has widened and deepened so variously the expressive range of music. He has individuality and imagination in his harmonic backgrounds and no little resource with them. He is capable of harmonies so delicate and tingling that Debussy might have spun them; and he can be as stout-voiced and rich harmonically as any contemporary German. Fearing no harmony, he fears no dissonance either. When his imaginative purpose demands a biting progression or a jangling juxtaposition, he is not timid with it. He can lay unrelated chords beside each other that rasp—and also thrill.

The Soft Coloring

Above all, Lendvai is a modernist in his imagination with instrumental coloring and his dependence upon it to pleasure listening ears and stir waiting emotions. His symphony calls for no unusual instruments, unless it is in his frequent use of the organ throughout it. He does not load down his orchestra with sounding brass or multiform wood-winds. His reliance, rather, is upon his imagination with his timbres plus those that the organ newly affords him. He has searched out its secrets of color and he is curiously sensitive to the voice of the harp isolated or in unexpected and fanciful contrast or combination. In one respect, however, Lendvai's instrumental imagination is very individual. It spurs him oftener to the softer, the more delicate, the more evanescent timbres of his orchestra than to its biting and flashing tints. Sometimes, as in his climaxes, he would write a stout-bodied and full-voiced music. He can make also his abrupt and [illegible]

[157]

The Rhapsodic Form

As impressive and indicative of an individual imagination is another singularity of the symphony—Lendvai's treatment of the symphonic form. No one in these days cares to be orthodox with it—unless he is doing a tour de force that shall make the audience "sit up" by its feigned renunciation of freedom. But even liberty has its formulas and one of them with the emancipated symphony is the unifying of it, in the relation of the melodic thoughts and the development of them, by a more or less "literary" programme, pictorial, psychological dramatic. This is a favorite German formula. Another, more in vogue in France, prescribes the cyclic use and development of themes to give this unity of body and imagination. Lendvai, seemingly, has almost discovered a new formula or what, of course, will soon be one. At bottom, his symphony is very like a free rhapsody, conditioned as to form only by the moods that it would express and the necessities of musical structure and continuity. He begins, for example, with a slow movement, Andante Religioso; he continues with one of livelier mood and voice; he passes in the third movement into mystical vein and the exquisite softness of tone and texture already noted; the finale is bolder, but in spirit, at least, it approximates much more a symphonic scherzo than a symphonic finale.

All this is far enough from the orthodox or even the emancipated sequence of moods and movements. It suggests, instead, the fitful course of rhapsodic imagination and impulse making the symphonic form—or what passes for it—obey their promptings. Within each movement, the course and the development of the melodic thoughts are as free and moody, impulsive and rhapsodic. Imagination and expressive purpose, and not formal prescription, seem to condition most that they contain. And yet with all this rhapsodic intent and outcome, Lendvai has a curious skill in suggesting the other symphonic procedures of the hour, as though he had assimilated them and fused them into his individual purpose. The persistence of a certain motive, unmistakably set forth at the beginning and recurring throughout the symphony, suggests that he knows the "cyclic" form. Originally, each movement of the symphony had a descriptive label and there were other hints of a "programme." Evidently Lendvai understands the "programmatic" formula. Finally, with all his rhapsodizing, he sometimes shapes the course of it so that orthodox ears will hear it with a pleasant sense of the old way. Formally, the symphony is a very singular adaptation of many procedures into individual rhapsodic design. The quiet ardor of Lendvai's imagination and his superlative technical skill melt them all into his imaginative purpose.

The Emotioned Impression

These singular procedures are quite enough to interest those who choose to hear symphonic music as intellectual sensation imparted by mental process. They need not doubt for a moment that Lendvai's symphony has "intellectual qualities," though they do happen to lead him far from the orthodox paths. Music, however, happens to be also the most emotional of the arts, with beauty, albeit of many kinds, as its goal, seeking to kindle listening imaginations, quicken feelings, transport attentive and responsive spirits. Processes or no processes, herein lies the final test of Lendvai's symphony. Unmistakably at many moments, and most frequently in the mystical third movement, the suffused or the melting tonal colors, the rare softness of the tonal texture, give the music a strange and fascinating beauty that seemed almost wholly new to some ears that heard it yesterday. Unmistakably the incessant and expressive rhythmic life of music makes it quicken the listening spirit. Unmistakably yet again, some of Lendvai's moods do stir answering emotions in the hearer and in the mystic movement almost transport his spirit.

Call the first movement "Invocation" as the original label ran or be content only with the marking "Andante Religioso." Either matters little. For a deep intensity of grave feeling speaks penetratingly through the music. The composer goes forth in it as one who would mount to spiritual heights so deep and aspiring are the fervors within him. When they speak sonorously, they move the hearer less than when they speak in lower intensities of still vision. Pursuing the heights, he halts first on the cliffs of fantasy. From this world spring the livelier, the more brightly colored tonal sensations of the second movement. It is imaginative music, rhapsodic music. It interests, stirs, but does not quite enkindle. In the third movement, the music is as though the composer had almost attained the heights he sought. He sees them veiled in a beauty, spiritual, ineffable. Not a little of this beauty has passed into the tones by which he would transmit his vision. They do transport the impart his vision. They do transport the singular ecstatic glow, half sensuous and half spiritual. They are a strange and rare music of deep rapture.

Being a rhapsodic symphony, Lendvai's might well have ended here. As it is, it goes on as though the composer had crossed the peak of the mountain of his aspiration and gone down on the other side. Into what, it is hard to say. Some listeners hearing the clucks of bassoons, syncopations of rhythm, sharp-set harmonies and highly-colored instrumentation, will say into a world of revelling and careless men. Others, hearing later a certain joyous turbulence, may believe that the seeker has come refreshed into the eager life of doing and striving. Between, both will hear also the clear voice of the reiterated melody of fervent aspiration. Wherever music and composer go, it is still in their hearts. It still kindles Lendvai's imagination. Not much else of the finale seemingly did. In it he rhapsodizes still, but without the deep, compelling, fusing fervor. More than once he is only loosely music-making. Sometimes finales are a pity.

Wagner and Dvorak

The rest of the concert made contrast enough with Lendvai's symphony; yet time and again—since Dr. Muck will unify—sent the listener's mind harking back to it. The orchestra had played like a band of imaginative virtuosi through the symphony and it had gained marvellously the melting tonal colors, the strange new softness of tonal texture, the endless suggestion of rhythm that the music sought. The concert happened to end with the "brilliant overture" of hallowed programmatic custom—Dvoràk's "Carnival," in which lively rhythms toss about bright instrumental colors in spirited play. Dr. Muck and the orchestra made it like a merry kaleidoscope; but it seemed the regular thing in the regular way beside Lendvai's rarities of color and rhythm and his strange, insinuating softness. And Dvoràk in his "contrasting passages" was a sentimental more than an emotional soul. Yet the regular thing in the regular way has its comforts, especially after the exactions of the new.

Somewhat akin, too, in the bringing of the expected seemed even Wagner's "Faust" overture. It was written in his most romantic days and it follows what by this time the London reviewers must surely call the "well-known" romantic formula. Hear Faust in a dark tonal abyss of gloomy meditation, restless striving and wrenching wretchedness of spirit—at war with the world and life as the romanticists liked to say. Hear the tender, glowing, quickening, re-creating call of the ideal, piercing the abyss with its brightness, soothing the troubled spirit leading it, again as the romanticists liked to say, "even upward and on." By the time he was revising the overture in the fifties Wagner was well on his way to his own particular romantic formula in which the voice of the ideal became the voice of the ewig-weibliche. "Gretchen, of course, could not be introduced into the overture," Wagner wrote to Liszt, but Senta, of "The Flying Dutchman," his first version of the redeeming woman, is clearly audible in it. All of which is neither here nor there. The point is that these romanticists who culminated in Wagner had little inclination to the mystical imaginings and aspirations of our Lendvais. Their feet were set on the firm rocks of romantic despair, duty fated, and romantic salvation by their everlasting woman's spirit. And stout, and not soft, was their play with both. Even in the fifties, Wagner was master of the romantic matter and manner in music and imagination and could set his own individual stamp on them. Whatever the date, the "Faust" overture is music of his prime.

Mr. Pauer and His Concerto

The other piece on the programme was contrast and nothing else—Mendelssohn's concerto, "for the pianoforte with orchestra" as the old-fashioned title runs, played "for the first time at these concerts." For thirty-two years the Symphony Concerts have continued; legion are the pianists who have appeared at them; yet not one has revived what was a classic concerto in Victorian days. The conservatories keep it alive. They say that in the still watches of the night all the pianos in the rooms of the piano classes at the Conservatory in Paris begin to play it by themselves in ghostly reminiscence of the number of times it has been played upon them. But two or three whole generations of virtuosi have refused to toy with it. What, in the naked vernacular, is there in it for them? Only pretty little runs, polished little "passage-work," amiable little melodies, a slow movement that sounds like an etherealized hymn tune, a finale that only tinkles and over it all the dry and smiling nicety of Mendelssohn when he was most elegant, smug, "superior," mannered and dull. There is no room in it for their technique and their feeling, their power and their personality. Nothing and no one—not even in New England—ever lived by nicety alone and Mendelssohn's piano concerto has withered away in spite of all its neat prettiness. And Max Pauer played it yesterday—Max Pauer, tallest of figure, broadest of shoulder, image of virile strength among living pianists. He played it with much deftness of finger, especially in even and purling runs, a light touch that spun gracefully the pretty arabesques, a small, gentle tone that was always fluent and sometimes sparkling; a pleasant singing of the amiable melodies and a happy faculty of bright tonal color for Mendelssohn's neat little fancies. It was all as polished and crystalline as taste, skill, and sentiment—in the old Victorian sense—could make it. Mr. Pauer assimilated himself perfectly to the piece. By these tokens he can differentiate between music; he has sense of style and a rare artistic self-control. No doubt—being a renowned pianist—he has other attributes, too.

H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck on Tour

DR. MUCK will reproduce Lendvai's symphony at only one of the six concerts of the Symphony Orchestra on its monthly trip next week—that in New York on Thursday evening. At the other five concerts, divided between Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York again, the symphony will be Brahms's in D; Mozart's "Jupiter" or Mozart's in G minor. Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn will hear Dr. Muck's remarkable reading of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"; Bach's suite in D will be played in New York; and the overtures of Berlioz and Weber [illegible] strew the programmes. Outside New York [illegible] Pauer will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for pianoforte at each concert.

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 15,

LENDVAI SYMPHONY PLAYED

Giving the first American performance of Erwin Lendvai's symphony in D major, op. 10, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its fifteenth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon before the usual large audience. Max Pauer, the pianist, appeared on this occasion, presenting Mendelssohn's first concerto in G minor. The program was as follows: Erwin Lendvai, symphony in D major, op. 10; Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Mendelssohn, concerto No. 1 for piano and orchestra. G minor, op. 25; Dvorak, "Carnival" overture, Op. 92.

The new symphony is conservative in all its technical aspects. If we grant, as it is time we should, that the symphonic forms established by Liszt and Strauss represent the standard modern idea of structure, this composition by Lendvai is just even with the thought of its era. Its method of approach to the listener are tactfully those which have been well tested and which have proved entirely effectual. It contains no experiment in architectural design. Its draughtmanship is in accord with the rules which the last 50 years of practical symphony building have evolved.

The Lendvai work has the best elements of fundamental plan, it has the most agreeable traits of finished outline that the men working with modern orchestral materials have been able to draw. And at the same time in its attainment of expression it is original and indvidual. As a picture of the life of the day it tells a story that no other symphonic work has told. It uses established formulas but it uses them to ends of social portrayal all its own.

The new symphonist is both like and unlike two composers who have had works presented at the Symphony concerts in recent seasons, Lendvai in dignity of purpose will remind many listeners of Elgar; in mastery of orchestral color he will remind many of Weingartner. But the difference is that his picture wins approval consistently. It starts out to impress upon us an idea of great nobility and it sticks to this idea, never allowing the exigencies of form to interfere. Again, it makes detail serve the main purpose. It will not permit means to become more important than ends. In a word the painter controls his subject and is not controlled by it. As a poet Lendvai may not attain rank above the minor men, but he will never lack enthusiastic readers.

The success of the Lendvai piece can be tested by a rule of thumb method which often works well when a quick judgment has to be made. It is equally interesting in all four movements. It is not a symphony with brilliant andante or scherzo but with commonplace opening and close. It contains no waste pages. It all stands or falls together. It is an absolutely compact work. This merit of singleness of effect is enough to make the composition have vitality, whether it is enough to rank it with the "Tasso" of Lizst, and with the "Don Juan" of Strauss or not.

The work is a symphonic poem in everything but name and "program." The divisions into movements are to be regarded more as a convenience for the listener than as an essential part of the composer's scheme. There is every element of orchestral expression in all four movements; every one of them aspires, meditates, satirizes or does what else it will. Every one of them shifts its mood as freely as it shifts its key. Fortunately the day has come when a composer is free to move about as he pleases in the emotional realm without offering the excurse of telling a story.

Mr. Pauer as pianist brought Mendelssohn back into high regard in the Symphony Orchestra repertory. He raised the question in a way that may not lightly be put aside, whether today we are not unduly despising this composer of the graceful melodic line and of classic harmonic plan. Perhaps, after all, there is permanency in the principles of composition defined by Mozart and Beethoven. Perhaps Mendelssohn stands excused for not breaking with their simplicity of key relations, with their straightforwardness of color combination.

The pianist is a great master of smooth phrasing and of making appeal through gentle tone. He is one of those artists who are keen for giving revaluation to the past, for showing in what respects the mid-nineteenth century and the early twentieth stand in emotional agreement. His work chastens the imagination of his listeners, takes them out of any sentiment they may entertain of narrow satisfaction with the present artistic day.

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date FEB 9 - 1913

The fourth and last but one of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, and it will be the occasion of the first appearance here of Max Pauer, the eminent German pianist, who had a sensational success at his debut in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra and a few days later in his recital [illegible]. Pauer is in this country for the first time, and from all accounts he is one of the very few great pianists in the world. He will play the seldom-heard Mendelssohn Concerto for piano and orchestra.

Date

Max Pauer, pianist, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 17. His debut in New York a few weeks ago with the Philharmonic Society brought forth the most enthusiastic and unqualified praise. He holds a place of high esteem in Europe, not only as a pianist but as a teacher, for he is general director of the Conservatory of Music in Stuttgart. He has played in London and throughout the Continent. In New York he chose as his concerto for his first appearance Mendelssohn's G minor, a composition long since relegated to conservatory students. But he has given it a new lease of life.

He is the son of Ernst Pauer, the famous musical pedagogue, and was born in London in 1866. Max spent his first 15 years in that city. The next four years he was in Carlsruhe studying music, his principal teacher being Vincenz Lachmer. Then Pauer returned to England and matriculated at Oxford, whence he graduated with high honors. From that time he has devoted his activity to teaching and concertizing. For 10 years he was at the head of the piano department of the Conservatory at Cologne and since 1908 has been general director of the Stuttgart Conservatory. Here he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, will give a lecture recital in Lecture Hall of the Academy of Music sext Thursday afternoon on the programme for the Boston Symphony concert which will be given on the following evening.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra to Appear Here Feb. 21.

BONCI TO GIVE RECITAL IN MANHATTAN SATURDAY

Philharmonic All-Wagner Concert To-Night and To-Morrow Afternoon—Many Events of Interest Within Next Few Days.

The fourth and last but one concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the current season will be given Friday evening, Feb. 21, in the Academy of Music, at the usual hour of 8:15. Dr. Muck has quite recovered from the illness which has kept him a prisoner in the house for three weeks following the January concert here and will be at his usual post.

He has arranged an exceedingly interesting programme, the first half of which is modern classic and the second half romantic. The Symphony will be Brahms' in D major No. 2, a work not unfamiliar to Brooklyn audiences as the orchestra has played it several times in past years. It displays Brahms in his brightest mood as a tonal melodist and occupies a place in Brahms' symphonies similar to that held by Beethoven's eighth symphony among the immortal nine. The second half of the programme will comprise Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Mendelssohn's concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The soloist, as already announced, will be Max Pauer, the German pianist. His choice of the Mendelssohn concerto is a bold one for this work has for many years been relegated to conservatory pupils. His success with it is only an-

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 9 - 1913

1884

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large and representative audience of musical and society people assembled in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening for the fourth concert of the season. In the gathering were Mrs. William Goddard, Mrs. R. Grenville Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mr. G. Richmond Parsons, Miss Parsons Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mrs. Charles G. King, Miss Wheelwright, Mr. and Mrs Horatio A. Hunt, Mrs. Howard M. Chapin, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Miss Hunt, The Misses Lacey-Baker, Mrs. E. Tudor Gross, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Mr. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin H. Jewett, Mr. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Miss Louise Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. George Hail, Mrs. Orray Taft, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hunt Clarke, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. William M. Harris, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mrs. Frederick I. Marvel, Miss Edna Lewis, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Clarke, Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. A. Kinghorn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Over, Miss Ellen Anthony, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

—FEBRUARY 16.

Boston and Its Conductors.

There have been musical doings in the last fortnight which are not to be accepted as ordinary or prosaic. The Symphony concerts of the classics conducted a week ago by Dr Muck, as well as those of Friday and yesterday, introducing with true virtuosity an interesting work, together with certain recent performances at the Opera House—the two of "Trovatore," the "Don Giovanni," particularly the "Otello" and above all the third and last "Tristan"—these musical dispensations following each other in close discussion, have prompted reflection, which, if they escape the perils of surfeit, should contain a large element of thanksgiving.

There was a period of time when the sun hid its face in Boston, and no conductor of true eminence cast his shadow before him. Those were dreary days. Then Dr Muck returned, and while illness has claimed him at intervals, the concerts he has conducted were lifted to a high plane of distinction.

Last year Mr Weingartner made a brief visit at the Opera House, and, notwithstanding the brief time in which he could submit his orchestra to anything approaching the discipline of rehearsal, and the comparative newness of the players in operatic experience, he accomplished results, particularly in performances of "Tristan and Isolde," that caused admiration and surprise.

Here were in evidence the qualities which are associated with a conductor, with one who justly bears the name. There is the kapellmeister, or the drill master, an excellent musician, it may be, conscientious, industrious, indefatigable, who if given unlimited opportunity for rehearsal, will accomplish something creditable, but with much beating of the air and much mopping of brows. On the contrary, the conductor, who stands at the desk by virtue of his natural gifts as well as by his ambitions, is able, by some mysterious power within him, to bring certain effects out of his men, with a minimum of verbal explanation, of repetition of passages or of rehearsal in the minutiae of detail.

It was manifestly plausible, with the preparation of "Don Giovanni" upon his hands and four other operatic performances besides it to conduct last week, that Mr Weingartner did not have a great deal of time to rehearse Beethoven's Eroica Symphony for the concert last Sunday afternoon. Indeed one of the first violins said that they had but partly gone over it before the rehearsal Sunday morning, when this whole program was to be covered.

And yet the symphony was played not only with surprising technical clarity and precision, but with interpretative understanding. The spirit of Beethoven, in its various manifestations, shone through it, even as Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun" had appropriate atmosphere. The orchestral tone had color, euphony, elasticity and escaped the obvious in nuances that reflected a hundred lights and shadows. Here was a characterizing orchestra. Looking beneath the surface the hearer was conscious of a beat that had security, upon which a player could lean, expecting his cues, and a presence that radiated authority and inspiration. Outside of this, there was a mood, a succession of moods, which were dominant and made their way untrammeled to the ears and senses of those who listened.

The phenomenon of conducting is as yet the most mystical yet unescapable demonstration of telepathy in a practical world. Until personality, temperament and the chemistry of the nervous organism, its vibrations and sensibilities are reduced to microscopic analyses and formulae, the whole matter must remain abstruse. To see a great conductor work his spell over his men with that quiet and mystifying authority such as Nikisch, Muck, Weingartner, Toscanini are masters of—as was Mahler also—is for the foolish man to say: "This is a simple thing," and there are earnest souls whose blood was not distilled at birth from the majestic rhythm of the planets, who aspire to play upon their fellow-men as an instrument of music, and who of tone; he cannot put brains in a singer's head or a sense of rhythm in a pulse which inherently lacks it, but when the singer was prepared to express emotion in the fullness of its integrity and import, how happy was the collaboration—as with Schumann-Heink in the gypsy's old airs, as with Mr Zenatello in the last scene of "Otello," which Verdi's motive of the kiss haunts like a specter; as with Mme Marcel and the tenor in the love music of the first act, and with Mr Scotti in his diversified narratives of the creed, and of Cassio's dream. Nor should Mr Weingartner's second act of "Tristan and Isolde" be forgotten and the music as Mr Urlus sang it last year. It is such an influence that refines and exalts the art of an opera house.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit to New York this week, giving its usual evening and afternoon concerts on Thursday evening, February 20th, and Saturday afternoon, February 22d, respectively, in Carnegie Hall. The feature of the Thursday night concert will be the first performance in New York of a symphony by the young Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai, which has just been played for the first times in America at the Boston concerts of yesterday and the day before. Comparatively little is known of Lendvai. He is a man in his early thirties and is a resident of Berlin. He has studied with Puccini and also in Paris and Germany. From all accounts he has had a very hard and desperate struggle to win recognition. This symphony in question was played for the first time at one of the big German festivals in Berlin last spring. The composer sent the score to Dr. Muck last summer and the latter was so impressed with it that it was one of the three works he announced at the beginning of the season he would play during the winter.

It is a work in four movements and is entirely modern in form and content. It employs the utmost resources of a modern orchestra and, like works of its kind, is of exceeding difficulty.

There will be no soloist at either concert. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Symphony in D major..............Lendvai.
Overture, "Der Freischütz"..........Weber
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..Strauss
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"........Berlioz.

Saturday afternoon the programme, while not entirely classical in a strict sense, may be considered generally so. The symphony will be Mozart's in G minor. The programme is as follows:

Symphony in G minor..................Mozart
Suite in D major........................Bach
Variations on a theme by Haydn....Brahms
Overture, "Egmont"..............Beethoven

From SUN

Address: New York

Date [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit to New York this week, giving its usual evening and afternoon concerts on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22, respectively, in Carnegie Hall. The feature of the Thursday night concert will be the first performance in New York of a symphony by the young Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai, which has just been played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of yesterday and the day before. Comparatively little is known of Lendvai. He is a man in his early thirties and is a resident of Berlin. He has studied with Puccini and also in Paris and Germany. From all accounts he has had a very hard and desperate struggle to win recognition. The symphony in question was played for the first time at one of the big German festivals in Berlin last spring. The composer sent the score to Dr. Muck last summer and the latter was so impressed with it that it was one of the three new works he announced at the beginning of the season he would play during the winter. It is a work in four movements and is entirely modern in form and content. It employs the utmost resources of a modern orchestra and like works of its kind is of exceeding difficulty. It is without a programme. There will be no soloist at either the Thursday night or Saturday afternoon concert. The full programme in its proper order for Thursday evening is as follows:

Symphony in D major..............Lendvai
Overture, "Der Freischütz"........Weber
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..Strauss
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"......Berlioz

Saturday afternoon the programme, while not entirely classical in a strict sense, may be considered generally so. The symphony will be Mozart's in C minor. The programme, in its proper order, is as follows:

Symphony in C minor..............Mozart
Suite in D major......................Bach
Variations on a theme by Haydn...Brahms
Overture, "Egmont"..............Beethoven

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date FEB 16 1913

884

AN invasion by what might be called foreign orchestras will take place this week, for the Boston Symphony and the Minneapolis Symphony orchestras are coming. The Minneapolis Symphony will give its concert in Carnegie Hall Friday night, with Mr. Emil Oberhoffer conducting. The Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony will be the principal offering of the musicians from the Northwest. The Beethoven overture "Rienzi" and the finale from "Das Rheingold" constitute the remainder of the orchestral programme. Miss Tina Lerner, pianist, will be the soloist.

* * *

Boston's orchestra will give two concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first hearing of a symphony by the young Hungarian composer, Mr. Erwin Lendvai. The other numbers will be Dr. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz" and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck has arranged a programme including Mozart's G minor symphony, Bach's suite in D major, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and the Beethoven overture "Egmont."

* * *

From TIMES

Address: New York

1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit to New York this week, giving its usual evening and afternoon concerts on Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22, respectively, in Carnegie Hall. The feature of the Thursday night concert will be the first performance in New York of a symphony by the young Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai, which has just been played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of yesterday and the day before. Comparatively little is known of Lendvai. He is a man in his early thirties, and is a resident of Berlin. He has studied with Puccini and also in Paris and Germany. From all accounts he has had a very hard and desperate struggle to win recognition. This symphony in question was played for the first time at one of the big German festivals in Berlin last Spring. The composer sent the score to Dr. Muck last Summer, and the latter was so impressed with it that it was one of the three new works he announced at the beginning of the season he would play during the Winter.

It is a work in four movements and is entirely modern in form and content. It employs the utmost resources of a modern orchestra, and like works of its kind is of exceeding difficulty. It is without a programme.

There will be no soloist at either the Thursday night or Saturday afternoon concerts. The full programme in its proper order for Thursday evening is as follows:

Symphony in D major................Lendvai
Overture, "Der Freischutz"............Weber
"'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..Strauss
Overture, "Benvenuto Callini"......Berlioz

Saturday afternoon the programme is as follows:

Symphony in G minor................Mozart
Suite in D major..........................Bach
Variations on a theme by Haydn......Brahms
Overture, "Egmont"..................Beethoven

* * *

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

The fourth and last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the current season will be given on Friday evening next in the Academy of Music at the usual hour of 8:15. Dr. Muck has quite recovered from the illness which has kept him a prisoner in the house for three weeks following the January concert here, and will doubtless be at his usual post. He has arranged an exceedingly interesting programme, the first half of which is modern classicism and the second half romantic. The symphony will be Brahms' in D Major No. 2, a work not unfamiliar to Brooklyn audiences, as the orchestra has played it several times. It displays Brahms in his brightest mood as a tonal melodist and occupies a place in Brahms' symphonies similar to that held by Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony" among the immortal nine. The second half of the programme will comprise Beethoven's overture, "Egmont"; Mendelssohn's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in G Minor," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The soloist will be Max Pauer, the German pianist, who has recently been the sensation of the musical season in New York. His choice of Mendelssohn's "Concerto" is a bold one, for this work has for many years been relegated to conservatory pupils. His success with it is only another illustration of how often great works are neglected for the lack of the right artist to interpret them. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony, in D Major No 2............Brahms
Overture, "Egmont" ....Beethoven
Concerto for piano and orchestra.Mendelssohn
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Prank"...Strauss

SHOWTHROUGH

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date

Esta 84

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Im erſten der kommenden Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, die am 20. reſp. 22. d. M. unter Leitung von Dr. Muck ſtattfinden, wird der Dirigent eine neue Symphonie des ungariſchen Komponiſten Herrn Lendvai vorführen. Es folgen die „Freiſchütz"-Ouverture, „Till Eulenſpiegel" und die Berlioz'ſche „Benvenuto Cellini"-Ouverture. Das Samstag-Konzert bringt Mozart's G-Moll-Symphonie, Bach's Suite in D-Dur, Brahms' „Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Thema" und die „Egmont"-Ouverture.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date

E 1884

There was no soloist last night at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, but Dr. Karl Muck gave at least two numbers of absorbing interest before the usual audience, which completely filled the house.

These were the symphony which opened the programme and Richard Strauss's ever fascinating "Till Eulenspiegel," the first being a novelty by a young composer, Erwin Lendvai, born in Budapest thirty years ago.

As a whole, this contained good melodic material, interesting rhythmic figures and an orchestration that is rich and effective. The work is bold and makes one feel that the writer had something to say without stepping out of the accepted harmonic paths to do so.

There are splendid climaxes cleverly massed, and although there may be moments when one feels too little thematic development and too much free fancy, it may be due to the fact that the usual sonata form is implied rather than put into execution.

Lendvai seems to have a wealth of imagination and knowledge of how to handle his material, and in the third movement especially there is much tenderness and a quaintness which leads the way into a finale in which there is more humor although less spontaneity than in the rest of the work. Dr. Muck conducted with spirit, and as usual carried his audience to a high degree of enthusiasm, particularly in the Strauss number. The rest of the programme consisted of Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

E 384

Boston Orchestra Plays New Symphony

When Dr. Dvorák was director of the National Conservatory of Music in this city he wrote for the Century Magazine an article on Schubert, which Sir George Grove pronounced the best thing ever written on that composer. In course of that article, Dvorák made the important suggestion that no symphony should last more than half an hour. His own works are, to be sure, somewhat longer, though not excessively so. Since he wrote that article, however, the composers have been making their symphonies, as well as their symphonic poems, longer and longer. It is a great—often a suicidal—mistake, because, the longer a work, the more a conductor must hesitate to give it a place on one of his programmes.

Last night, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra played a new symphony which comes up to Dvorák's ideal as to duration. It is in D major, and is the tenth opus of Erwin Lendvai, a pupil of Hans Koessler, of Budapest. Possibly Dr. Muck chose it for performance because of its brevity, since there seems to be little else to commend about it, unless it be an occasional patch of glowing orchestral coloring, and some agreable melodic pages in the third movement. As a whole it is singularly deficient in content, in ideas, in structural interest. For the most part it just maunders on and on without any obvious plan or pattern. Some of the brass climaxes are rather coarse, and in the first movement, mingled with the harmonies, there are bitter dissonances that are as agreeable as a pinch of quinine would be on a plate of ice cream.

The Lendvai symphony gave the Boston Orchestra a good chance to show off its brilliant virtuosity, and the same was the case with the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss, and the concluding number, Berlioz's "Cellini" overture. Weber's "Freischütz" overture, however, which came after the symphony, is, as conducted by Dr. Muck and played by his men, enjoyable as music pure and simple, without any reference to orchestral virtuosity.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date FEB 21 1913

Establis

Once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us and once more it gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme comprised a symphony in D major by Erwin Lendvai, Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Erwin Lendvai is a young Hungarian composer and his symphony had not previously been played in New York. If it ever be played here again, that will be time enough to enter into a discussion of its qualities. For the moment, ungracious as such a proceeding may seem, it is enough to say that both for the orchestra that subjected and for the audience that submitted the symphony seemed a waste of time.

The real feature of the concert was the splendid performance of the Strauss piece, one of Dr. Muck's battle horses, though the Berlioz overture also went with great brilliancy. The overture to "Der Freischütz" was on the whole less satisfactory. For one thing, Dr. Muck takes the introduction so slowly that it can hardly be played at all. The audience was as large as the hall could hold and it received the Strauss piece with particular enthusiasm.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Estal 884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NEW SYMPHONY BY LENDVAI.

Dr. Karl Muck, at the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, presented a programme that may well be called brilliant, for, principally, it served to show the virtuosity of his distinguished band. A symphony in D major by Erwin Lendval, heard for the first time in New York, furnished a refreshing novelty. The composer is barely turned thirty and the symphony is only his opus 10. The work is chiefly remarkable for its wealth of color. In richness of orchestration Mr. Lendvai fairly vies with any modern composer. He presents a series of pictures skillfully blended into a harmonious whole. And he is not an imitator. The four movements are marked Andante religioso, Con moto, Mesto ed assai tranquillo and Vivace. At a first hearing the two middle ones seem to fascinate the most. The first is impressive and the last has infectious charm.

For the rest there were Weber's "Der Freischultz" overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, each performed admirably and appreciated by the distinguished music lovers that subscribe to these concerts.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Estal 884

FACTS OF INTEREST FOR MUSIC PATRONS.

A NEW symphony of sombre color and lacking in seeming unity of purpose, heard for the first time by New Yorkers on Thursday night, was that by Erwin Levendai, played for the first time here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer is only thirty-one years old, and his technical equipment appears considerable, but he has not accomplished much in the way of real creative musical worth in this product.

As originally produced, the four movements were given titles which did not appear on the score when it was printed in 1912. The first two sections of the symphony are religious in trend and are moulded on broad lines with numerous climaxes in which the brass instruments have much prominence. The third movement is comparatively tranquil, and here is found some material worth listening to, but, as in the concluding section, which furnishes abrupt and sudden rhythmic changes, there is a lack of definiteness of musical purpose.

Conductor Karl Muck is doing a fine service in presenting unheard compositions at the New York Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, even though he cannot be expected invariably to provide works of exceptional value. The orchestra was at its best on Thursday, and under the fine leadership of Dr. Muck interpreted the overture to "Der Freischutz," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

* * *

From AMERICAN
Address: New York. FEB 23
Date

Est 1884

Boston Symphony Draws Large Crowd

Perfection of Interpretation Was Offset by Lack of Variety in Yesterday's Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for such perfection in the interpretation of symphonic music that it may be considered iconoclastic to say that the concert given at Carnegie Hall yesterday was a trifle too uniform—for uniformity, even in perfection, is apt to tire.

The concert began with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, then came Bach's Suite in D major, Brahms's Variations of the Haydn Theme, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—a congregation of music that is very much of a class. In fact, the Bach Suite and the Mozart Symphony are in many places so akin in tempo and motif that the one seems almost like the grand elaboration of the other.

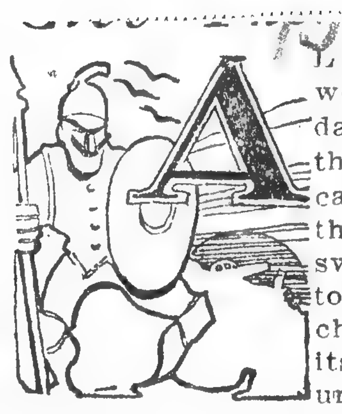
But other than this lack of variety, the whole concert was a triumph of the strings, and whether in the lightest and most delicate passages or the tremendous throbbing of the double-basses, the Boston Orchestra yesterday showed what a good thing it is to have well-drilled intelligence playing on perfect instruments.

The audience, as usual, was large, and devout in its appreciation.

884 Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date

Established



ALTHOUGH the weather of yesterday was trying in the extreme for vocal cords and strings, the opera was in full swing and the Boston Symphony Orchestra poured out its beautiful volumes of tone as if dampness and relaxing atmosphere had no menace for them.

The matinee performance at the Metropolitan Opera House was "The Barber of Seville," given with genuine holiday humor by the singers. Evidently in honor of the day, Miss Frieda Hempel, as Rosina, appeared for her singing lesson in the third act in a gown of blue with a white veil and with red roses displaying the national colors bravely. Had she sung the national anthem during her singing lesson the audience could scarcely have been more surprised.

As it was, this pretty red, white and blue Rosina sang Arditi's "Il Bacio" so well that the audience demanded a repetition of the brilliant waltz song.

Mr. Amato as the Barber, Mr. de Segurola as Basilio, Mr. Pini-Corsi as Dr. Bartolo and Mr. Umberto Macnez as the amorous Count, were familiar figures. They never sang better nor acted with more spontaneous comedy effects.

In the evening the popular performance of "Il Trovatore" was well attended. Mme. Gadski as Leonora, Mme. Homer as the remorseful Azucena, Mr. Martin as the troubadour and Mr. Gilly as the Count, carried the burden of the opera easily and sang the familiar but always beautiful arias of this most famous of Italian operas.

Music that has withstood the blighting hand of time and is to-day as appealing and melodic as when it first came from the inspired masters constituted the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

As always, the visiting players from the Hub attracted an audience of discriminating listeners, who filled the big auditorium to overflowing, and expressed its pleasure with unmistakable enthusiasm. Dr. Muck and his players gave their best, and there is no better in symphonic music in this country.

Mozart's Symphony in G minor, a suite by Bach, variations on a theme of Haydn's by the modern Brahms and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" were the full list of offerings. No modern harsh tonalities broke in on all this wealth of golden music.

14

SHOWTHROUGH

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date FEB 28 1913
Establi

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ein gänzlich ausverkauftes Haus, ein begeiſtertes Publikum, ein voller Erfolg und wundervolle Leiſtungen — das war die Signatur des geſtrigen Nachmittags-Konzerts der Boſtoner. Dr. Muck hatte ein klaſſiſches Programm aufgeſtellt, das mit Ausnahme von Mozart (auch keine ſchlechte Firma) nur Kompoſitionen der drei großen „B“ enthielt. Mozarts G-Moll-Symphonie No. 2 (Köchel 550) wurde mit einem erleſenen Klangreiz und einer Duftigkeit ausgeführt, die entzücken mußte. Es folgte Bachs D-Dur-Suite No. 3, deren einzelne Theile ſich in dieſer meiſterhaften Darbietung zu einem vollen Genuß zuſammenſchloſſen. Brahms' „Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Thema“ und Beethovens „Egmont“-Ouvertüre bildeten den Beſchluß der gelungenen Darbietung, die den wahren Enthuſiasmus des Publikums erregte. Nach der Bachſchen Suite mußte das geſammte Orcheſter aufſtehen und für den reichen Beifall danken. Es fiel auf, daß der Konzertmeiſter hiebei ſitzen blieb.

that it be cle that it was admitt
there was nothing un
's relations with

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date
Est 884

OLD GRACE AND OLD MUSIC

And the Boston Orchestra as Their Exponents.

Dr. Muck has liberal views touching the mission of his Boston Orchestra, and a somewhat startling manner of proclaiming them. On Thursday evening he permitted a young symphonist of to-day to utter what he conceived to be a serious proclamation in the largest form of absolute music. Yesterday afternoon, by way of contrast, he made his orchestra speak the speech of Mozart, Bach, Brahms and Beethoven—and of them only. In every composition there might have been found a special preachment, but united they conveyed the one large, beautiful and apposite lesson of the beauty of sanity in interpretation and of the uplifting influence of the euphony which is rapidly disappearing from our concert rooms and the gracefulness which has been banished from the dance. It is passing strange that a performance of Mozart's G minor symphony should at this day demand praise, not only because it was made to sound beautiful, but because it was allowed to retain the beauty which is native to it—permitted to be its own sweet self instead of being tortured into the semblance of something else. Yet audiences in Carnegie Hall have heard it in something like motley under two conductors of recent years. And when its minuet was followed yesterday by the full-throated air, the gavottes, the bourrée and gigue of Bach's suite in D major, one could but wonder if not only an æsthetic but also a moral reform might not be promoted by a musical revolution which should send to the guillotine of into temporary banishment at least all of the dances which have been introduced within the last 150 years. The vulgar taste of to-day would not long prevail against the minuet, the saraband and the pavan as they were danced in the eighteenth century.

After the Mozart symphony and the Bach suite came Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date
Estal 4

With Dr. Carl Muck restored to health and conducting as usual, the Boston Symphony appeared in Carnegie Hall last night, and as usual played to the most genuinely musical audience in the city.

A symphony by a modern German composer, Lendvai, presented for the first time here proved to be a superb work written with a wealth of orchestral color, alluring rhythms and with original chord combinations.

From MORNING TELEGRA..
Address: New York.
Date ..b 1 191
Estal 4

Boston Symphony Concert.

A new symphony by Edwin Lendavi, a Hungarian composer, was the feature of the first of the February concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and "The Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel" (Richard Strauss) were the other numbers rendered under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date FEB 21 1913
Establi

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

First Performance of a New Symphony by Lendvai.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night, and the conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, introduced to his audience another novelty. This was a symphony in [illegible] major by Erwin Lendvai, a Hungarian who studied for a time at the con[illegible] of Budapest and was also for [illegible] under the instruction of no less [illegible] than Puccini. The symphony [illegible] played for the first time in [illegible] in Boston last Friday afternoon.

Dr. [illegible] undoubtedly approached this symphony with a conviction that it was an important work, but it is unlikely that his belief will be supported by the general public. The work has a certain value and it shows talent, and there are moments when it rises to vigorous utterance, [illegible] its final impression is of incomp[illegible]ss in the expansion of the comp[illegible]ly thin ideas upon which it is built.

There are four movements, but they are not distributed or constructed according to the classic conventions. The first is an andante religioso, the second is called con moto, the third mesto ed assai tranquillo and the last vivace. The fundamental thematic subject of the first movement is made to dominate much of the symphony as a whole, and if the theme had been developed with masterly inventive power the work might have benefited by the plan. But organic unity is not really attained because the lines of development are continually broken up and new beginnings spasmodically attempted.

Thus the symphony appears to lack broad melodic curves. It moves laboriously and its contrapuntal devices, often promising in their inception, come to no grand issue. The orchestration is greatly overladen. This is a common fault among recent composers, especially those who have little to say. Want of original idea, lack of clear and purposeful drawing, are lamely replaced by immense outpour of color. Mr. Lendvai's orchestration embraces not only the use of a large array of instruments, but also divisions of all sorts, solo passages, breaking up of the string choir into several small bodies and other contrivances familiar to students of modern orchestral music. The brass is employed altogether too heavily and there is too much empty sound. The most effective and really beautiful passage of instrumentation is that in the close of the third movement, where the simplest means are used. The composition was splendidly played.

The other works on the programme were the overture to "Der Freischutz," Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. The orchestra has played all of these compositions so often in New York that comment is unneccessary.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date
Esta 84

NEW MUSIC FROM BOSTON

Much Cry and Little Wool in a Symphony.

When the Symphony Orchestra which makes a monthly visit to the metropolis from Boston elects to begin its concert with a novelty it lightens the labors and as a rule, heightens the pleasures of all its listeners. In the first place, it takes a load of apprehension early in the evening off the minds of its patrons, who from long years of experience have been taught to fear new offerings; in the next, it leaves them free to the enjoyment which the playing of the men from Boston never fails to bring. For this reason last night's concert was a season of more perfect delight than its predecessor, which was marked by the production of an unfamiliar work. After the first number of the programme, a new symphony by an unknown composer was disposed of—happily for the present and presumably for all future time—there was nothing to do but to enjoy Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," music which calls for no comment when played perfectly, for the same reason that good wine needs no bush. Concerning the new symphony something of course must be said. It is a work by Lendvai, concerning whom even the industrious Mr. Philip Hale, the most generous purveyor of musical information whom the world knows, could tell us but little in his programme notes. Yet that little was quite sufficient to satisfy the curiosity of those who heard the music. The large world can scarcely be profoundly interested in one who has so little to say in so pompous a proclamation as his Symphony in D, even though it be a tenth numbered work to which Dr. Muck has given his interest and affection. As a rule modern symphonists adopt an extremely complicated method of reiterating small thoughts and trying to make them significant by great variety of orchestral coloring, and reintroducing them and fragments of them in the different sections of their composition. In this method, which has always much smell of the midnight oil about it, there is at least the semblance of sequence if not of logic. But the new composer seems to care little for either sequence or logic. His scheme in the new symphony reminds us

---

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date FEB 21 1913
Estal 84

NEW SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Modern Work of Hungarian Composer Lendvai Performed by Dr. Muck's Players.

The fourth visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made noteworthy at Carnegie Hall last evening by the performance of a new work by the Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai. Neither the composer nor his writings are well-known except, perhaps, by the limited circle of his friends and associates.

Though a Hungarian, Mr. Lendvai lives in Germany and has studied under French and Italian masters. His symphony, which Dr. Muck conducted so ably last evening, is a combination of modern ideas depicting the unquestionable influence of the latest German and French trend in musical composition. The auditor gets an occasional but fleeting suggestion of peaceful melody, but, generally speaking, each of the four movements is an example of the extraordinary resources of an orchestra.

"'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," that orchestral joke of Richard Strauss's, sounded almost like a continuation of the symphony in that the same strange lack of continuity obtained. However, the magnificent tone quality secured by the members of the Boston Orchestra would enhance a less scholarly work and the Strauss number last evening was worth hearing if only for the manner of its presentation.

The other numbers on the programme were the overture to "Der Freischutz" by Weber, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz.

The customary large and fashionable audience was present and many were content to stand and enjoy the delightful efforts of Dr. Muck and his men. At to-morrow afternoon's concert works by Mozart, Bach, Brahms and Beethoven will be given.

From HE.
Address: New York
Date

Established: London, 1881; phony

Young Hungarian Composer, Presented by Dr. Muck, Is Well Received.

Length being no criterion in the case of a concert, the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night presented a nice illustration of inverse proportions. Beginning at twenty minutes after eight, the concert occupied just one hour and a half, and experienced Boston Symphony devotees showed by their applause that it was one of the most enjoyable concerts the organization has given this season.

There was no soloist, but that vacancy was amply filled by a symphony which was introduced to New York. It is the work of Mr. Edwin Lendvai, a young Hungarian, of Italian tendencies from study with Mr. Puccini, who lives in Berlin. It could not have been heard in better circumstances.

Mr. Lendvai has used his brasses lavishly and many times with telling effect. In the first two movements the orchestral coloring was such as to elicit great applause, for the instrumentation was never monotonous and it showed a facile hand. The tranquillo was the part which made the greatest appeal, for in it there were more melodic freedom and a wealth of "atmosphere."

The vivace was a repetition of the spirit of the first two movements, blatant in places and lacking in melody. From the symphony's reception neither Mr. Lendvai nor Dr. Muck can have any regret over its submission to a New York audience.

With its wealth of melody, Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz" was doubly acceptable to the audience, and Dr. Muck's interpretation was warmly received. Then came "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which, from the enjoyment they took in playing it, must be a prime favorite with the musicians.

Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" concluded the programme at twelve minutes before ten o'clock.

[161]

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date ....

Estal 384

Muck Introduces Lendvai Symphony in Masterly Style

In the course of the monthly pilgrimakes the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes to this town, Dr. Karl Muck, its conductor, has set before New Yorkers music to startle their aplomb, to make them open their ears, and New York is fortunate in having both the pilgrimages and the musical stimulants—and it is doubly lucky to have Dr. Muck twice each month. Last night, at Carnegie Hall, he offered the usual Boston Symphony-goers the veritable spirit of youth, and so much of that spirit as was still get-at-able in this audience responded.

One refers in this wise to the First Symphony of Erwin Lendvai, a Hungarian who is still but thirty-one, and one uses the capitalization in referring to this symphony because there will unquestionably be others. This was the first presentation of the work in New York, and it is not often that so interesting a piece of music has a first hearing in this city of much music and many premieres.

The symphony is Mr. Lendvai's opus 10 and is in D major. It hardly bespeaks much industry on the part of the pianists now hereabouts, some of whom are on the lookout for novelties, that none of them has brought before the public this young composer's five "pictures" for piano, written since the symphony, and sofe of the chamber music organizations might vary their monotony of programme-making by attempting the trio of Lendvai, also written after the symphony.

The symphony is scored for the great modern orchestra, with most of the rarely used instruments drawn upon by Richard Strauss. It displays great freedom as to form, which is bent throughout to the composer's expressive intent, and this has the splendid vigor, the reckless daring and the grandiose ideas that come to a man generally only before the battering process of the years has made his mental and emotional inwards pulpy with caution.

When the symphony was first produced at Bonn, four years ago, its four movements were entitled, "Invocation," "Fantasie," "Naenie" and "Bacchanal." Roughly, some such classification might still be appended to the several parts of the work in its revised form, which was the one played last night.

The symphony is chiefly remarkable because it reflects with fidelity the spirit of contemporary feeling and also of contemporary habit of thought. It is far from the bland and smug apotheoses of the musical philosophy of Richard Strauss, whose modernity is one of musical mechanics, without art substance.

This is a symphony that shouts the futility of things, and without the sensitively gentle, yearning obviousness of Tschaikowsky. Aspiration is clouded by the experience of things as they are, and the pathos and struggle and weariness of life are flung aside in a fierce desire to seize upon whatever joy there may be.

To say these things in music, with the complexities they hold in modern life, requires complexities of means and it also requires harmonic and melodic expression that is not always—indeed, not even often—beautiful in tself. There are shrieking discords and chromatic distortions of themes, ut there is a determined and firmly eld method in all the madness of ound that reveals great originality nd ingenuity of orchestration, subtle effect.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New Yor .
Date ....

Es 1884

oſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

…n geſtrigen Konzert am Abend in …egie Hall beſcherten uns die Boſto= …eine Novität, die D-Dur-Symphonie …ungen ungariſchen Komponiſten Lend= …op. 10. Ein reſpektables Werk, das …en zwei erſten Sätzen und theilweiſe … im dritten Hoffnungen erweckt, welche … Finale, ein „Viv[illegible]" nicht erfüllt. …eſer letzte Satz iſt [illegible]lich, nachdem die …en eine bemerkenswerthe reiche, dabei …er feine und durchſichtige Inſtrumenti= …ung gezeigt hatten, reichlich dick inſtrumentirt, ja, geradezu überladen, wodurch der Charakter des Leichten und Witzigen, den das „Vivace" doch angedeutet hatte, verloren geht. Anerkennenswerth iſt das thematiſche Material, das durchweg ſolid und wandlungsfähig iſt und durch prächtige harmoniſche und rhythmiſche Einfälle gehoben wird.

Das Ganze iſt ſymphoniſch gut durchgearbeitet. Alles in allem ſomit ein intereſſantes Werk, das den modernen Errungenſchaft nur ſo viel giebt, als ihnen zukommt, und auf das bewährte Aeltere nicht verzichtet. Geſpielt wurde das Werk einfach vollendet; Dr. Muck ging mit offenſichtlicher Liebe und einem Eifer zu Werk, welche die ſchönſten Wirkungen zeitigten. Der Beifall hielt ſich in mäßigen Grenzen.

Das Programm brachte ferner eine ein=

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York FEB 18 1913
Date ....

Es 1884

ERWIN LENDVAI, a young Hungarian, sent a symphony to Karl Muck last summer, which so impressed the Boston Orchestra leader that he announced it last week as one three prime novelties of the year in Boston, and will bring it this Thursday to New York Lendvai lives in Berlin and is a man just past thirty years old. A student with Puccini and also in Paris, he had a hard struggle for recognition. His symphony was played at one of the big German festivals in Berlin last spring.

W. B. CHASE.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date ....

Establisl

Orchestra from Boston Plays Under Handicap

Stringed Instruments Suffer from Dampness, but Dr. Muck's Players Are in Brilliant Form.

Fickle weather yesterday played havoc with violin strings at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall, but it did not dampen the enthusiasm of the audience. It was the last but one of the season's afternoon concerts to be given by the famous Boston orchestra, and the programme was made up of, as a veteran concertgoer expressed it, "Three B's and one M," meaning Bach, Brahms, Beethoven and Mozart.

The course of the concert was punctuated from time to time by popping sounds as violin and 'cello strings gave way to the effects of damp weather and snapped. Apart from these unavoidable incidents and the tiny slip of one of the violins the playing of the orchestra was again impeccable. Dr. Muck, entirely recovered from his recent attack of grip and tonsillitis, conducted with the decisive force and authority that stamps his leading.

Mozart's G minor symphony opened the concert, and Dr. Muck refrained from trying to make Mozart sound modern or sensational. Instead he gave a fine, virile, clean cut reading of the masterpiece and won the admiration and applause of every one that heard it. Then came Bach's D major Suite, in which the famous Air was played with exquisite tone quality. Brahms' variations on Haydn's St. Anthony Chorale was beautifully played, particularly the sixth variation, taken at a remarkable pace. For the finale Beethoven's Egmont Overture was dramatically given and the audience remained to applaud and call out Dr. Muck several times.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From SUN
Address: New York
Date ....

Es 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Matinee Programme of Fine Music Well Performed.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday, gave unalloyed pleasure to a large audience. The programme was almost entirely classic, and indeed might, without stretching a somewhat elastic term, be regarded as entirely so.

The numbers were Haydn's symphony in C minor, the Bach suite in D major, the Brahms variations on the "Chorale St. Anthoni" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

A more restful list of compositions it would be hard to arrange. The symphony is one of those which exhibit in the clearest light Haydn's lovely simplicity of melodic idea, his firm and compact symphonic form, his beautiful clarity and logic of development and his sunny lucidity of instrumentation. The qualities of the music were perfectly disclosed in a performance which was marked by the unfailing suavity of style, balance and aristocracy of tone and finish of nuance characteristic of the playing of the Bostonians.

The Bach suite is an old and much loved friend of concertgoers, who long ago gave themselves to the spell of its marvellously beautiful air and to the daintiness of its gentle humor. The performance of this number sustained the high level reached in the first. If anything attracted special attention it was the certainty and delicacy of the trumpets and the purity of the style with which the concertmeister, Anton Witek, played the violin solo.

The Brahms variations have had a rest and they came with renewed freshness of charm. The wide range of character in them makes them thoroughly interesting from beginning to end, and the brilliant summary in the closing measures leaves the hearer with a feeling of full satisfaction. After this number the music of Beethoven rounded to a climax a skilfully planned programme. The af[illegible]

[162]

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date ....

Es 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS BIG CROWD

Dr. Muck and Virtuosi Bring New Composition to Town.

A E WELCOMED BY OLD FRIENDS

W… Young Hungarian Compo… ndvai, Received with …usiastic Applause.

T… on Symphony Orchestra retu… town last night minus a soloist, … provided instead wit… new composition—new, at leas… local concertgoers. The absence of a stellar attraction made no apparent difference in the size of the crowd which flocked to Carnegie Hall to welcome back Dr. Karl Muck and his ban… of virtuosi. The big auditorium wa… completely filled, and the novelty of the evening, which came first on the programme, aroused almost as much approval as the familiar contributions offered later, comprising Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini."

It may be, however, that the applause which followed every one of the four movements of Erwin Lendvai's symphony in D major, and redoubled at the close of that extraordinary work, was intended more as a compliment to Dr. Muck and his valiant men, who stood up to share honors with their great leader, than as a tribute of admiration for the young Hungarian composer thus introduced for the first time to New York music lovers.

It is well-nigh impossible to pass final judgment after a single hearing on so elaborate and unusual a composition as Lendvai's opus 10. A symphony in the traditional sense it can hardly be called despite its four movements. Yet though the development is unconventional and is influenced, no doubt, by the poetic scheme the author had originally in mind, the thematic design of the music is by no means vague and nebulous.

As a matter of fact Lendvai's melodic ideas are clearly defined, trenchant and persistent and the various metamorphoses through which they pass under the composer's deft and vigorous manipulation do not conceal their emotional substance entirely, even from the uninitiated ear.

The second movement, in D minor, made perhaps the most striking impression. Yet the poetic beauties of the third movement, "Mesto ed assai tranquillo," with its peculiarly effective Andante Mysterioso, were by no means lost upon the appreciative listener.

The work as a whole is pitched on an exceedingly high dynamic plane. There are successions of extremely sharp contrasts and many—perhaps too many—elaborately prepared crescendos. The idiom, melodic and harmonic, is distinctly original. Oecidedly Lendvai's future looks bright. His ideas seem to gush forth spontaneously and assume individual form and outline. His artistic progress will be watched with interest.

The performance the "Symphony" received at the hands of Dr. Muck and his men represented an orchestral tour de force.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date FEB 21 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Symphony by Lendvai Heard at the Fourth Evening Concert.

On the fourth visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Muck exemplifies again his ideas of style in the making of programmes. The concert last evening in Carnegie Hall was devoted to works of the modern and romantic schools. The symphony was new and unfamiliar, by a composer whose music has not previously been heard here—Erwin Lendvai, a young Hungarian composer, whose rise is recent and whose compositions are as yet few.

Whatever else it is, the symphony is an individual and original utterance, and bears few obvious traces of derivation from the influences that are most familiar in productions of the present day. It makes little immediate or obvious appeal to the listener. Many of the themes are long and not easily impressed upon the listening ear at a first hearing, and for this reason, though the composer has made use of the device known as "community of theme," by which the motives of one movement reappear in others, in combination or in transformation, the relationship established thereby is not easily followed.

The symphony is made up of the four movements that are the established components of a symphony; but the formal structure of these movements departs widely from the traditional models; the "sonata form" is little observed. There is no great sensuous beauty in this music, either in its thematic substance or in the orchestral garb in which it is presented. A few episodical passages have charm in both respects, but it is not the prevailing character of the symphony. There is a certain severity of outline and of color in it throughout; and this impression is enhanced by the character of its harmony, in which the composer has not hesitated at hard dissonances. Yet he follows none of the fashionable harmonic formulas of the day.

The most engaging moments were found in a contrasting section of the second movement and in another in the third movement, where a "melancholy song" of the English horn appears, of seizing beauty; and the orchestral coloring that is given to this passage is of a mellower quality than much that appears in the work. While this symphony has on the whole a stern aspect that is not likely to win it many friends on a first hearing, it is clearly the work of a musician of original and individual power, who has command of his material, who does not over-elaborate it—for the symphony differs from many of recent composition in its brevity—and who goes his own way. It was played with great devotion and complete mastery by the orchestra, and all that the composer has to say was presented in the most favorable light. There was applause at the end, and Dr. Muck had the players rise to share it with him.

The rest of the programme comprised Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," in which the slow introduction was taken at a surprisingly slow tempo; Strauss's brilliant and incredibly clever "Till Eulenspiegel," and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was an astonishing tour de force.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

Est 1884

TOSCANINI CONFERS WITH DR. CARL MUCK

Two Famous Leaders Meet at Boston Symphony Concert.

DISCUSS NUMBER WRITTEN BY MOZART

Conductor of Visiting Organization Is Congratulated by Other Musicians.

If any inquisitive person among the many concertgoers who attended yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall had managed to penetrate into the intimacy of the greenroom in the intermission following Mozart's Symphony in G minor (K. 550) he would have seen an interesting picture. For fully ten minutes Arturo Toscanini, who had left his seat in the parquet after the opening selection, stood there in quiet conversation with the distinguished conductor of Colonel Higginson's famous organization, while a small group of other visitors stood at a respectful distance waiting their turn to shake hands with Dr. Karl Muck.

"What an opportunity for a snapshot," remarked Karl Braun, the Metropolitan Opera Company's youthful German basso, whose height was matched only by one other man in the room—Max Pauer, the tall-towering pianist. "Behold, the two great living wielders of the baton, the one a German, the other an Italian, are two of the smallest men in the world artistic."

Arturo Toscanini does not often show himself in public. He is rarely seen outside the Metropolitan Opera House. When he does venture forth, however, he chooses well, and evidently he enjoyed yesterday to the full the Boston Symphony Orchestra's dignified, well-balanced, and finely chiseled performance of the Mozart Symphony—a work he himself has so often conducted from memory—even though two false entrances, the one by an oboe, the other by a first violin, marred slightly the transparent perfection of Dr. Muck's musicianly interpretation.

It was an afternoon of classic delights unruffled by stellar persuasions, for after the chat with his famous Italian colleague, Dr. Muck gave Bach's suite in D major, No. 3, with its thrice familiar air, following up that immortal composition with Brahms's variations on a theme of Josef Hayden, opus 56A and bringing the programme to an impressive close with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

MAX SMITH.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 21 1913
Date

Est 1884

LECTURE RECITAL ON ORCHESTRA PROGRAMME

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play in the opera house of that building to-night, was set forth in a lecture-recital by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto, piano, as assisting artist. The compositions are the Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73, by Brahms; the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84, by Beethoven; the Concerto, No. 1, in G minor, for pianoforte, opus 26, by Mendelssohn, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss.

"The 'Egmont' of Beethoven must not be considered as an opera, but more as a suite written for the play," he said. "The music was written for the classical orchestra and is without trombones, for that instrument had not then come into the symphonic orchestra. The opening chords represent the crushing power and brutality of Spain and the saraband form is chosen as typically Spanish. Mr. De Voto played the music up to the entrance of the 'cello, after which the motifs of the heroine and of Spain appear in contrast. Just before the 'postscript'—the Coda, the saraband form and the feminine voice again are heard, then the lament and the voice of liberty."

Mr. Elson bade his hearers observe to-night the shriek of the piccolo at the end of the Coda, used to express the joy of the people of Holland over their triumph. Mr. De Voto gave exerpts very acceptably on the piano, although Mr. Elson said that it is impossible for a piano to adequately present this orchestral music.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 22 1913
Date

Esta 1884

Max Pauer was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. Next week he will be playing with the Minneapolis Orchestra, at Minneapolis, and will give several recitals at St. Paul, Duluth, etc., returning in time for his second recital, which will be given at Aeolian Hall, on Saturday afternoon, March 8. On this occasion Mr. Pauer will playing the following programme:

A major, Op. 120, No. 1 (Schub[illegible]); Two Variations, F minor (Haydn); Two Studies, A major and C major (Scarlatti); Andante, F major (Beethoven); Scherzo, E flat minor, Op. 4 (Brahms); Romance, D minor, Op. 32 (Schumann); Romance, F sharp major, Op. 28 (Schumann); Toccata, Op. 7, C major (Schumann); "Nuit d'ete" (Liapounow); Prelude, F minor, Op. 23 (Rachmaninoff); Sonate de Petrarca, No 123 (Liszt); Scherzo, E flat (Bernhard Koehler).

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 22 1913

Estal 1884

PAUER PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Max Pauer, the English violinist, made his Brooklyn debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music last night. He was billed to play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor, the number in which he made his American debut with the Philharmonic Society on Jan. 16, but an announcement was made that the Liszt Concerto in E flat major, would be substituted "owing to the large number of requests."

Mr. Pauer was accorded an enthusiastic welcome, being recalled nearly a dozen times after he had finished playing. He is a splendid artist, and justified the high esteem in which he is held abroad. His reading of the concerto was brilliant, displaying a facile technique and power coupled with a keen perception of musical values and subleties of interpretation.

The symphony which opened the concert was the Brahms "second symphony" in D major. Beethoven's overtures to Goethe's "Egmont" followed, and, after the Liszt concerto, the programme closed with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned, roguish manner, in rondo form."

The Strauss number provoked the most interest. It has been played so infrequently that it was practically a novelty. The extent to which the composer has wandered from "absolute music" was strikingly contrasted with the Brahms number. In his endeavor to get away from the beaten paths in music Strauss here has wandered so far afield it is hard to recognize the piece as music in its generally accepted sense.

Although it is admittedly "programme music," Strauss has not even supplied a story of the pranks of the thirteenth century rogue whose history he is depicting. In reply to one who asked for an explanation, he said: "Let them guess at the musical joke which the rogue has offered them." In defense of his reticence he added that he could not explain the incidents, as his explanation "might give rise to offense."

Once more the composer, of undoubted genius, has debased his gifts by speaking in a loud and interesting manner that which had better be left unsaid. Yet it is all done with brilliant effect and with humor of a Rabelaisian sort which vividly illustrates the subject. It is the subject, not the music, which is unworthy.

Dr. Muck's reading was admirable throughout and the orchestra played with its accustomed finesse and power.

From CITIZEN FEB 22 1913
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date

1884

PIANIST PAUER IN B'KLYN DEBUT

Appears With Dr. Muck's Orchestra.

GERMAN ARTIST WINS UNQUALIFIED SUCCESS

Liszt E-flat Major Concerto Is Finely [illegible]—Famous Boston Symphony Society Is Heard in Brilliant Interpretations.

Some of the finest playing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has exhibited here this season was greatly enjoyed last evening by a capacity audience at the Academy of Music. Interest in the concert was the greater in that Max Pauer, the German pianist, who has been winning high praise in Manhattan, made his first appearance in this borough. It was an eminently successful debut, too. Mr. Pauer was recalled time and again and forced to bow acknowledgement of applause that was evidently spontaneously enthusiastic.

Mr. Pauer was to have played the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor, which he resurrected and revivified as none had deemed possible in Manhattan. However, before the concert began it was announced from the stage that, in response to numerous requests, Mr. Pauer would substitute the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major. The substitution was more than acceptable, judging from the applause.

In addition Dr. Muck offered the Brahms Symphony. No. 2, in D major; the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The orchestra was at its best, especially as regards tone, which was luscious and satisfying throughout. The blending of tones was particularly effective in the second movement of the Brahms Symphony and in the "Egmont" overture, while the allegretto gracioso movement of the symphony was delightfully played. The interpretation of the overture was noble and eloquent. The mocking [illegible] of "Till Eulenspiegel" was well developed, and the entire reading was brilliant to a degree.

Mr. Pauer is director of the Stuttgart Conservatory, but his playing is anything but pedantic or merely scholarly, while as a concert personality he is unusually human and likable.

Splendidly equipped in technique, he has a singing tone of much beauty, while his pedal work at times is exquisite. His reading of the concerto last evening was marked by poetic insight and an admirable sense of balance. There was power, too, at command, and withal he mo[illegible] than justified the high reputation w[illegible] preceded him here, and was incr[illegible] by his appearances in Manhattan. [illegible] was no doubt that he scored an [illegible] ified success last night, and h[illegible] warmly welcomed here again.

Last night's concert was th[illegible] the Boston Symphony Orc[illegible] of five at the Academy.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 22 1913

[illegible] BOSTON SYMPHONY.

[illegible] Finely Played Programme, Pauer Substitutes Liszt for Mendelssohn.

[illegible] pianist new to Brooklyn was introduced at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices at the Academy of Music last night, and he played his w y to the unreserved admiration of the crowded house. Apart from this fact the concert was noteworthy for making possible the renewal of acquaintance under the most favorable conditions with three orchestral compositions pretty well known among the standard works drawn upon for concerts of this class. Max Pauer was the soloist, but he did not play the concerto for which he was programmed. He was to have given Mendelssohn's "Concerto No. 1 in G Minor," which he played at his first appearance in this country, a few weeks ago. It was announced from the stage last night that in response to several requests the Liszt's "Concerto in E Flat" would be substituted. It was brilliantly performed. Mr. Pauer has more the appearance and manner of an active business man than of a musical artist and his playing has the engaging quality of manly frankness. His interpretation of the Liszt music was forcefully direct, without, however, the breadth of style which has often been identified with this composition. It was fine, wholesome piano work in which a keen sense of touch, accuracy and executive finish were manifest. The approving plaudits of the audience recalled the pianist many times.

There is not much in common, musically, between Brahms' "Second Symphony," Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by the whimsical Mr. Strauss, which were the orchestral numbers of the programme. The symphony shows the most agreeable side of Brahms whose characteristic trait is discursive dalliance with incidental musical material so that his principal ideas do not always stand out as they should. There is evidence of this more particularly in the second movement of the symphony played last night, but in most respects it has absolute musical worth of a high order. The charming qualities of the graceful third movement were happily disclosed and the audience was alert in showing appreciation.

The customary conservatism of Dr. Muck's quiet authority as a conductor offered a surprise in the treatment of the noble "Egmont" overture which was taken at greater speed and with more rhythmic fervor that the performance it has usually received. There was less feeling for the majestic dignity of the music than we have been accustomed to. Of course, the correct treatment of Beethoven's music is an open question, subject to the individual opinions of conductors, but Dr. Muck's interpretation of the overture, while it was altogether admirable from his viewpoint, hardly puts the emphasis exactly where it belongs in revealing the musical character. The power of his hand was made plain enough however, in the interpretation of the Strauss piece as a finale to the concert. The ingenious cleverness of this quaintly extravagant musical tale is now generally recognized and it is becoming a familiar story.

At each concert of this series the persistent use of the green paneled parlor scene as a stage setting for the players is the subject of more and more criticism, and it suggests the question of how much right the audience has to expect consideration of its wishes in the matter of stage settings. Probably the continued use of the one scene is purposely arranged to avoid distracting the attention of the listener from the music itself. The management may feel that the surroundings of the orchestra should be of a negative character and make no appeal of itself to the interest of the audience. But the unchanging use of the one scene seems to be having the undesired effect of fixing the attention of the concertgoers upon that which is not supposed to claim attention. It would hardly be wise to change the setting for each concert but it might be well to so far take account of public taste and peace of mind as to provide a new permanent scene as a background for the orchestra.

Est... 884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N FEB 21 1913
Date

LECTURE RECITAL ON BOSTON SYMPHONY

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play in the opera house of that building to-night was set forth in lecture recital by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto, piano, as assisting artist. The compositions are the Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73, by Brahms; the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84, by Beethoven; the concerto No. 1, in G minor, for pianoforte, opus 25, by Mendelssohn and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss.

These selections were not taken up in their order. Mr. Elson said that while Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, is considered the greatest of his overture, yet he thinks this the best, because of the way in which it impresses the idea of liberty, "and when Beethoven wrote of liberty the word fired him to a flame, for he believed in the spirit of brotherhood of the equality of mankind." The "Egmont" of Beethoven must not be considered as an opera—more as a suite written for the play. The murder of Egmont united Holland for by it the people knew there would be no mercy for any one who was against Spain. The music was written for the classical orchestra and is without trombones, for that instrument had not then (1810) come into the symphonic orchestra. The opening chords represent the crushing power of brutality of Spain and the saraband form is chosen as typically Spanish. Mr. De Voto played the music up to the entrance of the 'cello, after which the motifs of the heroine and of Spain appear in contrast. Just before the "postscript"—the Coda—the saraband form and the feminine voice again are heard, then the lament and the voice of liberty.

When Beethoven was leading in the first rehearsal of "Egmont," the violinists rose in rebellion and said that no violin could play so high as that. Beethoven answered, "You must. It belongs in my picture." Now there is no difficulty with the violinists about such high notes. Mr. Elson bade his hearers observe tonight the shriek of the piccolo at the end of the Coda, used to express the joy of the people of Holland over their triumph. Mr. DeVoto gave excerpts very acceptably on the piano, although Mr. Elson said that it is impossible for a piano to adequately present this orchestral music.

"Till Eulenspiegel" was placed at the height of orchestral humor, withal is it medieval humor. Strauss was called "the greatest colorist in music." Mr. Elson said he could describe the Eulenspiegel figure only as "bobbing up in every part of the orchestra." In the end, the old German story is somewhat varied, and Till does not "cheat the hangman," but is hung, the one wild little squeak in the orchestra showing when this is accomplished.

The major portion of the concerto was played and formed a delightful interlude in the lecture recital. Mr. DeVoto had the solo instrument, while Mr. Elson took the orchestral score and the two pianos gave a definite and enjoyable interpretation. In his description, Mr. Elson spoke of Mendelssohn's mastery of the piano as an instrument. In closing, explanatory study was given to the Brahms number.

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR FOURTH CONCERT

Esta 84

The fourth and last but one of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. Since the orchestra was last here, Dr. Muck has been seriously ill; in fact, it was with difficulty thas he was able to get through the concert in Philadelphia a month ago, but he is entirely recovered now and has resumed his work.

The program he has arranged is half classic and partly romantic. The symphony is Mozart's "Jupiter" in C major. The second half of the program will comprise the "Siegfried Idyl," of Wagner; the concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor, by Mendelssohn, and Richard Straus' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

As already announced, the soloist will be Max Pauer, the German pianist, who has recently made such a sensation in New York.

From
Address
Date

Dr. Muck is rapidly recovering from the illness which prevented his going with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its annual Western trip. He was a sick man when he was in New York in January, and after his return to Boston his condition caused a great deal of anxiety among his friends. He has had, however, a complete rest in the country for the past two weeks, and is quite himself again. At one of the next pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 20 and 22, he will introduce a Symphony by Lenval, which is shortly to have its first performance in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

E... rk, 1884

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 18 1913

PAUER'S LOCAL DEBUT

German Pianist is Soloist at Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program of rare beauty and musical balance at the fourth of the season's concerts of that organization in the Academy of Music last night. From the clear classicism of the Mozart C Major Symphony to the rollicking "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" of Strauss, which is still so much Esperanto to the misunderstanding of many, the numbers chosen revealed the broad scope and the fine musicianship of this aggregation of men. Then, too, the evening served to introduce a new pianist in the person of Max Pauer, who came heralded by criticisms elsewhere as a distinct acquisition to the number of soloists appearing before the American public.

Pauer is a giant of a man with hands that look as though they might span the piano keyboard in two spreads, and with a suggestion of tremendous physical strength. He looks in no way like a musician, whatever that may mean, but rather sat at his instrument as a successful business man might sit at his desk, with no more mannerism and no more affectation, intent upon the work in hand and absolutely confident of his ability to see it through to a profitable conclusion. It was unfortunate that the medium which he chose—the Mendelssohn concerto—did not give him opportunity to reveal all his powers. He seems possessed of an almost limitless capacity for musical expression, his physical endowment leading naturally to tremendous climaxes while surprising at times, with the limpid delicacy of his pianissimos and the pearling clarity of his runs. He is an interpreter of the brain rather than of the emotion, yet there is no suggestion of pedantry in his work; it is, on the contrary, at times caressingly poetical and temperamental in the best sense of the word.

Dr. Muck's command of his orchestra grows more delightful with each appearance. It is, indeed, not a command; it is a playing with rather than a playing upon. There is a musical entente among them all that seems to make anything like directing unnecessary and the leader's work is more that of a man visualizing the sense of all than of one impressing his own personality by sheer force upon his organization. Perfection is, of course, unattainable, but the Boston Orchestra is coming gratifyingly close to the ideal.

k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Max Pauer, the pianist, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Although he is a man in his mid-forties and has been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout continental Europe, this is his first visit to America.

Moreover, he had the boldness to choose as the vehicle of his debut Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, a work which, by common consent, had long since been relegated to conservatory students.

Mr. Pauer is really as much of an Englishman as he is German, for although he was born of German-Austrian parents, his father having been Ernst Pauer, the musical pedagogue, his birthplace was London and in London he lived for fifteen years when he went to Carlsruhe to devote himself to his musical studies.

Four years later he returned to England, matriculated at Oxford, whence he was graduated with high honors. For ten years he was the professor of piano in the Cologne conservatory and for the last four years he has been head of the conservatory in Stuttgart. His appearance here with the Boston Symphony is awaited with much interest. The symphony at this concert will be Mozart's "Jupiter." The "Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Till Eutenspiegel" will be other numbers.

Estab

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MAX PAUER AT PIANO

Plays Hackneyed Mendelssohn Concerto at Symphony Concert.

To be unique, and consequently conspicuous, musicians, as well as those in other walks of life, are driven to all sorts of extremes. The playing of Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor has come, in this advanced state of musical development, to appear almost an infringement on the artistic rights of the public. Consequently when Max Pauer effected his American debut in the Mendelssohn work in New York city the innovation was regarded with considerable surprise. That he emerged from a repetition of this daring feat with flying colors, when he made his Philadelphia debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night, was due entirely to a musicianly ability that revealed new beauty in the hackneyed work. Perhaps, in his ignorance of conditions in this country, Pauer may be unaware of the threadbare quality of the G minor Concerto. At [illegible] rate, while he plays with a great deal of rhythmical precision, fine technique and an artistic appreciation of the possibilities for variety of style and expression inherent in this particular example of Mendelssohn's writing, it must be admitted that as an artistic offering the selection was a failure.

Every one knows Mendelssohn's ability and his limitations. There is much that is wonderfully beautiful and poetic in his music, but it is not of so compelling a character as to induce any public clamor on the subject of hearing it. Pauer is a giant in stature—a fact that made his trying with the Mendelssohn Concerto all the more absurd. Unsatisfactory as the medium for his debut was, he displayed such decided ability that we would like to hear him in a program of real music.

The orchestral portion of the program was given over to the Mozart C major Symphony, commonly called "Jupiter." It seems strange to call this the "Jupiter" Symphony. Not that symphonic names or programs have any definite or logical relation to the contents they aim to describe, but in this instance the name seems particularly inappropriate. A symphonic work utilizing so little of the powerful side of the orchestra (so little brass being employed) could scarcely be expected to convey any overwhelming or unusual impression, certainly nothing suggestive of "Jupiter."

Dr. Muck's playing of the "Liegfried Idyl" was a wonderfully expressive, beautiful piece of work, that brought an ovation to the distinguished leader so heartfelt that the musicians of the orchestra were obliged to share in the appreciation. The program was concluded with a [illegible] position of "Till Eutenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

E... k, 1884

[164]

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 18 1

Date

MAX PAUER IS SOLOIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

rk, 18

Pianist Gives Brilliant Interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto No. 1

'JUPITER' BY ORCHESTRA

MOZART

MOZART and Mendelssohn engaged the attention of the Boston Symphony at its concert in the Academy of Music last evening, and there was also briefer consideration for Richard Wagner, represented by his "Siegfried Idyll," and for Richard Strauss in the mood of "Till Eulenspiegel."

The program was attractive and well-balanced, and there was novelty in its make-up in the first appearance here of a distinguished pianist. This virtuoso is Max Pauer, new to America until the current season. Reports of Mr. Pauer's fine gifts had preceded him here. Judging from last night's performance, the heralding was not over-fulsome. Mr. Pauer's art is solid and authoritative. His technique is superlatively brilliant. He is by no means deficient in poetic imagination and there was keen introspection as well as polish and expert proficiency displayed in his handling of Mendelssohn's concerto No. 1, which he had selected for his debut here.

The keynote of rich romantic beauty was sounded in his interpretation of the gracious andante, and there was an exhibition of dashing digital dexterity in the rondo of the final movement. Mr. Pauer's art suggests German training and environment. He is, however, although of Tuetonic origin, an Englishman, haying been born in London in 1866.

Karl Muck and his eloquent orchestra gave an exquisite reading of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which was the chief instrumental number of the concert. Schumann ranked this work with eight symphonies of Beethoven, the immature No. 1 having been omitted, and he concluded his classification with the first symphony of Brahms. This is honorable company. It is a tribute also to the majesty and musicale importance of the "Jupiter." This title, by which Mozart's C minor is now best known, is further attestation of his noble and impressive significance. The delicacy and refinement of the Boston players was charmingly exemplified in the minuet, and the spirited finale glorified the spontaneous brilliancy of the composer's gayest manner in appealing style.

The conductor interpreted the "Sieg-fried Idyll" with requisite poetry and taste, while the resources of his orchestra were developed, but never for a moment taxed, in Strauss' whimsical "Till Eulenspiegel," which is beginning to rank as the most popular of the modern maestro's symphonic musical narratives.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

MUSICAL ATTRACTIONS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Pauer, the pianist, will make his first appearance in Washington with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its fourth concert, in the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 18. Although he is a man in his midforties and has been held for years in highest esteem in England and throughout continental Europe, this is Pauer's first visit to America. Krehbiel, Henderson, Aldrich, Finck, and the other New York critics proclaim him as one of the greatest pianists who has ever come to America. Mr. Pauer is a man more than 6 feet in height, and is really as much of an Englishman as he is a German, for although he was born of German-Austrian parents, his father having been Ernst Pauer, the eminent musical pedagogue, his birthplace was London, and in London he lived for fifteen years, when he went to Carlsruhe to devote himself to his musical studies. Four years later he returned to England, matriculated at Oxford, whence he was graduated with high honors. For ten years he was the professor of piano in the Cologne Conservatory, and for the past four years he has been head of the famous conservatory in Stuttgart. His appearance here with the Boston Symphony is awaited with much interest. The symphony will be Brahms', in D major, No. 2.

1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

1912

Date

MAX PAUER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Est 1884

Noted Pianist Is a Feature of the Fourth Philadelphia Concert.

PROGRAM.

Mozart—Symphony in C major, with Fugue Finale, "Jupiter" (K. 51).
Wagner.................."A Siegfried Idyl"
Mendelssohn—Concerto No 1, in G minor, for pianoforte, Op. 25.
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," Op. 28.
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist—Max Pauer.

Max Pauer, pianist, was heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music. He played Mendelssohn's Concerto No. 1, in G minor (Op. 25). His playing was, technically, a brilliant and eloquent exhibition, contrasting most favorably with the inartistic work of a number of recent soloists, but at the same time it failed to impress one as being in any sense inspired. Mr. Pauer's style might be described as black and white. As such it is delicate and interesting even to its smallest details. But it lacks color, absolutely. The concerto, to be sure, was but an indifferent vehicle for poetic expression, old-fashioned and almost childish as it is in its simplicity of thought; yet at moments such as are provided by the cantabile solo passages in the Andante movement one expects infinitely more in the way of poetry and color than Mr. Pauer provided. His playing was at its best in the delicate passages of the first movement, at its barest in the music-box-like Presto.

Without a doubt Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" made the most profound impression on the audience. Dr. Muck's reading was masterly and the orchestra outdid itself—in a word the sort of unimpeachable rendition that leaves nothing to be said. Equally perfect was the playing of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony (C major), although it was easily seen that at many points the interpretation went over the heads of the hearers. This was of course most obvious, and rather to be expected, in the complicated "Fugue Finale" so called, which has been characterized as "one of the most learned and one of the most spontaneously briliant things Mozart ever wrote."

The Symphony as a whole was played as it should be; that is, in the clear, restrained classic style, with no undue straining after dramatic climaxes that are not part of the work of modern effects of color. It is in this scholarly and reverent spirit that such a masterpiece should be approached. One would like to praise at length the rendering of the Andante movement, with its solemn beauty, characteristic of Mozart absolutely and yet prophetic of the age that was to follow. The concert ended with Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The evident zest of the players did not, however, redeem the work from the spirit of low comedy in which it is conceived.

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

FEB

Date

The New National Theater was crowded to its capacity yesterday afternoon when all the music-lovers in Washington turned out en masse to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A most representative and brilliant audience was present.

Mrs. Taft, who never misses one of these concerts, occupied a stage box, and she was accompanied by Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock.

Among the distinguished gathering present were the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. Leonard Wood, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Livingston Hunt, the Misses Sedgely, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. Aleshire, Mrs. Hichborn, Mr. and Mrs. Gaillard Hunt, Rear Admiral O'Neil, U. S. N., retired; Mrs. Richard Wainwright, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. John M. Biddle, Mrs. John McGowan, Miss Anna McGowan, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Frank Noyes, the Misses Noyes, Mr. Emile Montgomery, Miss Montgomery, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Johnson, Mrs. Spencer Wood, Mrs. John Magruder, Miss Natalie Magruder, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Nathaniel Wilson, Miss Wilson, Miss Stanton, Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Howe, Mrs. Wilmer, Mrs. Marion Butler, Mrs. Thomas Bayard, Mrs. George Mayre, Mrs. B. H. Buckingham, Miss Freeman, the Misses Card, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. C. B. Howry, and Miss Virginia Miller.

1884

---

ost Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 1912

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Max Pauer Plays the First Piano Concerto of Mendelssohn.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony, C major, "Jupiter"......Mozart
Siegfried Idyl ....Wagner
Concerto No. 1, in G minor ....Mendelssohn
Piano and orchestra.
"Till Eulenspiegel" ....Strauss

Est 884

It is sometimes held that the men of the Boston orchestra incline with particular avidity toward the "new thought' in music, and find it most fun to play the things that show off their skill in the solution of tantalizing problems of fingering, bowing and blowing. The programme of last evening at the Academy, beneath Doctor Muck's scholarly dictatorship, was a rebuke to the notion that the players from the Hub do not interpret the patriarch with affection and sincerity The dear old "Jupiter" symphony was played as though they loved it, and in every segment of the big band of 100 members infinite care was taken to lose none of the precise and delicate phraseology by any misplaced accent or any bungling or blurring.

What an admirable corps of second violins it is that so resonantly and buoyantly supported the uppermost choir in the charming minuet; and with what pure and limpid fluency all the voices together took up the lyric strains of the andante cantabile! This was a reading in which nobody was trying to do anything out of the way to attract attention from the matter to the manner thereof; it was so sane, so well poised and normal, and withal, so eminently Mozartian.

At the other end of the programme, however, was the irrepressible Till eulenspiegel with his bag of tricks, and here was the chance for every instrument to enjoy its rollicking, unrestrained holiday. Those who had comported themselves with such demure sobriety in the forepart of the evening were now as schoolboys released and leapfrogging it homeward.

The full sub-title of the work is "Merry Pranks After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner," and surely this Rondo is to symphonic music what Burn's Tam-o'-Shanter is to poetry in the wild and wanton, diabolic gleefulness of its uncurbed horseplay.

The Siegfried idyl was set forth in the restrained and appropriate temper of house music, even the brazen climaxes were not unduly blatant and deafening. and the prevailing spirit was that of the peaceful felicity of a heart and a home at peace. It was beautifully done, and as devoutly as though it were the utterance of a prayer. The applause was especially fervent after the exquisite decresendo had tapered away into silence, and no auditor seemed more generously pleased than our own Mr. Stokowski.

The splendid freshness and animation of Max Pauer puts one in mind of the best type of amateur oarsman, or some such blithe and breezy personality. The rousing, abounding vigor in the performance lifted the work itself above the plane of plausible mediocrity to which at times it is dangerously near. Mr. Pauer's playing exploited the poetry and the sentiment without lapsing into sentimentality. The confident ease with which he did everything—whirling through the runs of the presto-like Kohlemainen at the Olympic games—moved universal admiration. When at last the herculean frame rose from the piano stool, after the four movements in one, there was a prolonged storm of applause that meant many journeys from the wings to the conductor's dais, but there was not the irritating and mannerless scattering fusillade of handclapping that there used to be. This was partly because the piano was promptly shoved away, and chiefly because it is realized that the rule of no encores at these concerts is not to be infringed. Mr. Pauer after his effort seemed as fresh as a Killarney rosebud; he is a physical as well as a pianistic miracle.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1913

Esta 1884

Society to Attend Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National.

A crowded house, including the music lovers and society people of Washington, will fill the New National this afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Mrs. Taft will occupy the box next to the stage and will have with her, Mrs. Marshall Field, of Chicago and Washington, and Mrs. Nathaniel Francis.

In boxes and in the audience will be the French Ambassador and Mme Jusserand, the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Wickersham, the Swedish Minister, Norwegian Minister and Mme. Bryn, and others from the Diplomatic Corps, and from resident and official society.

—✣—

The dinner given at the French embassy last night by the Ambassador and Madame Jusserand, for the President and Mrs. Taft, was truly a notable event. In contrast to the rich splendor of the jewels worn by the women present, was the simplicity of table decoration, and that of the drawing rooms throughout.

The group of marble statuettes representing classic figures and mounted upon bases of black marble were used upon the table, and alternated with clusters of flowers in vases.

Invited to meet the President and Mrs. Taft were the Russian Ambassador and Madame Bakhmeteff, the Japanese ambassador, Senator and Mrs. Francis G. Newlands, Senator and Mrs. George Peabody Wetmore, Senator Augustus O. Bacon, Congressman and Mrs. James R. Mann, Congressman Gillett, Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, Mrs. Richard H. Townsend, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Brigadier General Crozier, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Beekman Winthrop; Major Rhodes, aide to the President; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, Miss Boardman, Miss Patten, the French Counselor and Madame de Peretti de la Rocca; the French Military Attache and Countess de Chambrun, and Louis de Sartiges, third French secretary.

—✣—

---

m HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Est 8

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY PLAYED BY ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony, with Max Pauer as Soloist, Appears at National Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its series of five concerts for Washington yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. The music lover could be afforded no greater pleasure than to hear Brahm's D major symphony given by an orchestra of such high excellence as the Boston Symphony, conducted by an artist of such power as Dr. Muck.

Dr. Muck showed yesterday not only the fullest sympathy for the work in accuracy of detail—phrasing, balance of parts and dynamic niceties—but he gave the composition emotional life and vigor. Dr. Muck can always be counted upon in his performances to reflect the composer as faithfully as possible. This is not to say that his interpretation is not subjective—that he does not infuse his personality into the interpretation. He is, however, a too scholarly musician not to master thoroughly the composer's intent. He keeps to the nice line between exaggerated temperamental or emotional emphases and cold intellectual accuracy.

In this symphony Brahms gives us glympses of melodic possibilities rather than long sustained melodies. He also employs, largely, the device of antiphonal melodies. Themes answer themes as birds in a forest; or the same theme is tossed from one instrument to another receiving a richly varied coloring. It is chiefly in a cheerful vein and with the exception of the andante movement, about which there hangs a spirit of mystery, the themes are clearly marked. Listened to closely it would be an education in masterly contrapuntal writing.

That the Brahms symphony was put along side of the Beethoven overture to Egmont was doubtless not intended to point any contrasts between these two masters, who are spoken of together in these days as of equal greatness. But it must be felt that while Brahms is structurally and perhaps th[illegible]atically Beethoven's equal that in emotional depth and passionate human quality Beethoven is immeasurably above the other.

Mr. Max Pauer raised a veritable storm of applause over his masterly piano work in Mendelssohn's G minor concerto. Mr. Pauer carried off the difficult presto movement with the ease of the perfect technician. The beautiful andante movement, in which the concerted work falls chiefly between the piano and the lower strings, was played with great warmth of feeling by Mr. Pauer. Although in a concerto the opportunity for individualizing the solo work is limited, it could not fail to be evident to all listeners that Mr. Pauer is an artist of the highest rank. His exquisite

---

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 16 1913

1884

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the current season will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the New National Theater at 4:30. Dr. Muck has quite recoverel from the illness which prevented his conducting at the January concert and which kept him a prisoner in the house for nearly three weeks after that. He will be at his usual post.

He has arranged an exceedingly interesting programme, the first half of which is modern classicism and the second half romantic. The symphony will be Brahms' in D major No. 2, a work not unfamiliar to Washington audiences, as the orchestra has played it several times in past years. It displays Brahms in his brightest mood as a tonal melodist and occupies a place in Brahms' symphonies similar to that held by Beethoven's eighth symphony among the immortal nine.

The second half of the programme will comprise Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Mendelssohn's concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

The solist, as already announced, will be Max Pauer, the German pianist, who has recently been the sensation of the musical season in New York. His choice of the Mendelssohn concerto is a bold one, for this work has for many years been relegated to conservatory pupils. His success with it is only another illustration of how often great works are neglected for the lack of the right artist to interpret them. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2; Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Mendelssohn's concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor; Weber's overture. "Euryanthe."

Mr.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 19 1913

1884

An unusually brilliant audience attended the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater. Mrs. Taft entertained in her box Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock.

The German Ambassador entertained, among others, in his box, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, and the counselor of the embassy and Mme. Haniel.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle entertained in her box the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Leonard Wood, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe.

With Miss Williams, among others, were Mrs. Nagel, wife of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Mrs. Hitt.

Mrs. I. T. Mann entertained Mrs. Talmage, Mrs. Rogers, Miss Pendleton, Mrs. Rixey, and Mrs. Duff.

In Mrs. McMillan's box Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained, among others, Mme. von Herwarth and Mrs. Clarence Wilson.

Mr. and Mrs. Lisner entertained in their box Dr. and Mrs. Foote, Mrs. Robb, and Miss Hartman.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Wickersham, Mr. Henry White, Countess Scherr Thoss, Mrs. Samuel Emmons, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. John McGowan, Miss McGowan, Mrs. Hichborn, Mrs. Lurton, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Peckham, Mrs. J. B. Aleshire, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Miss Card, Miss Freeman, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Thomas F. Bayard, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Spencer Wood, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Wilmer, Miss Wilmer, Miss Nathalie Magruder, Mrs. John Magruder, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Miss Aileen Bell, Mrs. Emile Montgomery, Mrs. George T. Marye, Mrs. Perry Johnson, Mr. Christian Hemmick, Miss Marion Stevens, Mrs. Beale Howard, Miss Letterman, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Charles Fairfax, Mr. Schmolck, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Catherine Jennings, Mrs. Alexander Magruder, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Miss Lee, Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. George McLean, Mrs. Ely, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Oge, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. George Bettis.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

E 1884

GREAT TRIUMPH FOR MAX PAUER

Boston Symphony, Under the Direction of Dr. Muck, at Lyric.

Another great concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the fourth of the present season, given last evening at the Lyric by Dr. Karl Muck and his 100 superb musicians. The program, as announced, included the Mendelssohn piano-concerto in G minor, but this was replaced by the Schumann piano-concerto in A minor.

The opening number of the program placed by the Schumann piano-concerto was the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D. It was performed splendidly and so heard at its best. The Beethoven overture to Goethe's tragedy Egmont followed, and its massiveness and power put the whole performance on the Beethoven plane of the best in musical art.

Then came the wonderful Schumann piano-concerto, which was first made familiar to Baltimoreans by Madame Nannette Falk-Auerbach, and then by the musical renditions of Karl Faeltor, now of Boston. It was given a perfect rendition last evening by Max Pauer, the brother of Emil Pauer, the well-known orchestral director.

This concerto itself is at once a gem and a marvel in concerted music for piano and orchestra. After a modest beginning it immediately begins to tell its beautiful musical story, employing the lyric and dramatic elements in repeated contrasts and combinations, showing its great variety, making special and novel use of the unexpected, as well as the expected, in the fine syncopation for which this concert is so well remembered by musical natures.

Mr. Pauer's playing of the work was a great triumph in every respect. He has, to begin with, a noble and dignified stage presence, which captures an audience at his entrance, and even afterward continues to hold it for him. Powerful playing is naturally expected from him, but he is as tender, delicate and noncompelling as he is noble and powerful. His technique is splendid, but never forced or pushed forward. All he does is easily done and never for effect. He is simply a giant in music, entirely capable of doing any work worthy of such an artistic personage. It goes for the saying that he was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled.

The closing of the concert with the Berlioz Roman Carnival overture, after hearing the Egmont overture and the Schumann piano concerto, almost transported the musical listeners to the times of the old Peabody Orchestra, which actually suffered in the minds of the general public for giving those great works so often to the exclusion of trite and commonplace favorites.

Altogether, the concert proved another rare opportunity to musical students now in the city of forming lines of concert musical taste.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Estab 1884

MAX PAUER TO BE GUEST AT SUPPER

Boston Symphony Soloist Will Be Entertained At Florestan Club.

Max Pauer, German pianist, will make his first appearance in Baltimore this evening, when he will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season at the Lyric.

Mr. Pauer only recently came to America. He made a deep impression at his initial performance on this side of the water and this success he has duplicated at all his subsequent appearances. His number tonight will be the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn. After the concert, he will be entertained at a buffet supper by members of the Florestan Club at Club headquarters on North Charles street.

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Orchestra, has selected a program which it is thought will prove unusually attractive. It will include Brahms' D major Symphony No. 2, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Berlioz's highly-colored "Roman Carnival."

The Mendelssohn Concerto will be the real feature of the evening, not only because it will introduce Mr. Pauer locally, but also because it is seldom played by contemporaneous virtuosi.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 20 1913

Esta 1884

MAX PAUER SCORES AT LYRIC CONCERT

Pianist Delights Large Audience In Interpretation Of Schumann.

DR. KARL MUCK DIRECTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Overtures In Striking Manner.

Max Pauer, the noted English pianist, who is visiting this country for the first time in the thorough maturity of his artistry, although for years he has been successful as a concert player in Europe, was the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which took place under the dircetion of Dr. Karl Muck at the Lyric last evening.

Although born in London, Mr. Pauer's recent traditions are entirely German, as much of his musical life has been spent in Cologne and Stuttgart. His performance last evening of the beautiful and extremely romantic Schumann piano concerto, which at the last moment was substituted for that of Mendelssohn, was one of the most entirely satisfying things that have been heard in Baltimore for years.

Plays With Quality.

This artist's playing has, for these more modern days of fiery technique and cold brittleness of attack, many very unusual qualities. It is essentially lyric playing, characterized by a noble sentiment and a deep appreciation of the exquisite lieder quality of the work he was interpreting.

The Schumann concerto is particularly grateful as far as the pianist is concerned, with melodies that suggest voices singing, lovely airs running through it that demand the softest possible touch as well as a sustained pianissimo, beautiful episodes on the strings and the wood and occasional passages for the horns, above which the piano seems to reach out yet complement at the same time, and in the playing of this work Mr. Pauer exhibited the most exquisite facility.

His touch is like velvet, but it is always essentially firm and ringing. Last evening the player seemed deeply impressed by the poetry and telling charm of the composition he was presenting. His performance was moving and brilliant, and while his work was so appealing and so filled with sentiment in the broader passages, it suggested certain hidden fires that would seem to indicate that in other works of a more compelling nature he might have all the forcefulness and power that the entirely lyric quality of the Schumann work offered no opportunity for him to display.

The second Brahms symphony, which was the principal number on what proved to be one of the most agreeable programs of the season, is a very important composition and showed a particular phase of the work of the Boston orchestra that was very striking. It is largely scored for the strings. There are especially beautiful episodes for the violoncellos, fine sweeping passages for the violins and the daintiest tipping melodies imaginable throughout nearly all of the movements. Strangely enough, the slow movement, often so vital in the Brahms compositions, while opening with a most charming melodic incident, seemed last evening the most rambling of the four, but both the presto and the allegro con spirito, with its stirring climax, made the deepest impression on the great audience.

The notable thing, however, about the performance lay in the fact that the greater portion of this symphony is played in "half voice," if one may so express it, in that perfectly subdued tone that requires such extreme skill on the part of the musicians in order that this tone may remain firm and pure and true. The perfection of the work of these many players in this regard made their rendition of the symphony especially striking.

Two overtures completed this entertainment, the "Egmont," by Beethoven, which was played before the concerto and given a very appreciative and accentuated interpretation by Dr. Muck, and the stirring "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz, one of the first composers to do very much with "scoring" as the term is understood today.

J. O. L.

Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Esta 84

PIANIST ALSO AN OXFORD GRADUATE

Pauer, Known As Musician Of Distinction In Europe, On First Trip Here.

Max Pauer, the German pianist, will make his debut in Baltimore tonight at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Mendelssohn's G Minor Concerto. The orchestral numbers are Brahms' Second Symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

Max Pauer, who, by the way, is over six feet tall, is a son of the celebrated pianist, composer and editor of music, Ernst Pauer. He was born in London in 1866 and lived there until he was 15. Then he went to Carlsruhe and began the systematic study of the piano and composition, his principal teacher being Vincenz Lachmer.

After four years in Carlsruhe he returned to England, matriculated at Oxford University, from which he graduated with honors, in the meantime continuing his piano studies with his father. He was engaged to be head of the piano department of the Cologne Conservatory in 1887, and there he remained 10 years, and in 1908 he was made director-general of the Stuttgart Conservatory.

In all of these years he did much concert work and is well known as a musician of distinction in Europe. Although he is well on in the forties, he is now visiting this country for the first time. His particular hobby is Mendelssohn.

Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

TO INTERPRET MENDELSSOHN

Establi 34

MAX PAUER

HE will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric this evening, when he will play the Mendelssohn piano concerto. Mendelssohn is one of Mr. Pauer's hobbies.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establ , 1884

PAUER GIVES DELIGHT

Noted Pianist The Soloist With The Boston Symphony.

SCHUMANN CONCERTO

omposition Substituted For The Mendelssohn—Brahms' Symphony Given Pleasing Reading.

The fourth concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, took place last evening at the Lyric Theatre, the soloist being the noted pianist, Max Pauer, who, in the maturity of his art, is visiting this country for the first time.

Mr. Pauer, though German in his traditions, is English by birth and proved to be one of the most delightful players that have been heard here in many years. At the last moment, and very fortunately, the Schumann concerto was substituted for the one of Mendelssohn which this artist was to play, and of this appealing and romantic and entirely grateful work he gave a most moving performance, playing with a lightness of touch, a surety and an appreciative and moving sentiment that were really admirable.

Mr. Pauer is an extremely facile player, with that velvety touch and that pure, sustained and ringing tone so rarely heard nowadays. It is quite a different thing from the thunderous playing so often m with at modern concerts, so that his re tion of the very romantic Schumann n ber, with its many graceful e gesting voices singing, was quite a re tion. It has been many years sinc have heard just this particular piano playing, which was charac a charm and an elegance that was en moving.

The symphony was the second Brahms, and this number showed the great orchestra in one of its happie If it is not permitted to say Brahms "at his best," it is sible to say that the second Brahms in one of his most appealing and agreeable moods, for this work is so full of delightful lieder passages, such charming phrases and such universal as to be a very real joy. It is scored ve heavily for the strings, which play a large part in presenting the various melo with which it is so replete, and it was given a very interesting and sympathetic reading by Dr. Muck last evening.

Preceding the concerto the Be ove "Egmont" overture was played with a modern spirit and with much accent, and the concert closed with the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, always an interesting composition and one which shows the first beginnings of the more modern use of the various instruments in orchestral scoring.

J. O. L.

The First Esta
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the wo

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Es 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT WEDNESDAY

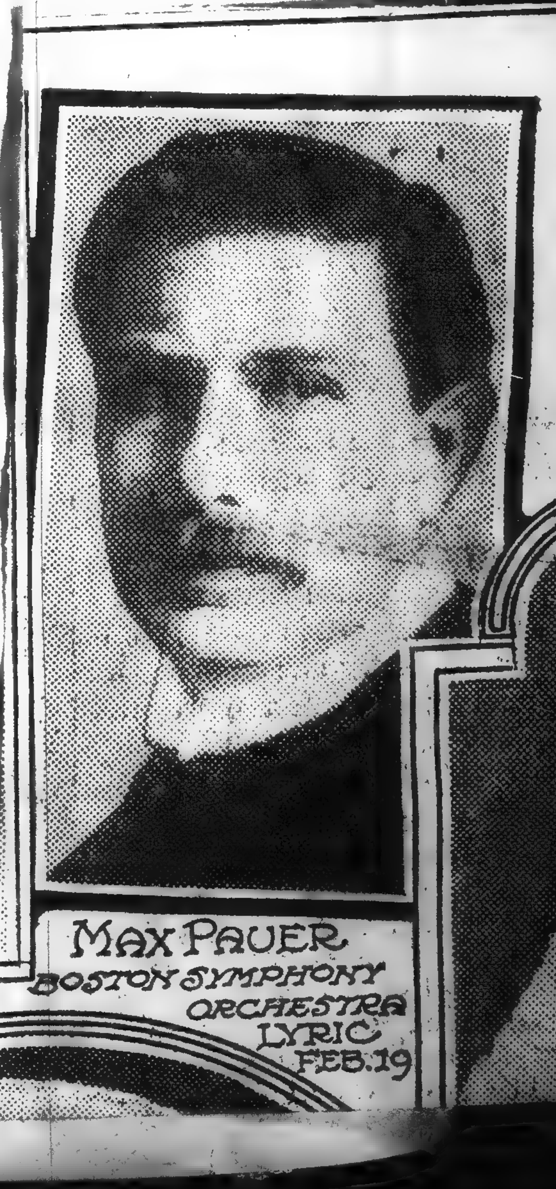
Orchestra To Give Good Program At The Lyric; Director Muck Well Again.

The fourth and last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the current season will be given next Wednesday in the Lyric Theater. Dr. Muck has recovered from the illness which has kept him a prisoner in the house for three weeks and will be at his usual post.

He has arranged an interesting program, the first half of which is modern classicism and the second half romantic. The symphony will be Brahms' in D-major No. 2, a work not unfamiliar to Baltimore audiences, as the Orchestra has played it several times in past years. It displays Brahms in his brightest mood as a total melodist and occupies a place in Brahms' symphonies similar to that held by Beethoven's eighth symphony among the immortal nine. The second half of the program will comprise Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," Mendelssohn's concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor, and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival."

The soloist, as already announced, will be Max Pauer, the German pianist, who has recently been the sensation of the musical season in New York. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D-major No. 2, Brahms
Overture, "Egmont" .... Beethoven
Concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor..... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Roman Carnival" .. Berlioz



Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO COME

Next Wednesday's Recitals To Interpret Modern Classicism And Romanticism.

Of more than ordinary interest will be the program to be given at the Lyric next Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth of its present series of five Baltimore concerts. The first half of the performance will be devoted to modern classicism and the second half to the romantic. The soloist will be Max Pauer, the German pianist, who recently has won many triumphs on this side of the Atlantic.

The symphony will be Brahms' D Major No. 2, which has been heard frequently here in recent years. This work shows Brahms in his brightest mood as a tonal melodist.

The other numbers will be Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," Mendelssohn's concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor, and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival."

The playing of the concerto will be received with much interest because of the fact that this work in recent years has seldom been given on the public concert stage, having in that time been played mostly within the walls of conservato

---

ADVERTISER,
MARCH 1, 1913

NO SOLOISTS AT THE SYMPHONY

CURRENT PROGRAMME ENTIRELY ORCHESTRAL

MacDowell's "Indian Suite" of Strong Calibre, a Worthy Number in American Orchestral Repertoire.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Debussy. "La Mer."
Dukas. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
MacDowell. Indian Suite.
Goldmark. "Spring" overture

We are always pleased when the symphony concert is entirely orchestral. Our great orchestra is attractive enough without the aid of either vocalist, or pianist, or violinist, although the last two fit in well enough in concertos. Yesterday afternoon the programme leaned somewhat towards the modern French school, although the two Gallic numbers which began the concert were very different from each other. Dukas gave a very graphic and intelligible picture. Debussy did not.

We have heard Debussy's sea-pictures now four times. We are not growing reconciled to his treatment of Father Neptune. Instead of finding here:—

> "The sea! the sea! the open sea!
> The ever-fresh, the ever-free."

we discover only what Shakespeare called "a sea of troubles," or possibly that sea, full of slimy things, that Coleridge pictured in his "Ancient Mariner." There are other composers who have written about the ocean, and it is but fair to compare them with Debussy. The majesty of the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony is far greater than anything to be found in this work, although Rubinstein gets rather tame before he spins off his seven movements. Mendelssohn suggests the torpid dullness of some of Debussy's work (intentionally) in the first part (introduction) of his "Becalmed at Sea," but he gives a joyous ocean trip in the succeeding "Happy Voyage." The first twenty measures of his "Hebrides" overture, with the ceaseless play of the waves upon the basaltic walls of Fingal's cave, upon the lonely island, are worth the whole of this affected picture. Max Bruch's Viking sailors, in "Frithjof," go far beyond the suffering passengers with Debussy. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture causes this work to shrivel up altogether.

Possibly there is a nausea-motif, a steward-motif, a basin-motif, an emptiness-motif, and a few other figures of this kind, in the work, which we did not grasp, which might make the meaning clearer. Frenchmen are proverbially poor sailors, and Debussy proves this in his tone-picture. The constant use of the muted tones of the horn, and the everlasting plaints of the oboe may be understood at once if we but change the title of the work to "Mal de Mer!" No! Debussy is more at home in picturing stagnant pools under decaying castles (vide "Pelleas and Melisande") than in portraying the salt air and spindrift of the ocean.

The work is one movement short of the symphonic number. If this composition had come anywhere but at the beginning of the concert, many of the audience would have added the fourth movement of themselves. Yet, viewed purely as orchestral color, one cannot but commend the delicacy and or-

MacDowell's "Indian Suite" was of stronger calibre. The galloping warriors of the third movement are graphic enough and the brooding of the Dirge is a good contrast in the varied picture. It is evident at times that these Indians have pitched their wigwams in Bayreuth; they belong to the Wagnerian tribe, and are ready to discharge muted horn figures at the unwary traveler, or to scalp him with a clarinette, on the slightest provocation.

The work is a worthy number in the American orchestral repertoire. We are glad that Dr. Muck has revived it, and the audience seemed glad also. Yet one criticism must be made. It is folly to expect a national opera of American Music to be founded upon Indian themes. These themes are too local, or tribal, to mean anything definite to the American auditor. If we heard an unknown Irish, or Scottish, or Hungarian folk-theme, we would probably be able to identify its nationality on a first acquaintance, but when Puccini allowed the home-sick miner in the first act of "The Girl of the Golden West" to sing a strange tune, we, in common with all the other American critics, needed to be told that it was an Indian theme. That is not the material from which folk-songs or national music are made.

The first movement of the Indian Suite seemed very noble, but there was inequality in the other movements. The Dirge seemed a trifle too long for its rather simple and unrelieved lamenting.

The war-dance and portions of the village festival were read in so fiery a manner that Dr. Muck might have been brandishing a tomahawk instead of a mere baton. The Suite won much applause.

Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" was something very different from Debussy's "Ocean." Here one could follow at ease every part of the picture. It was good fun to hear the broom-stick coming to life, to watch its ceaseless coming and going with pails of water, to hear the apprentice sawing it in two, to note the two halves starting, contrapuntally, for more water, to finally hear the master sorcerer breaking the charm and causing the broomsticks to become inanimate again.

The larger part of this is done upon the bassoons, and they deserve hearty commendation for the manner in which they were played. The piccolo also gave its proper spice to the picture. It was a piquant and refreshing bit of programme-music that belongs with "Till Eulenspiegel" in the scant repertoire of comical orchestral music. Yet all the great masters have contributed something, in some form or other, to the school of humor in music.

Goldmark's "Spring" overture was given over to sweet melodies, to pipings and warblings, to a general feeling of comfort and happiness. We can only say that we know of no such Spring in Boston. If the composer wishes to write a Spring overture for this climate he must use bass tubas, bassoon, bass-clarinette, trombones and other dark-toned or threatening instruments. He must have figures descriptive of foot-baths, mustard plasters, chest-protectors, troches, rubber boots, umbrellas, etc. We found none of these things portrayed in Goldmark's suave and pleasant overture.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 1,

DEBUSSY'S "LA MER" HEARD

Brilliant Performance by Symphony Orchestra at 16th Public Rehearsal.

GOLDMARK'S 'IN THE SPRING'

MacDowell's "Indian" Suite and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" Given.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

"La Mer." Three Orchestral Sketches..Debussy
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice"..............Dukas
"Indian" Suite..........................MacDowell
Overture "In the Spring"...........Goldmark

This was an exceedingly interesting concert and the performance was brilliant throughout. The absence of a soloist was not felt. In these symphony concerts the orchestra is the great soloist, even when it accompanies some pianist, violinist or singer, that is, when Dr. Muck is the conductor.

We are told that the Emperor Caligula was "scared with strange illusions and fantastical imaginations: as who among the rest, dreamed upon a time that he saw the very form and resemblance of the sea talking with him." There were moments yesterday when the hearer was convinced that the sea had talked with Debussy. In the first sketch there was the suggestion of the "ample, smiling face, dash'd with the sparkling dimples of the sun"; also of the loneliness of the ocean: "something thou ever seek'st and seek'st, yet never gain'st." In the third sketch "Dialogue of Wing and Sea," there are a few overpowering effects, and the hearer is shaken by the "serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter and undertones of dis-ace to "Leaves of Grass": "The spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." Rimsky-Korsakoff, the sailor, puts us on board of Sinband's tossing ship in "Scheherazade" and finally wrecks us. There is a fine seascape in the same composer's "Sadko," and there is pictorial music in Paul Gilson's "La Mer," which was played here many years ago.

Debussy's impressions are too many; or variations of a few impressions. The monotony of the ocean, calm or enraged, is its greatest fascination, but the ear is tired quicker than the eye. There is no reason why any one of these three sketches should not be longer or shorter. The form admits of extension or curtailment.

The sketches are chiefly interesting as remarkable achievements in color. There are expressive motives, but as a rule they owe their expressiveness to blends of timbres. The perpetual dynamic swelling and falling, the frequent anticipation of a close that does not come, the stretches of preparation that lead to nothing and the relaxation that reminds one of a pugilist sparring for wind, must surely irritate the man that insists on something definite and determined. Judged by his own methods—and no sane person disputes the sincerity of them—Debussy has not succeeded in "La Mer" as in the "Nocturnes," "Iberia," or "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune." And yet, after all the objections are made, the hearer remembers a few pages that are of rare poetic charm and some that are wildly powerful. How far we are from Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" with its ending that reminds one of the joyous arrival of a Nantasket boat bringing hungry husbands from the city! This same Mendelssohn in his "Hebrides," however, gives certain impressions of a seascape that are as vivid as any related by Debussy.

When "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" was first played here nearly 10 years ago—Alas, my Posthumus, the fleeting years!—it was characterized by everybody as a "clever" composition. It is clever, but it no longer surprises, and when music is first of all clever, it soon loses its freshness and seems old. The Scherzo may already be classed among "amusing" pieces, and some may find pleasure in trying to find a close, interlinear connection between the music and Goethe's poem. The brilliance of the performance was worth a journey.

MacDowell thought that the occasional similarity of Indian melodies, which served him for thematic material in his Suite, to Northern European themes bore direct testimony in corroboration of Thorfinn Karlsefni's Saga. Hence, possibly, the apparent Scandinavian mood of this or that page in the "Indian" Suite. Here and there is a reminder of MacDowell's Scottish ancestry, for a man cannot wholly escape from himself even when in imagination he becomes a member of another race.

All this is of secondary, indeed, of trifling importance. The Suite is picturesque, imaginative, beautiful and noble. Many new voices, since it was composed, have clamored for recognition. Composers have arisen and been hailed by excitable persons as path-breakers and prophets. Already some of the path-breakers are seen plodding on worn old dusty roads, and there are prophets who have lost the gift and seem like any clairvoyant on the third floor (Don't ring"). MacDowell's suite has gained with the years. Its spell is stronger than before. In structure, melodic and harmonic appeal, orchestral expression; by its directness, artistic simplicity and restraint, and convincing sincerity, it holds commanding position in the literature of music.

The overture of Goldmark abounds in conventional joyousness that is associated with spring in more favored lands than New England. Birds chirp and twitter. There are hints at the natural phenomena appropriate to the season. Everything is smoothly expressed in an orthodox and Viennese manner.

The program of the concerts next week will include Sinding's Symphony in D minor and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." Mr. Ysaye will play a concerto by Vivaldi and Saint-Saens's concerto in B minor.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MARCH 1, 1913.

DEBUSSY'S "LA MER" IS FINELY PLAYED

Contains Some Elements of Impressionism.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and MacDowell's Suite Given.

Dr Muck's choice of music at the 16th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was in the nature of an exposition upon the use of a "program" in composition. Debussy's three orhcestral sketches, "The Sea," were played for the first time since Dr Muck introduced them here five years ago. The titles, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of the Waves," "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," are given merely as hints to the hearer of what is impressionistic treatment. Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is after Goethe's ballad. MacDowell's Indian suite No. 2 is based upon Indian themes which had definite emotional significance to those who sang them, and finally Goldmark's overture, "In Spring."

[168]

To compare Debussy's music of the sea with that of Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Rimsky-Korsakoff or Paul Gilson, and to say that only this or that work penetrates and reveals the spirit of the deep is to express an individual preference. In how far the memory of Debussy's sub-titles may aid the imagination in coordinating the sounds of the orchestra with the remembered pictures of the ocean's moods may again be a matter for debate. Had the first number read instead: "From Noon to Night Upon the Sea," would the incongruity have been apparent to many, or would it have existed at all. Or would the second number fall of all illusion if it were named frolics of the winds instead of the waves, or if it bore the title of the third: "Dialogue of Wind and Sea?"

In his volume of essays called "Akkorde," Felix Weingartner has pointed out the truth that an orchestra of the most complicated and monstrous apparatus cannot reach the goal of the programmatic composer, and define for us in music the things which can be defined only by a more concrete medium, as by language, painting or sculpture.

Approval, indifference or aversion to Debussy's music—and there are some whom it inspires to a deadly, a choleric repugnance—cannot find an origin so much in its degree of graphic depiction of the sea, as in its power as sheer sound to induce pleasurable nervous stimuli to a majority of hearers, and for a minority, to appeal also to the intellect with some semblance of form. But the general public is not grievously concerned in this.

As sheer music Debussy has the most to say in the second movement. The lines of his development of material are clearer and firmer; his imagination has more plasticity, a greater versatility and more of the fugitive and intangible charm in subtle invention, in the contrast of novel, piquant, ravishing color tints which make the score of his "Pelleas" and of certain orchestral works imperishable.

Because Debussy speaks through a tonality built upon the augmented tread, and hears the voices of stopped trumpets and horns, does not necessarily assign him to outer darkness and the gnashing of teeth. There are moments when in his idiom he conjures up to the hearer mysteries beyond the dross of a world weighed and measured by the senses, such as passages upon a diatonic scale stop short of doing. Yet to others the creed of the elect demands a half step between the third and fourth and seventh and eighth degrees.

It is possible to hear this music and to feel the vastness, the eternal solitude, the terror and fury and the thousand caprices of the waters of the great deep, that have been through the ages, and shall be. And it is equally possible to find here an expression of the mind which, ever weary and baffled at the things of artifice, of convention and of the visible, searches within for the mystery of the unknown. It may be music of the sea. Part of it is not the speech of the most imaginative Debussy, but there are pages, particularly in the first and second movements, that have the power to transport, in and of themselves.

Dr Muck played the work with a fine sense of balance between the actual and the ideal. The outlines were never too obvious, but were drawn by a sensitive hand. There was perspective and proportion, and, above all, imagination.

Dukas' scherzo was played with surpassing virtuosity. MacDowell's beautifully romantic suite reflected its varying moods, and the overture made a spirited conclusion.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 1,

POTENT WORKS BY SYMPHONY

Brilliant Performance of Vigorous Music

BY OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Muck has arranged few more interesting programmes than that which he offered at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There were exceptionally brilliant performances of Debussy's "La Mer," Dukas' orchestral humoresque, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice", after the fantastical poem of Goethe; MacDowell's Indian Suite; Goldmark's "Spring" overture. The effect of these same performances was also very interesting.

Ten years ago the scherzo of Dukas was wonderful. Today it is already aging. Goldmark's music was fresh and captivating in its vigor, beauty, and simplicity, just a very few years ago. It has commenced to retreat in the perspective of time. Debussy's "La Mer" is still new. It is at least unusual enough for audiences to be only now at the place where they commence to grasp its plan and its substance. How much longer will this music last, when the machinery of Debussy, a new patent of his own profitable manufacture, shall have been exploited far and wide on the market? It is a pleasant thing to be able to say that the youngest music heard yesterday afternoon was the poetic suite of MacDowell. And certainly all of the music was heard at its just value, so far as performance was concerned. The orchestral performances, one and all, were admirable in the highest degree. The compositions themselves have been accounted during the last decade as exceptionally effective items of the modern orchestral repertoire.

Elusive but Not Convincing

The most amazing music was that of Debussy. This music is the limit of impressionism. You may listen, and imagine that you hear the vague and marvelous murmuring of the sea, "from dawn till noon on the ocean," "frolics of the waves," "dialogue of wind and sea," but you can fancy a hundred things as the accompaniment of these vague and delightful sounds you may immerse yourself pleasurably in the exquisite and strangely shifting rythms and orchestral colors. None more subtle. So far, no music has been invented—and we use this word with deliberate intent—no music has yet been invented that is more elusive, more of the gossamer stuff that dreams are made of. And yet this music does not, at this day, wholly convince. It may do so tomorrow, but we believe that even irreckonable posterity will rather give the prize for sea music to the last part of Debussy's "Nocturnes" for orchestra—"Les Sirenes." There is indeed the mysterious, the terribly beautiful song of the sea. But as an example of con mmate individual skill, as an in [illegible] of Debussy's peculiar idiom [illegible] to the utmost possible extent, [illegible] therefore, perhaps, as an argument directly against Debussy's present tendencies, "La Mer" stands supreme. The composer has done nothing more remarkable, so far as style is concerned. But the reason we distrust him is that he is so uncannily master of his means. We can believe him to be transcribing a dream, an discover that every single note is carefully prearranged as the vario elements of a tale by Edgar Allan P And we fear that there is more of finite subtlety in the adjustment colors and values than of authentic spiration, in this masterpiece of pr ent day musical craft. But if only a virtuoso piece for modern orches and for the superbly perfected imaginative reading given the m by Dr. Muck, this performance wo have been worth travelling a long tance to hear.

Dukas knows his orchestra thorou ly, but the inherent commonness of his musical thought is not wholly obscured by its extremely effective setting. The piece is witty, in its way. It was always that; but the wit, after all, is vulgar. The voice is too loud. The composition is a brilliant and exciting one to those who have not heard it too much, and Dr. Muck made the most of its climax.

There are those who claim much for American music because MacDowell wrote the Indian Suite heard yesterday. But this suite is farthest from American music. No composer possessed of what is ordinarily represented as typi cal spirit of the American would hav written in this way. MacDowell's ar was not robust or optimistic, or eve too healthy. He was a poet by th grace of God and in spite of a mate rialistic age in a land which has n yet conquered the necessary early ma ternalism. He took Indian themes ar endowed them with a mysterious, del cate beauty not theirs, although in th splendid "Legend" and in the Dirge has perhaps translated into music sor of the dignity of the Indian mind, sor of the epic quality of certain Indi legends. This music, however, is Ma Dowell's. It is the expression of a s being, a dreamer secure in rev ies his Monadnock. In the sense tha his music—reverie—of sunsets and fore undefiled, it is American. It has the scent of pines. It would, however, have been written as fruitfully in the depths of a forest of Germany, or in any natural scenery which would have conduced to the poetic thought that was a prevailing character of MacDowell's mind. He is gone, and there has yet arisen none to follow in his footsteps. He is thus, we think, even rarer than American composition. The performance was exceptionally sympathetic, fanciful, wild or tragic. The suite is a masterpiece which America, having been unsuccessful in putting its brand upon it, may well treasure as one of the most precious of its few relics of art.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

MARCH 1, 1913.

Program Is Attractive, "Indian Suite" Impress

MacDowell's "Indian Suite," w was composed in part right her Boston and dedicated by its brill and still lamented author to "Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor, Mr. Emil Paur"—this in 1892—is the most impressive n ber on this week's Symphony gram. It overwhelms Debussy's ty "La Mer." It seems class alongside Dukas's "L'Apprentir cier." It has no worthy compa on the program except Goldma bit of musical sunshine, "In Spring," an overture that inv more frequent hearings than it gets.

To many attending yesterday's matinee it must have been all new music on the program. The Dukas scherzo has not been played here for four years, and the other three works have come back after a still longer absence. Parts of Debussy's impressionistic sketches were enjoyed by the audience. The first sketch remained an enigma to all but a few; or perhaps the dozen who applauded felt that was the thing to do.

Fantastic Offering

The Dukas frolic, picturing in tone the adventure of the sorcerer's apprentice who almost drowned himself by learning how to bewitch a broom and make it fetch water but not by learning how to break the charm, is fantastic after the manner of Richard Strauss. But the largest enjoyment was to be found in the remaining numbers, although the orchestra, led by the sympathetic Dr. Muck, did full justice to the entire program.

Eugene Ysaye will make his appearance as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra next week. This supreme artist has already played three times in Boston this season, each time to crowded houses, and his appearance with the Symphony is

---

The Symphony Orchestra has two rules that are broken only by two artists. One rule is that an instrumental soloist shall play but one concerto and the other rule is that there shall be no encores. The first rule is set aside for Ysaye, the supreme violinist; the second rule for Paderewski, the greatest of pianists.

Ysaye will play two concertos with the orchestra. The first will be Vivaldi's in G-minor, with accompaniment of string orchestra and organ. The second concerto will be Saint-Saens's in B-minor, No. 3. This last concerto Ysaye has made his own. This is the work that Kreisler says he does not play because Ysaye does, which is as pretty a compliment as one violinist can make to another.

The symphony will be Sinding's in D-minor, announced for the holiday season, but taken off on account of Dr. Muck's illness, and the other number will be "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler.

MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date

Establis 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave an entirely classical programme Saturday afternoon, when the offerings consisted of numbers by Mozart, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. Mozart's G minor symphony was given a beautiful performance, and in splendid contrast of style was the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme. Beethoven was represented by the "Egmont" overture, announced on the Minneapolis programme, but changed to the "Rienzi" of Wagner on that programme, and Bach's suite in D was played with real grandeur and simplicity of style. It was a triumph in purity of orchestral playing.

Complete

Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. JOURNAL

Address: New York

Date

Esta 34

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Sunday Audience

The names of Mozart, Bach, Brahms and Beethoven filled the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, at the second of its February concerts here, and the result was an afternoon of unalloyed delight.

Dr. Muck played the G minor symphony of Mozart, the D major suite of the Cantor of Leipsic, Brahms" Variations on Hadyn's "St. Anthony Chorale" and the "Egmont" overture of the master of Bonn. Into none of these noble works of genius did Dr. Muck infuse his own personality; one was not afflicted with any particular "reading," and the music was permitted to speak for itself, in its own language, through the technic and expressiveness of the Boston Orchestra.

Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE

Address: New York

Date

Estab 884

Music.

Dr. Muck Leads His Boston Men in Classic Paths.

The fine Italian hand of German Dr. Muck is busy again concocting diabolical programmes. Saturday it touched lightly on the classical spring, and lo! Mozart, Bach, Brahms, and Beethoven responded. Mozart's G minor symphony we all wanted to hear conducted by Dr. Muck, but the devil peeped out of the cowl in following it up with a Bach suite, Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Who on earth but Dr. Muck wants to hear all those in one afternoon? and does Dr. Muck?

If he had mixed up Thursday's programme, substituting another modern symphony for the Lendvai rubbish, with Saturday's and then grabbed out two at random, the chances are a thousand to one he would have chosen better. And so it came to pass that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was less of a joy than it might have been.

Bureau in the World

From EVG. WORLD

Address: New York

Date

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at its concert on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall devoted its unequalled powers of exposition to the old masters. It was a rare treat to hear Mozart's second symphony in G minor, Bach's suite in D major, No. 3, Brahms's variations on a theme of Joseph Haydn's, and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" played as it was played. A crowded house of the elect among music lovers was unstinted in its applause.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

k, 1884

MAX PAUER WINS AUDIENCE AT LYRIC

German Pianist Creates Favorable Impression At Symphony Concert.

The fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season was given at the Lyric last night before an audience that filled every seat and put standing room at a premium.

The concert was particularly interesting because it was the occasion of introducing Max Pauer, a German pianist, who had never before appeared in Baltimoro but about whose successes much had been heard.

Mr. Pauer made a very strong impression in his number, the beautiful Schumann Concerto, which was substituted at the last moment for that of Mendelssohn, and he was given a half dozen enthusiastic calls after its completion.

His playing is unmarred by eccentricities or mannerisms of any kind, his attitude is modest and unassuming, so that his success was a striking demonstration of the fact that a player does not have to depend upon hysterical or sensational appeal or forced, exaggerated effects to arouse the sympathy of his audience.

Mr. Pauer, indeed, may well be considered an ideal pianist for such a work as the Schumann Concerto, his reading of it having shown full appreciation of its characteristic poetry and deep insight into the subtleties with which it is rife. He did not, however, allow these to become obtrusive enough to injure the salient features of the piece, as so often happens when a man is gifted with subjective powers of expression.

The orchestral program in its entirety was one of the most satisfying Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has presented this year. The symphony, the Brahms No. 2 in D major, was the opening number, a fact for which the audience seemed grateful. It was mag tly done.

Most Complete
Bureau in the World

POST

k City

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Concerts.

At the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon the opening number was Mozart's beautiful G minor symphony. It was charmingly played, except the Menuette, which sounded somewhat heavy footed. The same fault could be found with the Gavotte and Gigue from the Bach D major suite which followed. Being played much slower than usual, they lost much of their lightness and buoyancy. The "Air" was beautifuly sung by the first violins. The other numbers were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Brahms's Variations on Haydn's "Chorale St. Antoni," which roused the enthusiasm of the audience so that the whole orchestra had to rise in acknowledgment.

ACKED

[illegible] anything at all, you may immerse yourself pleasurably in the exquisite and strangely shifting rythms and orchestral colors. None more subtle. So far, no music has been invented—and we use this word with deliberate intent—no music has yet been invented that is more elusive, more of the gossamer stuff that dreams are made of. And yet this music does not, at this day, wholly convince. It may do so tomorrow, but we believe that even irreckonable posterity will rather give the prize for sea music to the last part of Debussy's "Nocturnes" for orchestra—"Les Sirenes." There is indeed the mysterious, the terribly beautiful song of the sea. But as an example of consummate individual skill, as an instance of Debussy's peculiar idiom [illegible] to the utmost possible extent, [illegible] therefore, perhaps, as an argument directly against Debussy's present tendencies, "La Mer" stands supreme. The composer has done nothing more remarkable, so far as style is concerned. But the reason we distrust him is that he is so uncannily master of his means. We can believe him to be transcribing a dream, and discover that every single note is as carefully prearranged as the various elements of a tale by Edgar Allan Poe. And we fear that there is more of infinite subtlety in the adjustment of colors and values than of authentic inspiration, in this masterpiece of present day musical craft. But if only as a virtuoso piece for modern orchestra, and for the superbly perfected and imaginative reading given the music by Dr. Muck, this performance would have been worth travelling a long distance to hear.

Dukas knows his orchestra thoroughly, but the inherent commonness of his musical thought is not wholly obscured by its extremely effective setting. The piece is witty, in its way. It was always that; but the wit, after all, is vulgar. The voice is too loud. The composition is a brilliant and exciting one to those who have not heard it too much, and Dr. Muck made the most of its climax.

There are those who claim much for American music because MacDowell wrote the Indian Suite heard yesterday. But this suite is farthest from American music. No composer possessed of what is ordinarily represented as typical spirit of the American would have written in this way. MacDowell's art was not robust or optimistic. or even too healthy. He was a poet by the grace of God and in spite of a materialistic age in a land which has not yet conquered the necessary early maternalism. He took Indian themes and endowed them with a mysterious, delicate beauty not theirs, although in the splendid "Legend" and in the Dirge he has perhaps translated into music some of the dignity of the Indian mind, some of the epic quality of certain Indian legends. This music, however, is MacDowell's. It is the expression of a shy being, a dreamer secure in reveries of Monadnock. In the sense that his is music—reverie—of sunsets and forests undefiled, it is American. It has the scent of pines. It would, however, have been written as fruitfully in the depths of a forest of Germany, or in any natural scenery which would have conduced to the poetic thought that was a prevailing character of MacDowell's mind. He is gone, and there has yet arisen none to follow in his footsteps. He is thus, we think, even rarer than American composition. The performance was exceptionally sympathetic, fanciful, wild or tragic. The suite is a masterpiece which America. having been unsuccessful in putting its brand upon it, may well treasure as one of the most precious of its few relics of art.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

MARCH 1, 1913.

Program Is Attractive, "Indian Suite" Impressive

MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which was composed in part right here in Boston and dedicated by its brilliant and still lamented author to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Mr. Emil Paur"—this was in 1892—is the most impressive number on this week's Symphony program. It overwhelms Debussy's misty "La Mer." It seems classical alongside Dukas's "L'Apprentir Socier." It has no worthy companion on the program except Goldmark's bit of musical sunshine, "In the Spring," an overture that invites more frequent hearings than it gets.

To many attending yesterday's matinee it must have been all new music on the program. The Dukas scherzo has not been played here for four years, and the other three works have come back after a still longer absence. Parts of Debussy's impressionistic sketches were enjoyed by the audience. The first sketch remained an enigma to all but a few; or perhaps the dozen who applauded felt that was the thing to do.

Fantastic Offering

The Dukas frolic, picturing in tone the adventure of the sorcerer's apprentice who almost drowned himself by learning how to bewitch a broom and make it fetch water but not by learning how to break the charm, is fantastic after the manner of Richard Strauss. But the largest enjoyment was to be found in the remaining numbers, although the orchestra, led by the sympathetic Dr. Muck, did full justice to the entire program.

Eugene Ysaye will make his appearance as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra next week. This supreme artist has already played three times in Boston this season, each time to crowded houses, and his appearance with the Symphony is

The Symphony Orchestra has two rules that are broken only by two artists. One rule is that an instrumental soloist shall play but one concerto and the other rule is that there shall be no encores. The first rule is set aside for Ysaye, the supreme violinist; the second rule for Paderewski, the greatest of pianists.

Ysaye will play two concertos with the orchestra. The first will be Vivaldi's in G-minor, with accompaniment of string orchestra and organ. The second concerto will be Saint-Saens's in B-minor, No. 3. This last concerto Ysaye has made his own. This is the work that Kreisler says he does not play because Ysaye does, which is as pretty a compliment as one violinist can make to another.

The symphony will be Sinding's in D-minor, announced for the holiday season, but taken off on account of Dr. Muck's illness, and the other number will be "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler.

MAIL,

ldress New York City.

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave an entirely classical programme Saturday afternoon, when the offerings consisted of numbers by Mozart, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. Mozart's G minor symphony was given a beautiful performance, and in splendid contrast of style was the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme. Beethoven was represented by the "Egmont" overture, announced on the Minneapolis programme, but changed to the "Rienzi" of Wagner on that programme, and Bach's suite in D was played with real grandeur and simplicity of style. It was a triumph in purity of orchestral playing.

Complete

Cutting Bureau in the World

EVG. JOURNAL

ess: New York

te

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Sunday Audience

The names of Mozart, Bach, Brahms and Beethoven filled the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, at the second of its February concerts here, and the result was an afternoon of unalloyed delight.

Dr. Muck played the G minor symphony of Mozart, the D major suite of the Cantor of Leipsic, Brahms" Variations on Hadyn's "St. Anthony Chorale" and the "Egmont" overture of the master of Bonn. Into none of these noble works of genius did Dr. Muck infuse his own personality; one was not afflicted with any particular "reading," and the music was permitted to speak for itself, in its own language, through the technic and expressiveness of the great Boston Orchestra.

Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

GLOBE

ss: New York

Music.

Dr. Muck Leads His Boston Men in Classic Paths.

The fine Italian hand of German Dr. Muck is busy again concocting diabolical programmes. Saturday it touched lightly on the classical spring, and lo! Mozart, Bach, Brahms, and Beethoven responded. Mozart's G minor symphony we all wanted to hear conducted by Dr. Muck, but the devil peeped out of the cowl in following it up with a Bach suite, Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Who on earth but Dr. Muck wants to hear all those in one afternoon? and does Dr. Muck?

If he had mixed up Thursday's programme, substituting another modern symphony for the Lendvai rubbish, with Saturday's and then grabbed out two at random, the chances are a thousand to one he would have chosen better. And so it came to pass that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was less of a joy than it might have been.

Bureau in the World

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at its concert on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall devoted its unequalled powers of exposition to the old masters. It was a rare treat to hear Mozart's second symphony in G minor, Bach's suite in D major, No. 3, Brahms's variations on a theme of Joseph Haydn's, and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" played as it was played. A crowded house of the elect among music lovers was unstinted in its applause.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MAX PAUER WINS AUDIENCE AT LYRIC

German Pianist Creates Favorable Impression At Symphony Concert.

The fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season was given at the Lyric last night before an audience that filled every seat and put standing room at a premium.

The concert was particularly interesting because it was the occasion of introducing Max Pauer, a German pianist, who had never before appeared in Baltimore but about whose successes much had been heard.

Mr. Pauer made a very strong impression in his number, the beautiful Schumann Concerto, which was substituted at the last moment for that of Mendelssohn, and he was given a half dozen enthusiastic calls after its completion.

His playing is unmarred by eccentricities or mannerisms of any kind, his attitude is modest and unassuming, so that his success was a striking demonstration of the fact that a player does not have to depend upon hysterical or sensational appeal or forced, exaggerated effects to arouse the sympathy of his audience.

Mr. Pauer, indeed, may well be considered an ideal pianist for such a work as the Schumann Concerto, his reading of it having shown full appreciation of its characteristic poetry and deep insight into the subtleties with which it is rife. He did not, however, allow these to become obtrusive enough to injure the salient features of the piece, as so often happens when a man is gifted with subjective powers of expression.

The orchestral program in its entirety was one of the most satisfying Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has presented this year. The symphony, the Brahms No. 2 in D major, was the opening number, a fact for which the audience seemed grateful. It was magnificently done.

Most Complete
Bureau in the World

POST
k City

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Concerts.

At the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon the opening number was Mozart's beautiful G minor symphony. It was charmingly played, except the Menuette, which sounded somewhat heavy footed. The same fault could be found with the Gavotte and Gigue from the Bach D major suite which followed. Being played much slower than usual, they lost much of their lightness and buoyancy. The "Air" was beautifuly sung by the first violins. The other numbers were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Brahms's Variations on Haydn's "Chorale St. Antoni," which roused the enthusiasm of the audience so that the whole orchestra had to rise in acknowledgment.

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ITEM

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FEB

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performed a new symphony at Carnegie Hall, New York City, yesterday afternoon. It was the work of a young Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai, of whom comparatively little is known. He is a man in his early thirties, and is a resident of Berlin. He has studied with Puccini and also in Paris and Germany. From all accounts, he has had a very hard and desperate struggle to win recognition. This symphony in question was played for the first time at one of the big German festivals in Berlin last Spring. The composer sent the score to Dr. Muck last Summer and the latter was so impressed with it that it was one of the three new works he announced at the beginning of the season he would play during the Winter. It is a work in four movements, and is entirely modern in form and content. It employs the utmost resources of a modern orchestra, and like works of its kind is of exceeding difficulty.

ork, 1884

---

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INTER OCEAN

Address: Chicago, Ill.

Date FEB 1913

Brief Paragraphs In the Musical News Budget.

Maggie Teyte, the energetic, sailed yesterday for England and will begin a concert tour on March 3. Her engagements include recitals in Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Newcastle, Glasgow, Edinburgh, London, Paris and Amsterdam. Opera will claim her attention the latter half of the month.

Young Lendvai, concerning whom the reference works are completely out of breath, was represented at one of the latter Boston symphony orchestra's concerts by a symphony, unorthodox, as the reviewer pointed out, in that it was only thirty-five minutes in length. Mr. Parker of the Transcript considers the new work with enthusiasm. Says he: "Lendvai, so far as his music and a single hearing of it disclosed him, is a thorough-going modernist. Like most of his generation, he cannot or he will not invent intrinsically beautiful or strikingly emotional melodic thoughts. His themes exist less for themselves than for the play of his imagination upon them. On the other hand, the chief melody of the symphony is as long-breathed as if Mahler had shaped it. He derives subsidiary motives from it, but his liking for brevity seems to check any tendency in him to worry scraps of them in purely cerebral music as many a young and old composer of our generation likes to do. Lendvai is an archmodernist in his reliance upon rhythm as an expressive and diversifying means and in his ingenuity and imagination with it. Half the difficulty in the arduous preparation of the piece must have lain in the constant and abrupt changes of rhythm and counter-rhythm curiously interwoven. Lendvai is modernist also in the range and freedom, the imagination and the individuality of his harmony. He does not reap imitatively where others have sown daringly; but he is familiar with the harmonic progress of the last twenty years that has widened and deepened so variously the expressive range of music. He has individuality and imagination in his harmonic backgrounds and no little resource with them. He is capable of harmonies so delicate and tingling that Debussy might have spun them; and he can be as stout-voiced and rich harmonically as any contemporary German. Fearing no harmony, he fears no dissonance either. When his imaginative purpose demands a biting progression or a jangling juxtaposition, he is not timid with it. He can lay unrelated chords beside each other that rasp-and also thrill."

Of a tone-poem written by Victor Kolar, a violinist in the ranks of the New York symphony orchestra, and played recently by them, Mr. Henderson of the Sun says: "The composition itself is melodious and pleasing. It shows that the young writer has a firm grip on the basic principles of form and that he is thoroughly acquainted with the idioms of orchestral speech. His music sounds always rich and closely woven. Mr. Kolar has a real talent."

The Post, however, opines that "while there is nothing especially noteworthy about this music aside from the command of orchestral resources, which it displays, it is not without an element of promise. It is beautifully colored, and contains one or two well built climaxes. But Mr. Kolar will find it more profitable in the long run to invent some really significant and original melodic phrases than assiduously to reproduce Debussian effects."

Erwin Lendvai

N. Y. Evening Sun

Feb. 21, 1913

BOSTON'S good old Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote a poem once to tell why he never dared to be as funny as he could. Dr. Karl Muck is a bolder man. He dared to play a new symphony in Carnegie Hall last night with two mad, modern scherzos, the first a pure "Fantasie" of savage dissonances in horns, bassoons and kettledrums, the other a brazen "Bacchanale" of grotesque comicality carried in distorted rhythms through the whole exultant band. And after laughing with the new composer, Erwin Lendvai, so to speak, the man at the baton turned the laugh in the other direction by showing how Richard Strauss had played the same pranks with the musical scale in "Till Eulenspiegel," and how Berlioz blazed the way in a "Benvenuto Cellini" overture for all the youngsters since who delight to hurl thunderbolts of brass into the seething caldron of the orchestral "cubists" of this latter day.

Lendvai at least achieved a favorable introduction of his name to this public by his opening "Invocation," an andante religioso reenforced by harps and organ. In spite of some mysterious "empty fifths," the imposing largo lifted the solemn themes over a long organ-point to a peaceful ending. The third part of the symphony was called "Naenie," after a lady likewise celebrated by Brahms. Lendvai waxed lengthy here and rather lost the thread of his discourse between deep-toned violas and 'cellos, while he rang in the interrupting voices of English horn and Glockenspiel. The Hungarian pupil of Puccini has found ways indeed to make the orchestra speak. He does not yet make it sing.

Those listeners in the sold-out house who sighed for the elder days of art, when men could paint idealized trees without stripping the mottled sunlit leaves of a whole forest, welcomed one simple classic last night. It was Weber's hymn-like overture to "Freischuetz," played ever so quietly midway in the bill. To-morrow there is a complete matinee of Mozart, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, to show the Boston Symphony men on their own familiar ground. Two more visits, March 20 and 22, end their New York season.

T[illegible]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Enjoyable Concert of Numbers from Mozart, Bach, and Beethoven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has introduced many novelties to New York, some of which have not proved as palatable as others. At any rate, the programme of yesterday afternoon's concert of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall, on which no novelties at all appeared, was of a sort to be thoroughly enjoyed.

The programme was made up of numbers which may justly be deemed "classic." But four names appeared on it—Mozart, Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms. Mozart was represented by the G minor Symphony, of which the band gave a noble performance; Bach by the Suite in D major, the most popular of the Bach Suites, which includes the famous air which violinists play upon the G string; Brahms by his Variations on a theme by Hadyn, the "Chorale St. Anthony," and Beethoven by the overture to "Egmont."

. the

ADVERTISER,

MARCH 6, 1913

DR. MUCK TO REMAIN WITH SYMPHONY

Various Reports That Conductor Is to Leave Boston in Fall Are Officially Denied.

Rumor and gossip have been so busy for several weeks making and announcing plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, that the management has been compelled to issue a flat denial that he was to leave Boston before the expiration of his contract with the Symphony orchestra.

There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe Dr. Muck was going next fall, but all the reports seemed to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, it is officially declared, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words, there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall, he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performance of Parsifal in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera house in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of season of 1916-1917.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 6, 1913

DR. MUCK WILL NOT LEAVE HUB

Declare Report He Sought Release Fake

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

REPORT FALSE

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of Parsifal in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these [illegible] he has positively

BOSTON JOURNAL—FRIDAY, MARCH 7,

Deny Dr. Karl Muck Is to Leave Symphony Orchestra

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Bston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words, there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performance of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

TRAVELER HERALD,
MARCH 6, 1913.

SYMPHONY HEAD NOT TO RESIGN

Dr. Muck Will Remain with the Orchestra Until 1917.

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

'There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words, there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to [illegible] post left vacant in Munich [illegible] death of Felix Mottl. Efforts [illegible] kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

MONITOR,
MARCH 6, 1913

KARL MUCK WILL STAY IN BOSTON

Karl Muck will direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at least until the end of the season of 1916-17, according to an announcement made today by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra.

Mr. Ellis, in his statement, says that he gives the public this assurance because of rumors that Dr. Muck has accepted engagements that would conflict with his conductorship in Boston. It is understood that Dr. Muck has been invited to take the post of director of the Vienna opera and of the Munich opera, and to conduct at the Champs Elysees theater in Paris in 1914, but that he has declined all inducements to leave his present position.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
—THURSDAY, MARCH 6,

DR. MUCK TO REMAI WITH THE SYMPHON

Dr. Karl Muck will be conductor of Symphony Orchestra in Boston at le until the end of the season of 1916-19 So many rumored plans for Dr. Muck h been made that the management has b compelled to issue a flat denial that was to leave Boston before the expira of his contract.

BOSTON HERALD.
MARCH 8. 1913.

YSAYE PLAYS AT SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Pagan Poem and Sinding's Symphony in D Minor Heard.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Ysaye was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor, No. 1	Sinding
Concerto in G minor for violin	Vivaldi
Pagan Poem (after Virgil)	Loeffler
Concerto in B minor for violin	Saint-Saens

This concert was a long one, much too long, and the program was poorly balanced. Why should Mr. Ysaye have been allowed to play two concertos, when other violinists have been refused? One concerto is enough, and sometimes one too many.

The first movement of Sinding's symphony is imposing by reason of its ruggedness, its vigorous rhythms, its epic strength. The landscape that this Norwegian's Muse delights in is bleak and forbidding. Her song is of the old gods and a Valhalla where warriors fight, their wounds are immediately healed, and huge cups of mead are drained with voices roari[illegible] with clangor of harps.

There is hardly a page that has sensuous beauty, and the lyrical passages are thematically the least important, but there is a virility in subject matter and the expression and the treatment are authoritative.

The other movements are inferior in fancy. The second may be taken for a lamentation with a few effective passages after a long and dreary stretch. In the Scherzo there is an excursion into Siegfried's forest, and there are other pages that show the influence of Wagner. In the finale the change to the major is dramatically contrived.

The symphony suffers as a whole from monotony in mood and in coloring. The instrumentation is generally thick and drab.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is thus far his ripest orchestral work. It is based, as many know, on verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, who borrowed liberally from "The Sorceress" of Theocritus. A girl by the aid of incantations strives to bring back her truant lover. Jules Combarieu in his curious book "La Musique et la Magie" remarks that the refrain in the Eclogue, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home," bears witness of the previous existence of chanted poetry, in which the musical rhythm was so important, that the pert, although a man of taste, deeply versed in literature, and writing to be read, could not resist taking the refrain as the foundation of his work.

The composer, however, did not make the mistake of attempting to translate literally Virgil into music. He has stated that his chief themes, with perhaps one exception, are not typical and have only musical significance. Of course, the old question comes up: "If the hearer were not told that the music was inspired by Virgil's lines, would thoughts of incantation, magic spells, a lover drawn from a distance come into his mind?" There might be this answer: "That depends largely on the mind of the hearer." In music that has a literary or a determined subject of any kind, music that has a title or argument, the hearer must meet the composer half way. An unimaginative person will not easily enjoy such music unless it soothes his nerves or stimulates his nervous system. If Coriolanus is no more than Hecuba to a hearer, he will fail to perceive the tragic force of Beethoven's overture.

Mr. Loeffler's music can be enjoyed without any effort to keep the eclogue in mind. There is no need of wondering whether this passage illustrates the melting of a waxen image or that passage the flinging of ashes into a running brook. What matters it, after all, whether the strangely beautiful song of the trumpets behind the scenes is the refrain of the sorceress? The pleasure in speculating concerning the "meaning" of these measures is more to be desired than the confidence in definite information.

The music of this "Pagan Poem" is highly imaginative. Its pages are pages of beauty and passion. The strangeness of the opening is not forced and experimental. The composer himself first saw in his mind's eye the scene and heard the sorcerer's chant. And here is no love song of familiar type given to caterwauling 'cellos. There is no conventional lament of approved crape and tears. A dolorous theme, broadly and nobly thought, is sung by the English horn. The spell works. Daphnis now hastens toward the long-empty and expectant arms. There is frantic and amorous exultation.

In this instance a rich and rare orchestral dress covers a well shaped and vigorous body.

Mr. Ysaye was not in the vein, and it was not easy to recognize in him the Ysaye of the recent recitals. Too often in technique and in aesthetic expression he fell below his own extraordinarily high standard. Vivaldi's concerto, with the exception of the slow movements, was not worth the doing, and one of these movements might well have been spared. The effect of a violin cantilena against either the voix celeste, or the vox humana, of an organ quickly cloys.

The program of next week is as follows: Mraczek, Symphonic Burleske, "Max und Moritz"; Liszt, Mephisto Waltz; Charpentier, Impressions of Italy.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MARCH 8, 1913.

YSAYE PLAYS ONCE MORE LIKE A MASTER

Authoritive in Vivaldi as in Saint-Saens.

Mr Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Played Superbly.

The 17th Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. Ysaye was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Sinding...Symphony in D minor, No. 1, op. 21
Vivaldi—Concerto in G minor for violin, with organ and string orchestra.
Loeffler—Pagan Poem (after Virgil), op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte (Mr Gebhard), English [illegible] Mr Longy) and three trumpets.
Saint-Saens—Concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra.

The concert was two hours and a quarter long, so that the audience was too tired and too hurried after the Saint-Saens concerto to give Ysaye the tribute he deserved. If he plays tonight as he did yesterday afternoon, and perchance never should visit America again, the distinguished violinist will have left indissolubly linked with these concerts the memory of a great art; not necessarily that of the violin, nor the physical problems of its mechanism, but the art of interpretation, even of a new creation, which molds images of beauty in the forms of this epoch, and with no less understanding and discernment in those of two centuries ago.

Comment upon the poise and repose of bowing such as that which revived the Vivaldi concerto would be trite. Ysaye has demonstrated at each appearance here the wonderous versatility of his bow, a command over an astonishing range of musical articulation. He gives it the varied accent, and to a degree the color, of the human voice. It is no longer musical "effects" which he discloses, but the spiritual import of the composer's thought that lies beneath.

Vivaldi was a virtuoso in his day, and was discredited as a composer. It was said he wrote for effect, and that his mastery of form exceeded the fertility of his invention. And yet how well this mellow old music bears the light. Bach thought well of his concertos, and they were studied in Germany, although there were learned Englishmen who decried their merit.

The two slow movements have a noble purity of profile. The proud patrician features cannot wholly conceal the grave tenderness within the eyes, the quiet tears, or the gallantry and polished elegance of manner. This is something more than respectable music vitalized by the art of a great interpreter. How filled with the grace of an old picture in a stately ancestral gallery Ysaye made the slow movements. It was a pity that the organ refused to respond to the vigorous tempi of the others.

It is a performance such as this by Ysaye—performance is a perfunctory, an impertinent word—that every interpretative musician should hear and heed—violinists, pianists and, above all, singers. What a master of operatic schools Ysaye would have been had he had a voice.

There was authority in his mastery of the sustained line, the external artifice, the aloofness of the old time concerto. There was equal authority in that of Saint-Saens, but now in the guise of romantic ardor, of intimacy, of superb rhythmic daring. He took the Sicilian melody more slowly than is customary, but he kept its rhythmic integrity. What sensuous beauty in his delivery of the theme upon the G string in the first movement. What abandon in the brilliant figure in the last.

Dr Muck deserves thanks for the sympathetic and brilliant performance of Mr Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." It is a work of peculiar distinction, saturated with poetic beauty, the product at once of a delicate and an opulent imagination. The hearer listens in vain for a measure which trenches upon the commonplace, one which appears to mark a rift in the composer's inspiration.

The plasticity of form and idea is ever leagues from the obvious and the commonplace. It is as though a dozen other crystallizations of the thought crowded for utterance, but this was the inevitable, the chosen one. How admirable the scheme of emotional values upon which it is laid, the contrast between periods of stress and repose

There are the rich colors and the emotional suggestion of Orientalism, but there is also the feeling that the author might have shown the same spiritual penetration, the same cunning of craftsmanship—as in the individual and poetic eloquence of the piano, of the English horn and the echoing trumpets—in the expression of some other cast of thought or form of life. Summoned by the continued applause of the audience, Mr Loeffler acknowledged its appreciation from his seat.

Sinding's symphony is sane, if often conventional music. He has listened to Wagner and he also shows kinship to Puccini. The dynamics sometimes exceed in loudness the proportions of the musical thought, but there is a beautiful illustration of the sonata form, and this is now something.

ADVERTISER,
MARCH 8, 1913

EUGENE YSAYE IS AT HIS BEST

CHIEF ATTRACTION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Appeared in Two Different Schools of Playing, and Was Great in Both.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sinding—Symphony in D minor, No. 1.
Vivaldi—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.
Soloist, Eugene Ysaye.
Loeffler—"Pagan Poem" for Orchestra.
St. Saens—Violin Concerto, No. 3, B minor
Soloist, M. Ysaye.

Once in a while the tail wags the dog and the soloist becomes the chief attraction in the symphony concert. When it is a great vocalist we feel that the triumph would fit better upon the operatic stage than upon the symphonic platform. But when it is a great classical player, in legitimate orchestral works, the success of the soloist does not seem out of place, for he has united with the orchestra and joined his success with theirs. Thus it was yesterday afternoon in the case of Ysaye.

M. Ysaye has the divine right of genius to be unequal. If he is in the best mood one hears something superlatively good. If he is in a temporary grouch one may hear occasional blurring or slurring. It was exactly the same with Rubinstein. "I could give another concert with the notes I dropped," he said after one of his indifferent days. The present reviewer has heard him give the "Moonlight Sonata," with the moon varying from a crescent to full. "When a musician can always achieve the same perfect result he ceases to be an artist and becomes a manufacturer," once said Herkomer to the present writer.

All this as preamble to the statement that Ysaye was at his best. He must have been inspired by the great orchestra and its great conductor. For to compare his playing yesterday with his previous Boston appearance with orchestra would have been the comparison of two different men

He appeared in two different schools of playing at this concert, and was great in both. We are glad that he is bringing Vivaldi back to the concert-platform. This composer of the first half of the 18th century has a refreshing beauty that goes beyond the technical tricks that have come in since his time. Not long ago M. Ysaye made a great sensation with a chaconne by this composer. Yesterday the old-fashioned concerto was not quite as striking, yet very interesting in its beginning and end. Of course it is not in the classical concerto-form which Mozart established later on, but is more like a short suite. It is the pure old style of contrapuntal treatment with a grace of melody that exerts a peculiar fascination. Its first movement and its finale were the best two movements, and the Adagio was somewhat too repressed, and was whispered at the audience.

The work was for string orchestra and organ, with the solo instrument, and the support was excellent. Only in the finale did the accompaniment seem to drag a trifle when M. Ysaye endeavored to whip up the pace. The finale was, of course, somewhat jovial. All the old cycle forms affected the jolly mood in their endings. There was, of course, great enthusiasm at the end.

The St. Saens Concerto was in vivid contrast to the Vivaldi work. It was in good classical form, with three separate movements. The breadth of M. Ysaye in the first and last, and the delicacy displayed in the second movement were wonderful. The harmonics were the most clear and bird-like that we have heard since Wie-

The Sinding symphony is an inspiring work. It has the earnestness of the Northern school. There is seldom much lightheartedness in the Scandinavian symphonies, but there is a virility that removes them very far from the sickly pulings of the modern distressed composers, and beauty of theme is almost always present. It is not a work that the public will get frantic over, but it is a symphony which will certainly grow upon them with repeated hearing. That is the real pity of it; such dignified works cannot be grasped at once, and the pressure of many "novelties" too often prevents their repetition.

After the earnestness of the first movement came the tender brooding of the andante. Any poetic traveler who has ever been in Norway will understand that pensive sadness

> "That resembles Sorrow only
> As the Mist resembles Rain."

Clarinette in the deeper register (the chalumeau) and the romantic tones of the French Horn were often prominent in this andante, and both were very well played. The first movement, by the way, had explosions violent enough to suggest that Norway is an earthquake country—which it is not. But there were strong and characteristic figures, and fine development.

The finale is somewhat too long. It has a fierce brutality that suggests Viking force. The ponderous bass tuba becomes as ferocious as Frithjof himself. The bassoons also had some characteristic work which was well done. But it is by no means all impressionism. Good counterpoint is not lacking; there is some striking canonic work in the movement, made from a theme that is as melodic as a folk-song. An Dr. Muck read it all with proper appreciation of its content. He was pensive and dreamy with the blue-eyed Norse poet and he was ferocious with the Viking, making the symphony full of effective contrast and leading to a grand climax.

The Loeffler work seemed powerful in its tone coloring, even in such a strong programme. We cannot always sympathize with the morbid vein of this composer, but even in this (in the death of Tintagiles, for example) he has achieved great things. And in matters of orchestral color, he is a master, as great as any America has ever produced. But this poem does not lean to the morbid side. There are, to be sure, a few weird touches connected with the spells of the sorceress, but they were overtopped by the tender yearning for the absent Daphnis, and the return of that party was made the occasion of a very grand climax of triumph.

In this work the composer is not as ascetic as usual, he even gives graceful melodic touches, and the picture is a poetic one in which the music is evidently sincerely inspired by Virgil's verse, which it fits closely.

The playing of the English horn, by M. Longy, and the work of the trumpets, was worthy of enthusiastic praise. These performers shared with Mr. Loeffler the success of the work. And the piano obbligato, played by Mr. Gebhardt, was really eloquent in its shading and most artistic in its attention to ensemble.

The climax of the work when Daphnis comes home from the lodge, in Rome, with three trumpeters, a piccolo, a pianist and a brass band, taking both sides of the road (does the final crash indicate that he kicks the door in?) was exciting enough to arouse the audience, and Mr. Loeffler was obliged to rise twice and bow his acknowledgments to the applauding audience.

JOURNAL—
MARCH 8, 1913.

YSAYE SOLOIST OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

Celebrated Belgian Violinist Accorded Splendid Tribute.

GIVEN CONCESSION

Plays Two Concertos, and Audience Is Given Full Measure of Music.

By E. F. Harkins

Eugene Ysaye, the celebrated Belgian violinist, who is touring the country under a guarantee of 100 concerts at $1000 a concert, is this week's Symphony soloist. On his account the rule against two concertos at one concert has been waived, permitting him to play the old early eighteenth century Vivaldi concerto in G minor, for violin with organ and string orchestra accompaniment and the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor; and this concession to the great violinist of the times helps to make the longest Symphony concert of the season.

The Sinding symphony in D minor, which introduces the program, is of moderate length; but in addition to these three numbers, which would fill out the average concert time, there is the Loeffler fantasy, "A Pagan

---

Regrets Over Program

Dr. Muck has indeed given the Symphony patrons full measure this week, but there must have been some regrets yesterday concerning the arrangement of the program. The Saint-Saens concerto, which shows Ysaye at his best, comes last. This position does not affect the Saturday night concert, but yesterday the earlygoers, of whom many attend the matinee, had to leave either before the Saint-Saens number began or before it was finished.

The Vivaldi concerto is not so appealing to the average music-lover as the one by Saint-Saens, yet yesterday the audience applauded most vigorously the third movement, which is showy and nothing more, and which is interesting principally on account of its technical difficulties. There was more of the real Ysaye art in the lyric andante and the rather pompous final movements.

The appearance of the Vivaldi number gave the violinists in the audience an opportunity to compare Ysaye with Kreisler, who played the concerto at one of the Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall a few months ago. Mr. Marshall again was the organ accompanist.

It was in the Saint-Saens concerto that Ysaye made his first appearance as a Symphony soloist during the season of '94-5, and though others played it before him and after him, no one has ever matched the great Belgian artist in it. He has completely mastered, not only its technical side which was written under the guidance of Sarasate, but its very soul. It is generally admitted that since Sarasate, to whom it is dedicated, ceased to play it the concerto has had no interpreter quite worthy of comparison with Ysaye.

Tribute to Ysaye

The audience paid a splendid tribute to the violinist yesterday, but a still greater triumph may be expected tonight, when the work will be performed under more favorable circumstances.

But Ysaye's presence is only one enjoyable feature of this seventeenth pair of concerts. Dr. Muck and the orchestra have never been in more brilliant form this season than they were yesterday in the Sinding and Loeffler numbers. The applause following "A Pagan Poem" brought Heinrich Gebhard, the piano soloist, back to the stage, and then brought the composer to his feet. Mr. Loeffler, who was formerly second concert-master of the orchestra, came in from Medfield to attend the concert.

There will be no soloist at next weeks' concerts, but a striking novelty will be on the program in the form of a fantastic tone poem called "Max and Moritz," dealing with the adventures of two youngsters who have figured as heroes in one of the German comic papers. The work is by the Czechish composer, Mrazek. The other numbers on the program will be Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy."

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 8,

SUPERB MUSIC SINKS SOLOIST

Ysaye at Disadvantage on Symphony Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

Eugene Ysaye was the soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He played Vivaldi's concerto in G minor, with the accompaniment of strings and organ and the violin concerto of Saint-Saens in B minor. He was not in the vein, and he played under especial difficulties. He had not arrived in Boston at the time agreed upon for rehearsal; he was evidently not thoroughly at ease; but most disadvantageous of all was the superb orchestral music which Mr. Ysaye was compelled to play against. Never was the disturbing element furnished by the intrusion of a soloist on an orchestral programme more evident, and we say this without disrespect and with the warmest appreciation of the greatness of Mr. Ysaye's art. The orchestral pieces were Sinding's Symphony in D minor, a modern epic, and Charles M. Loeffler's Pagan Poem, which grows greater with every hearing. Few other compositions would have been so distinctive after Sinding's work.

In the symphony Sinding shows an unexpected mastery of the style of composition which is far more of an accustomed thing today than it was in 1890, when the D minor symphony was first performed. We mean, the splendid centralizing of the entire work upon one single idea. This musical and emotional idea is furnished by a tragic motive in the old minor scale with the flatted seventh. We mention this technical detail only because the somewhat archaic or mediaval character of the natural scale greatly enhances the force and the elemental appeal of the theme. This wild phrase, heard at once, and given to the strings and the wood wind instru-poser who dares to adopt this phrase not only as his watchword, but as his entire subject matter? Technical analysis is not here in place, but it is true that this symphony is practically one theme; with its variants and transformations it emphasizes but one key—that of D minor, which is adhered to with extraordinary obstinacy and effect throughout the work, with passing departures into its relative and tonic majors; it is almost in one rhythm—at the most, in two closely related rhythms; it is of a dark and forbidden color until the very last, when there is a marvellous flooding of light with the sudden change to the major mode. And the effect of this last is overwhelming, past all speech. It is as though the gleaming gates of Walhalla had suddenly opened wide.

---

The symphony is open to two strong objections. Its Wagnerian idioms and its heavy instrumentation. Sinding is more than an ardent Wagnerite. He is personally a representative of the Scandinavian spirit, impregnated with modern thought—the Scandinavian spirit, as well as the Scandinavian scenery. There is more than naturalism, which in itself is so impressive when it comes from the North in this work. Nor must the heaviness of the instrumentation be supposed entirely unintentional on the part of the composer. It surely conduces much to the impression conveyed, of great, broad brush-strokes, of austere and gigantic strength and of colossal gloom. It is music armed cap-a-pie.

But the only adequate description of music is music. The symphony, and the performance, for which the symphony audiences owe Dr. Muck a debt of thanks, should be repeated, and that very soon. After this performance Dr. Muck was recalled three times.

Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was also admirably interpreted, and as repeated hearings bring more understanding of the work, it is seen to be perhaps the finest score of his later period. The enchantress, in the Eclogue of Vergils, calls her beloved from the city by means of her spells. The tone-poem is a free fantasy, and its ideas, which are unusually potent, are worked out with the rarest interest. It is unnecessary to speak here of Mr. Loeffler's technical mastery, but the strange beauty of his workmanship is another matter. It is individual with him. It is the man himself, his ideas forcing their own channels of expression. The hearer's imagination is left free to wander as it will. The imagination need not be stretched, surely, to sense a mood of magic, passion, incantation, and for the emotional effect of the successive themes to make an indelible impression.

There is to us, in this work and in many other compositions of Mr. Loeffler, a classic harmony, a studied simplicity of outline bringing with it a cooling suggestion of the antique. There s in this music infinite sensuousness, and yet a cerebral quality peculiar, we believe, to the composer, which is as refreshing as it is distinguished.

Mr. Gebhard took the piano part in this performance. He and Mr. Longy, the player of the English horn, made the performance the more memorable by their art. As for Mr. Ysaye, he remains a great artist, whatever his mood, but there is little literature for the violin which stands successfully against great orchestral music, and neither the old and uneven concerto of Vivaldi, or the popular concerto of Saint-Saens, including in its measures everything from a ballet dance to a hyman of praise, could compare for an instant with the eloquence of that incomparable instrument, the modern orchestra.

BOSTON HERALD.
MARCH 10.

PENSION FUND CONCERT GIVEN

Great Audience Hears Symphony Orchestra in Memorable Performance.

Symphony Hall was crowded in every part with many standing along the side walls yesterday afternoon at the second and last Pension Fund concert of the season. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was:

Wagner..........Overture, "Tannhaeuser"
Wagner................"A Siegfried Idyl"
Richard Strauss...............Tone-Poem
"Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Tschaikowsky.Symphony No. 6 in B minor "Pathetic," Op. 74.

The giving of this concert in the afternoon, instead of at night, as has been customary, furnished an opportunity to hear the orchestra to a large part of the public that could not otherwise do so, and the chance was seized with avidity. Great was the reward of those who took advantage of the change in plan, for, owing to the character and arrangement of the program, they heard what was practically a Symphony concert, and they listened to playing by the orchestra that was exceptionally inspiring, even for that superb organization of artists.

Never were the players more sensitively responsive to the subtle, powerful, wonderful leadership of Dr. Muck. He always makes of this collection of nearly 100 men a single instrument to

---

MONITOR,
MARCH 10, 1913

TSCHAIKOWSKY INTERPRETED

Presenting Wagner's "Tannheuser" overture, and "Siegfried Idyl," Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the Boston symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, gave its second pension fund concert of the season in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon. An audience that filled the hall listened critically and appreciatively to the distinguished conductor's eadings of the familiar works. The house, the program and the performers represented the musical art of the city at its best. They summed up a quarter of a century of orchestral endeavor in the community, a generation of that interchange of idea between artists and public which results in the product we call musical interpretation.

The numbers which developed points of especial individuality and originality were the overture and the symphony. "Tannheuser" was read with a slower beat than is usual, with the good result that its constituent melodic voices sounded out freely and clearly. The effects of gradual diminishing of tone and of contrasting gradual increase were extraordinary in themselves as mechanical accomplishments and were applied to the larger phrasing of the musical thought in a most telling manner. Freshness was given to the close of the piece by a happy easing-up on the customary emphasis. The final return of the pilgrim theme instead of being made a proclamation in the full shout of the brasses was made a comparatively soft-toned chant that sang of repose and release from conflict rather than onrushing triumph.

The strength of the interpretation of the Tschaikowsky symphony was in two middle movements. Never did Dr. Muck succeed more brilliantly in his two specialties of orchestral expression, delicate sentiment and rugged humor, than here. He brought out the graciousness of the famous melody in five-quarter time as no one else has done it. He got at the vivacity of the theme of the third movement as only a conductor with a brittle staccato beat like his could do it.

Who knows how to compress a full-voiced orchestral note into a briefer moment of sound than Dr. Muck?

A great piece of music like the "Pathetic" symphony, a work which alone of all the orchestral compositions of the late nineteenth century can stand in company with Beethoven's fifth symphony, should probably have two or three conductors to interpret it adequately. We should want Dr. Muck for the second and third movements. We should want Nikisch for the first movement, because nobody can compare with him in exposition of the great opening theme for strings and the accompanying harmonies of the brass choir. Whom should we choose for the final movement? Perhaps there is no conductor wholly competent to read this section of the symphony today. If there is anybody who has a mastery of such long contour of phrase as used to sing out from the Symphony orchestra strings under the baton of Gericke, such a one would be the man to read Tschaikowsky's wonderful adagio.

In the "Tannhaeuser" overture not a note failed to get the light touch of expression or the emphasis required to produce the fluent beauties of the work. The "Siegfried Idyl" came shining forth in all its alluring loveliness. The "Don Juan" tone poem, played for the only time this season, was terrific in its great, gusty sweeps of passion and thrilling in its tender lyrical passages.

The Tschaikowsky symphony from the beautiful opening adagio with the marvellous song that might be called a hymn of resignation, through the graceful allegro of the second movement and the daring defiance of the third to the inexpressibly pathetic lamentation of the finale was produced with a vital intensity and a glowing fire that will cause it to live long in the memories of those who heard it.

TRANSCRIPT,
[illegible]RCH 10, 1913

THE MASTERFUL MUCK

A REMARKABLE CONCERT FOR THE PENSION FUND

As Usual the Occasion Stirs Orchestra and Conductor—From Power to Finesse in Wagner's Music—Strauss's "Don Juan" in All Its Sweep and Magnificence—The "Pathetic" Symphony Lifted from Nervous Frenzies Into Tragedy

ALMOST always in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund the band and the conductor are on their mettle. They are occasional concerts, and not the regular series running its regular course. They are concerts for an audience quite different from those which assemble on the twenty-four Fridays and the twenty-four Saturdays of "the season"—an audience that does not take the virtues of the orchestra for granted and that thrills eagerly and openly to the music and the playing that it hears. The cynics may be left to say that the orchestra usually outdoes itself at these Pension Fund concerts, because it is playing the receipts thereof into its own pockets. Be the impelling cause and the attendant circumstance what they may, the fact remains out of long experience. Moreover, the conductor usually makes an interesting programme for these same concerts. It is not above the head of anyone who cares for symphonic music; yet it does not consist of pieces aimed indiscriminately at average ears and emotions. Oftenest the chosen items have the virtue of familiarity in themselves and of novelty in the interpretation that they receive. Now and again more or less of them are music that has not recently been heard at the regular Symphony Concerts and will not for the current season be heard there. Thus for the first time since Dr. Muck's return the orchestra played yesterday afternoon Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Wagner, in this Wagner-starved town, is almost as essential at a Pension Fund concert, and out of his music came the other two pieces on the programme—the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the "Siegfried Idyl."

The orchestra was on its mettle and the conductor, too. They had not gone far into the overture to "Tannhäuser" before the long, steadily moving, steadily glowing sweep of the cumulating Pilgrims' Chorus was clear proof of it. The proof waxed in the nervous bite with which the strings and the rest accented the music of the Venusberg. It was clearest of all for Dr. Muck when he made the song in praise of Venus move like a richly colored thread drawn across this background, and when the horns clearly added their intoning voices to the proclaiming sonorities of the finale. The brass choir of the orchestra is one thing under Dr. Muck and another under all his predecessors. He never lets his trumpets, his trombones and his tuba make a din for the din's sake; yet never once does he strip them of their characteristic clanging or deepening voices. He never reduces them to an epicene suavity; he keeps them mellow but not strident, save only where the music bids them be so. As they are now—and the horns yesterday with them, they are thrilling to hear in the breadth, the depth, the glowing warmth of their power. They are as expressive as are the strings or even, almost, the clarinets.

The playing of the "Siegfried Idyl" proved, in turn, how wide-ranging is this virtuosity, though that finicking word seems sometimes to belittle the supple power that it would designate. For even when a big orchestra in a big concert-room plays Wagner's music for the woman who was the mother of his son, it is still music in miniature that must run in the finest of proportionings, the most delicate of shadings, the brightest and yet the gentlest threads of curving and recurving melody. The whole piece is soft musical rapture to be released in the softest of tones. The transitions in it are the birth and the rebirth of this rapture. The little climaxes are more than the gathering and the swelling of the lines of the long-held melodics; their culminating trills are also the climax of the gently rapturous mood behind them. Wagner's heart sings within him and spontaneously his music sings with it. Yet there it is asking such feats of adroit shading, of delicate adjustment, of interwoven melody and arabesque as orchestra and conductor were accomplishing yesterday. They might have accomplished them with a dry and meticulous precision and perfection. They did accomplish them as though they were the spontaneous voice of the song sung to Cosima on that Christmas morning and as though they were all the Wagner who wrote it and set the little orchestra to singing out of the fulness of his own happiness. For it is the glory of Dr. Muck's conducting of the Symphony Orchestra that he persuades it in equal measure to flawless technical virtue, to endless suppleness, to euphony and beauty of tone, and yet keeps that tone and all these attributes the expression of the mood and the movement, the passion or the play of the music. The orchestra under his hand becomes a more beautiful and thrilling instrument because it is so expressive; and a more expressive instrument because its tone and all the rest of its songful qualities are so beautiful.

In little all these qualities were written across the playing of the "Siegfried Idyl." They flamed out of the performance of "Don Juan." And what music it is! Strauss wrote it in the golden prime of his youth when all his powers were still touched with young fire. There is the projecting power that at the very beginning flings Don Juan out of the music upon the imagination, more alive, more vivid than many a living figure of the theatre. There is the power to weave atmosphere that [illegible]akes the music of the Don move against [illegible]ot-blooded, passion-heated, glowing, [illegible]orld—a world in which men loved, dreamed [illegible] in a surfeit of their own passions. There, too, is the power to write the intensely sensuous and deep-voiced melody in which the Don woos. Side by side with it is the intellectual faculty that sets the orchestra whirling with his unachieved desires and makes the minds of those that listen whirl scarcely less with them. Strauss's and Lenau's Don is choked out of life by sheer excess of will to enjoy it to the dregs. He dies of a magnificent and heroic surfeit. He deserves such a magnificent and tireless music, driving itself forward with its own eloquence, saturated with the richness of its own colors. In it, too, is the Strauss that can make his momentary delineative strokes so that they cut the imagination as with a swift, sure thrust. Of such is the suggestion of Don Juan's death and the orchestra drove it home. Already it had projected him out of the puissance of Strauss's tones and their own; wrought the tonal tapestries against which he moves; caught the passionate life that is in every measure of the tone-poem and wooed as with his voice multiplied a hundred-fold in theirs. And through all the blaze and rush of all this passion, musical outline had stood out clear. Twenty different powers of an orchestra and a conductor had coalesced into one that vitalized and revealed.

The ordering of those powers was more remarkable than the powers themselves in the playing of the "Pathetic" symphony. Dr. Muck scaled the performance largely as though Tschaikowsky would write a tragedy of emotion in his music that ran deeper than nervous frenzies. He did not squeeze the last drop out of the songful melody of the first movement as though he would saturate orchestra and hearers with it. But he gave it true character as the music that might stir in a composer's imagination when he sees the face of dead pleasures peering into his. No more did Dr. Muck languish through the second movement. He took it indeed at a quicker pace than do many conductors; but so taken, when the syncopations came, it sounded like the music of life that is choked so bitter are its disillusions, the disillusions as many and reiterated as those recurring drum beats. It is one thing to make the march an orgy of suspending, titillating and finally unleashed orchestral sound. It is another to make the music sound as Dr. Muck made it sound, like the voice of a life whipped by its own passion for action yet finding and keeping no outlet. The music of the finale may seem like spent frenzy dying of its own exhaustion. Or it may seem like the blackness of despair closing in with each new measure until there is naught else in the music, until the end is a universal silence and a universal blackness—tragedy wrapped in the pall with which the poets liked to clothe her. In this way does Dr. Muck order and recreate the music until Tschaikowsky's moody imaginings and nervous frenzies seem vast and epic, less of one man than of a universe made in his image. It is then that a conductor becomes creator too.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,
M[illegible]CH 10,

DAY CONCERT FOR PENSION

First Sunday Matinee by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon, the second of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given this season, Dr. Muck conducting, took place in Symphony Hall. The auditorium was crowded and many stood in the aisles. The programme was one of unusual interest and importance, including some music which was thought forbidding and iconoclastic even 10 years ago.

Without exception these compositions made a great popular appeal. The programme was as follows: Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Symphonie Pathetique," Tschaikowsky.

The list was worthy of the occasion and the occasion was an auspicious one. For the first time in the history of concerts which are given for the increase of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony, a Sunday afternoon audience was given the opportunity to hear this superb organization play great orchestral music.

No Soloist to Disturb

The arrangement is a commendable one on the part of the management, for many who could not attend a concert in the evening can do so easily in the afternoon, and yesterday there were present a number who probably heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all its glory for the first time. Nor was there the disturbing element of a soloist. A soloist, however great, is almost certain by his choice of a composition and his performance of it to interfere with the balance and the coherence of a good concert programme; and what player is there on any instrument who could match this splendid band? The public assembled to listen to the eloquent interpretation of orchestral masterpieces for their own sake. There was not the bait offered by the "person[illegible] of a bejewelled prima donna or

The pieces of W[illegible]er are well known and they certainly require no description at this time. The interpretation of the Siegfried Idyl was especially poetic, worthy of the music which Wagner wrote for his wife on the occasion of the birth of their son. The Tannhauser overture made again an overwhelming effect.

We may suppose that the "Don Juan" of Lenau was especially suggestive to Strauss. The "Don Juan" of any poet might well be. Nor is there necessity for the rather elaborate programme which certain followers of Strauss have attached to the work. The music, without a programme, tels us that Don Juan was of a knightly and reckless nature; that he was heroic as well as sensual; that he eagerly drained the cup of life to the dregs, and that when death came to him, life was bitter in his mouth. The force and the splendor of the music are superb. This art of Strauss, not so fine as that of Wagner, is yet incredibly vital, nervous, volcanic in its force; of today.

Tschaikowsky at His Best

But to many, the feature of the concert was the performance of Tschaikowsky's symphony. This symphony is played, perhaps, too often. Hearing it so often, the hardened concert goer is capable of forgetting what a masterpiece it is. It is in this work, after all, that the over-rich musical and emotional nature of Tschaikowsky found full vent. It is in this work that his technique is ripest and that he is most himself. And if two movements are a little greater than two others, they are the third movement—the wild march that is as the hosts of the earth gathering for the last battle—and the noble dirge, a lamentation so poignant and so beautiful that it places its composer in the highest ranks of those who have written symphonic music in the last 50 years. This threnody will live as long as any of the music that we know today endures. It is not the voice of an individual, or even of a nation.

It is the voice that sings the last song for perishing humanity. Dr. Muck's mastery of forces and his personal magnetism have never been displayed to better advantage. There had been little time for preparation, but in Strauss' piece, and even more in this gorgeous music of Tschaikowsky, it was as though every member of the orchestra were a part of the conductor, knowing his most secret thought, instinct with his creative will. This performance was a memora[illegible] one. No wonder that there was appla[illegible]. No wonder that Dr. Muck was recalled, and that after the Strauss piece his orchestra rose with him to acknowledge the homage of the people.

BOSTON [illegible]LOBE
[illegible]H 10, 1913.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr Muck and Orchestra Are the Soloists.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" and Strauss' "Don Juan" Played.

Yesterday for the first time a concert for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the afternoon instead of the evening. The extraordinary success with the public of the series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall remained unbroken, and an audience was present which filled the house and showed great enthusiasm.

Dr Muck wth the orchestra itself proved the soloist of the occasion, and made the name and presence of some eminent singer or instrumentalist unnecessary. The program was a popular one, beginning with the "Tannhauser" overture, followed by the "Siegfried Idyl," Strauss' "Don Juan" was given as the second of the tone poems Dr Muck has played this year, and was performed with spirit and virtuosity.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony occupied the latter half of the program, music which had great vogue a decade ago, it often seems built for a taste that revels in sobs and sentimentality. There are pages of power and emotional expressiveness as in the last movement and portions of the first, which Dr Muck and his players performed with just distinction. The concert next Sunday afternoon will be a joint recital by Julia Culp and Mr Godowsky.

TRAVELER H[illegible]ALD,
MARCH 8,

YSAYE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Great Violinist Heard in Two Concertos in a Fine Program.

By FRANK BE[illegible]WALL.

What a wealth of [illegible] Dr. Muck gave at yesterday aftern[illegible] public rehearsal of the Sympho[illegible] Orchest[illegible] There was Eugene Ysaye i[illegible] bers, Vilvaldi, concerto for [illegible] orchestr[illegible] Saint-Saens, violin concerto No. 3, B-minor; Sinding, symphony in D-minor, No. 1 and Loeffler, "Pagan Poem" for orchestra. Was there too much of it, not necessarily in the length of the concert but in its wealth of offering? Surely the Sinding symphony is a feast in itself.

Would that it was the custom to give more than one hearing of such a symphony in the same season so that the listner could properly appreciate its great merits and Dr. Muck's fine reading. As it is with one hearing its charms come so fast that one can scarcely begin to estimate one before another is crowding for attention.

So was it with Ysaye. Never has this great violinist played in this city before as he played the Valvaldi concerto. It was magnificent, and the accompaniment was in keeping with the excellence of the soloist, the strings and Mr. Marshal at the organ being noticeably fine. While the audience was congratulating itself on the treat, came the Loeffler number which was so artistically given that the audience would not be satisfied until the composer had twice bowed his acknowledgements, Mr. Gebhardt and answered several recalls and it had made a number of ineffectual attempts to get Mr. Longy to acknowledge its appreciation of his playing the English horn.

Then came the Saint-Saens concerto which Ysaye played as only he can play. Truly it was the concert of concerts.

ADVERTISER,
MARCH 10,

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The final concert for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall. The programme was wholly orchestral; the Tannhauser Overture and the Siegfried Idyl (Wagner), the Strauss Tone-Poem "Don Juan," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

The two "Pension Fund" concerts always take rank among the finest and most inspiring concerts of the year. At these times the enthusiasm of conductor, players and audience carries all before it. The routine spirit, the blase air, the indifferent attitude of the regular symphony concerts is gone, while a fresh, eager audience awaits and greets them in no uncertain manner. Yesterday Dr. Muck, and the players too, shared in this whole-hearted enthusiasm which naturally resulted in an overwhelmingly powerful reading of the "Pathetic," an intensely dramatic portrayal of "Don Juan," an unrivaled performance of the "Siegfried" Idyl and a magnificently eloquent unfolding of the Tannhauser Overture.

Our orchestra has many times, and justly, gained laurels by its playing of these four works and it is safe to say that yesterday one of them approached as near to perfection as we can hope for, in an art so intangible, so elusive as is music. For excellence of ensemble, for euphony and beauty of tone, for dexterity in the delineation and exposition of the themes, it would be difficult to match Dr. Muck or our orchestra in its performance of the "Siegfried Idyl." Its finely-spun contrapuntal web has seldom been so carefully and minutely exhibited, its phrases seldom so exquisitely read, its proportion and its imaginative content seldom so sympathetically drawn. It was a masterful reading of a masterpiece.

We cannot help comparing Dr. Muck's "version" of the Sixth Tschaikowsky Symphony with Mr. Nikisch's powerful reading of the work last season. The latter found in it wild, turbulent phrases, untamed large-voiced music, climax upon climax, while the former takes a more temperate view preferring to adorn, polish and beautify his phrases, to soften the climaxes, to bind and to tie the music. If ever there was surging, roaring music, here it is. To tame it, to modify it is as wholly out of place as to permit the March of the third movement to be played as Dr. Muck ordered it. This march lost much of its majesty by this close adherence to a strict rhythm. The 5-4 movement, too, lost its usual sinister effect for the same reasons. This movement is certainly a shining example of a musical paradox,—with its pretty dance themes, its bright colors and its menacing foreboding atmosphere.

On the other hand it is very easy for an orchestra to become [illegible]erely [illegible] and for the effects to assum[illegible] a th[illegible], cheap garb as frequently [illegible]ppen[illegible] This was at all times avoided and in its stead we heard a perfectly-played, well-balanced, powerful symphony.

G. S. M.

From TIMES
Address: New York. MAR 9
Date

DR. MUCK TO STAY IN BOSTON

Conductor's Contract with Symphony Orchestra Has Four Years to Run.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued the following announcement:

"Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next Fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

"These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words, there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

"Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last Fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last Spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

"In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysées Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

"Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917."

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York MAR 7 1913
Date

NEIGHBOR Boston rises to remark with righteous indignation that humor and gossip have been busy for several weeks making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston. The gossips named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release.

Since Muck arrived in America he has been besieged with requests to take various posts in Europe at Munich, to succeed Felix Mottl; at Vienna, as head of the opera. Imperial Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been asked to lead special operas in Darmstadt and other German towns, and within the week he received a call to conduct "Parsifal" in January, 1914, at the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris.

All these offers he has positively declined. His address will be Boston until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

From HERALD
Address: New York MAR 7 - 1913
Date

DR. MUCK TO REMAIN.

Reports from various sources that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would sever his connection with the organization at the close of the present season have caused so much annoyance to persons vitally interested in the orchestra that Mr. C. A. Ellis, its manager, has issued a statement concerning Dr. Muck's future.

Mr. Ellis says Dr. Muck is under a four year contract to the Boston Symphony, and has no intention of asking for a release from it, despite the fact that he has been besieged with requests to take i portant posts in Europe. All these off Dr. Muck has refused, Mr. Ellis says.

Establ

Newspape ourge
From N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITUNG
Address MAR 7 1913
Date

Dr. Muck bleibt.

Im Hinblick auf die Gerüchte, daß Dr. Karl Muck die Leitung des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters vorzeitig niederlegen würde, macht der Geſchäftsführer des Orcheſters, C. A. Ellis, bekannt, daß Dr. Muck ſeinen vierjährigen Kontrakt einhalten wird, obwohl er verlockende Angebote aus Europa erhalten hat.

Nettes Erlebnis.

Establ

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City MAR 6 - 1913
Date

Concerning Dr. Karl Muck.

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston orchestra, writes: "These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is not a shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment." Dr. Muck has received many offers from abroad, but has declined all of them.

Estab

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

DR. MUCK NOT TO QUIT ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Manager Brands All Rumors as Groundless.

Branding as groundless all rumors to the effect that Dr. Karl Muck will leave America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is director, after the close of the current season, C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, issued the following statement:

"Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips even have named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

"These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words, there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

"Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been beseiged with requests to take important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

"In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of Parsifal in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

"Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917."

Es , 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 19. The soloist announced is Otto Urack, who shares the first desk of the violoncello section with Heinrich Warnke and is the assistant conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Urack is one of the most talented and interesting musicians the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever brought to America. He will play the D'Albert Conce

Establishe

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 9 1913

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him f the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of Parsifal in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of season of 1916-1917.

Piano pupils of Mr. Hopkins' at W

Establis

From
Address
Date

DR. KARL MUCK WILL NOT LEAVE POST IN BOSTON

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees opera house in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

Esta 84

From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Other Musical Events

Among the musical events of this week will be a violin recital by John A. Ciancarulo, assisted by Rafael Miany, pianist, in Musical Fund Hall, on Tuesday night; and a piano recital in the auditorium of the Central Branch of the Y. M. C. A., by Raymond Lewis Yeakel, assisted by Miss Marian Moyer, contralto; Miss Sara Lemer, violinist, and Frank E. Cresson, accompanist.

The management of the Boston Symphony categorically denies the reports recently circulated that Dr. Karl Muck would resign his post as director of the organization. Since Doctor Muck arrived in America last fall, he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Nottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera.

In addition to these offers, Doctor Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of Parsifal in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Doctor Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917. Under Doctor Muck's baton, the Boston Orchestra will give a concert here in the Academy of Music

The Philadelphia Choral Society announces that it will present in the Academy on the night of April 17, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," in place of Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life," originally scheduled. Herbert Witherspoon, basso of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, will be one of the soloists. The Philadelphia Operatic Society's spring program includes the presentation in the Academy on the night of April 24 of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" in English, and the Delibes ballet of "Coppelia."

Estal 84

the worl

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establi

Rumor and gossip have been busy several weeks past making plans for Karl Muck, the conductor of the orc tra. There have been some variati regarding just where in Europe he is ing next fall, but all the reports s to be unanimous concerning his leav Boston, and the Boston Symphony chestra at the end of the present seas The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Doctor Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release.

Since Doctor Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers, Doctor Muck has been requested to lead especial performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Doctor Muck will be in Boston, at least, until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est

The last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 17. The soloist for this concert will be Julia Culp. At its concert in February the Boston Symphony had the pleasure of introducing to Philadelphia the most eminent newcomer among pianists of recent years, Max Pauer, who has been, pianistically speaking, the sensation of the season. In Julia Culp the orchestra will have a so who has been among the singers of the season what Pauer has been among the pianists. This most charming artis is a Dutch woman, the possessor of mezzo-soprano voice of unusual beauty character and plasticity and past mis tress in the art of singing the grea songs of musical literature. It usuall takes a singer three or four years establish herself in America, but Cu in one season, at least in New York an Boston, has been able to fill large ha for her recitals. Her appearance with t orchestra here will be an event of gre significance. She will sing three son with orchestra by Schubert, Wagne "Traume" and two of the songs fr Beethoven's "Egmont."

---

gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last Fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last Spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 9 1913

Establis

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment. Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the principal 'cellists, will be the soloist at the next concert by the orchestra in the Academy of Music, Friday evening March 21. He will play the d'Albert Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. The feature of the programme will be MacDowell's ever-beautiful "Indian" suite.

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date

Es k, 1884

THE LATEST MUSIC GOSSIP

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book Philip Hale gives interesting details regarding the life of Emmanuel Chabrier, whose early death was so much deplored by all who are interested in French music. Concerning his last year, we read:

"It was about 1890 that the friends of Chabrier became alarmed about his health. He would absent himself from Paris for weeks, seeking rest in the country. The symptoms grew more threatening. He was subject to vertigo, which would disappear only when he went to the pianoforte. He was now thin, sombre, irritable. His one longing was to complete 'Briseis.' Having played the first act to comrades in Paris, he said: 'You will not see me for a long time. I am sick, and like the animals, I am going to hide myself.' And he was not seen until the first and tardy performance of 'Gwendoline' in Paris. On the night of the dress rehearsal he sat in a box between his wife and sons. The audience and the orchestra applauded at the end. He did not know what it was all about. Catulle Mendes pushed him forward, and then Chabrier put his hand on his heart and wept. Paralysis of the brain gave him death in life. What was left of his spirit departed from the body September 13, 1894. It was his wish to be buried at Passy near Victor Wilder and Manet. There was no room for him in that graveyard, and the burial was at Montparnasse."

Chabrier had strong aversions and great enthusiasms. Two of his idols were Cesar Franck and Richard Wagner—two men as far apart as composers can be. Robert Brussel gives details regarding Chabrier's love of Wagner:

"One night at the Opera, during a performance of 'The Valkyrie,' he prevented me from hearing a note of the music drama, constantly elbowing me to draw my attention, analyzing the music for me, overpowering me with technical details, which he punctuated with interjections of admiration. The difficulty of restraining his enthusiasm was shown in his books. His edition of Wagner, which I preserve preciously as a gift from his family, bears in the margins strokes of the admiring pencil. On each page there is an exclamation point, or 'How beautiful!' or 'Admirable!' and great lines made with the sweeping gesture characteristic of him enclose especially loved passages."

From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 8 1913

Es 1884

DR. MUCK WILL STAY.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Will Not Go Back to Europe.

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and it is said there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. Last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-17.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date MAR 9 13

k, 1884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performance of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysées Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

The final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati, which was played here six years ago by Dr. Muck. It was at that time generally regarded as Mr. Loeffler's highest achievement in music. Anton Witek, the justly admired concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms concerto. The principal number of the Saturday programme will be the humorous tone poem of the Czechian composer, Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz," which has been played with such extraordinary success in Chicago. There will be no soloist Saturday.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

Est 1884

The final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati, which was played he ago by Dr. Muck. It was at that time generally regarded as Mr. Loeffler's highest achievement in music. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms Concerto. principal number on the Saturday umorous tone the world

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 9 1913

Establi

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Doctor Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release.

Since Doctor Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers, Doctor Muck has been requested to lead especial performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Doctor Muck will be in Boston, at least, until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est

* * *

The last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 17. The soloist for this concert will be Julia Culp. At its concert in February the Boston Symphony had the pleasure of introducing to Philadelphia the most eminent newcomer among pianists of recent years, Max Pauer, who has been, pianistically speaking, the sensation of the season. In Julia Culp the orchestra will have a soloist who has been among the singers of the season what Pauer has been among the pianists. This most charming artist is a Dutch woman, the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice of unusual beauty, character and plasticity and past mistress in the art of singing the great songs of musical literature. It usually takes a singer three or four years to establish herself in America, but Culp in one season, at least in New York and Boston, has been able to fill large halls for her recitals. Her appearance with the orchestra here will be an event of great significance. She will sing three songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two of the songs from Beethoven's "Egmont."

---

gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last Fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last Spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

NDARD UNION
rooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 9 1913

umor and gossip have been busy several weeks past making plans Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. have been some variations reg just where in Europe he is next fall, but all the reports to be unanimous concerning aving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment. Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the principal 'cellists, will be the soloist at the next concert by the orchestra in the Academy of Music, Friday evening March 21. He will play the d'Albert Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. The feature of the programme will be MacDowell's ever-beautiful "Indian" suite.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

HE LATEST MUSIC GOSSIP

k, 1884

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book Philip Hale gives interesting details regarding the life of Emmanuel Chabrier, whose early death was so much deplored by all who are interested in French music. Concerning his last year, we read:

"It was about 1890 that the friends of Chabrier became alarmed about his health. He would absent himself from Paris for weeks, seeking rest in the country. The symptoms grew more threatening. He was subject to vertigo, which would disappear only when he went to the pianoforte. He was now thin, sombre, irritable. His one longing was to complete 'Briseis.' Having played the first act to comrades in Paris, he said: 'You will not see me for a long time. I am sick, and like the animals, I am going to hide myself.' And he was not seen until the first and tardy performance of 'Gwendoline' in Paris. On the night of the dress rehearsal he sat in a box between his wife and sons. The audience and the orchestra applauded at the end. He did not know what it was all about. Catulle Mendes pushed him forward, and then Chabrier put his hand on his heart and wept. Paralysis of the brain gave him death in life. What was left of his spirit departed from the body September 13, 1894. It was his wish to be buried at Passy near Victor Wilder and Manet. There was no room for him in that graveyard, and the burial was at Montparnasse."

Chabrier had strong aversions and great enthusiasms. Two of his idols were Cesar Franck and Richard Wagner—two men as far apart as composers can be. Robert Brussel gives details regarding Chabrier's love of Wagner:

"One night at the Opera, during a performance of 'The Valkyrie,' he prevented me from hearing a note of the music drama, constantly elbowing me to draw my attention, analyzing the music for me, overpowering me with technical details, which he punctuated with interjections of admiration. The difficulty of restraining his enthusiasm was shown in his books. His edition of Wagner, which I preserve preciously as a gift from his family, bears in the margins strokes of the admiring pencil. On each page there is an exclamation point, or 'How beautiful!' or 'Admirable!' and great lines made with the sweeping gesture characteristic of him enclose especially loved passages."

From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 8 1913

Es 1884

DR. MUCK WILL STAY.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Will Not Go Back to Europe.

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and it is said there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. Last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-17.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date MAR

, 1884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have even named Felix Weingartner as his successor. These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run, and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back. In addition to these offers Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performance of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysées Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined. Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

The final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati, which was played here six years ago by Dr. Muck. It was at that time generally regarded as Mr. Loeffler's highest achievement in music. Anton Witek, the justly admired concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms concerto. The principal number of the Saturday programme will be the humorous tone poem of the Czechian composer, Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz," which has been played with such extraordinary success in Chicago. There will be no soloist Saturday.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

Est 1884

The final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati, which was played here ago by Dr. Muck. It was at that time generally regarded as Mr. Loeffler's highest achievement in music. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms Concerto. principal number on the Saturday rous tone

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date MAR 9 - 1913

NEWS OF THE MUSIC WORLD.

The final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati, which was played here six years ago by Dr. Muck. Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms Concerto.

The principal number on the Saturday programme will be the humorous tone form of the Czech composer, Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." There will be no soloist Saturday.

Es 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date MAR 9 - 1913

Dr. Muck Will Stay with Boston Orchestra

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next Fall.

These reports have caused much annoyance to those vitally interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last Fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe As long ago as last Spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for the head of the Vienna opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season of 1916-1917.

Estt 84

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 8 - 1913

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes that stories as to the defection of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, are entirely without foundation. His contract has four years to run and he has no intention of asking for a release, despite the tempting offers that he is getting from the most important music centres of Europe.

rk, 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Last Concert of Boston Symphony.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 19. The soloist announced is Otto Urack, who shares the first desk of the violincello section with Heinrich Warnke, and is the assistant conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Urack is one of the most talented and interesting musicians the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever brought to America. He is one of the foremost cellists of the world, is a composer of no mean ability and has unquestionably before him a distinguished career as a conductor. In December and January during the illness of Dr. Muck Mr. Urack took his place with much success. He is a pupil of Hausmann in Berlin, has been principal cellist for several years of the Berlin Royal Opera and solo cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth. He will play the d'Albert Concerto.

Estab 884

Address New York

The final Boston Symphony concerts will be given March 20-22, when Dr. Muck will offer Thursday evening "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler, and Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms concerto.

The principal number on the Saturday programme will be the humorous tone poem of the Czech composer Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz," which our good American friends may translate into "Mutt and Jeff," "Kolb and Dill," or some other equally renowned combination.

ork, 1884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 9 - 1913

Sundry reports to the effect that Dr. Earl Muck would resign his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have lately been circulated. Dr. Muck's present contract with the orchestra has four years to run and there is no shadow of truth in the report that he has any intention whatever of asking a release. In other words there has been absolutely no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to obtain him for the head of the Vienna opera.

In addition to these offers, Dr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Darmstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parsifal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of the season 1916-1917.

Establ 34

From
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

LAST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 19. The soloist announced is Otto Urack, who shares the first desk of the violincello section with Heinrich Warnke, and is the assistant conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Urack is one of the most talented and interesting musicians the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever brought to America. He is one of the foremost cellists of the world, is a composer of no mean ability and has unquestionably before him a distinguished career as a conductor. In December and January during the illness of Dr. Muck Mr. Urack took his place with much success. He is a pupil of Hausmann in Berlin, has been principal cellist for several years of the Berlin Royal Opera and solo cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth. He will play the d'Albert Concerto.

Establ 384

TRANSCRIPT.
MARCH 13, 1913

NEWS OF MUSIC

Warning

THE new orchestral burletta "Max and Moritz," will begin the Symphony Concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The piece is twenty-five or thirty minutes' long, and, as the composer intended, it will be played without pause. Latecomers will, then, be subjected to a long and annoying delay in the corridors if they are tardy in taking their seats. Moreover, "Max and Moritz" is the most interesting item of the programme.

It is not too late to repair an oversight of yesterday and to acknowledge the obligations of the department and of P. G. C. to the programme books of the Chicago Orchestra and to Mr. Borowski, who edits them, for the running narrative of the adventures of Max and Moritz in the anticipatory article printed in this place. The exposition of the music, however, was not his

Comparative Programmes

The outstanding item in Dr. Muck's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday is, of course, the new, noted or notorious burletta, "Max and Moritz"; but it is long since Charpentier's individual and pictorial "Impressions of Italy" have been played by the Symphony Orchestra. The full programme is:

Symphonic Burlesque, "Max and Moritz" Mraczek
Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (The Mephisto Waltz) .... Liszt
Impressions of Italy .... Charpentier

In Chicago, Mr. Stock has put on his programme Strauss's Suite for thirteen wind instruments, played here this season by the Longy Club. The other items are repertory pieces:

Overture, "Carnival" .... Dvoràk
Serenade for Strings in D minor, No. 3 . Volkmann
Suite in B-flat for 13 Wind Instruments . . Strauss Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "The Pathetic" .... Tschaikowsky

For the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski's programme is:

Symphony in C, No. 2 .... Schumann
Concerto for Violoncello .... Dvoràk
Love-Scene from "Feuersnot" .... Strauss
The Dance of Salome .... Strauss
Soloist: Mr. Sandby.

About Concerts

Next Sunday the Symphony Orchestra departs on its final journey of the season to New York and the other cities that it visits monthly. In Philadelphia, Mme. Culp will be the assisting singer. In Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, Mr. Urack will play Dvoràk's concerto for 'cello as the solo piece; and at one of the concerts in New York Mr. Witek will undertake Brahms's concerto for violin. He was to play it there last year, but illness disabled him. Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "Max and Moritz" both stand on the programmes for New York and "Max and Moritz" is to be played also in Philadelphia and Baltimore.

TRAVELER HERALD,
MARCH 15, 1913.

CHARPENTIER WORK CONCERT FEATURE

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The program of yesterday afternoon,s public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra was: Mraczels, Symphonic Burlesque "Maxand Moritz;" Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz," and Charpentier, Orchestral Suite, "Impressions of Italy." It was a program making unusual demands upon the orchestra, and the masterly way in which these demands were met was far from being the least imporant feature of the afternoon.

Seldom, if ever, have so many opp[illegible]tunities been afforded in one concert [illegible] hearing the solo players of the orc[illegible]stra to such advantage. Mr. De Vot[illegible] at the piano was an added pleasure. S[illegible]cial mention is called for in the play[illegible] of the viola, harp, 'cello, flute and oboe.

Mraczek's burlesque was interesting, if not always convincing. The composer was rather more successful in demonstrating musical youngsters. When he tried to be funny he seemed to labor. Mracbek comes pretty close to employing every known musical instrument in his work and for the most part interestingly.

Liszt5s "Mephisto Waltz" falls far short of presenting the composer at his best, and the even number as played by the Symphony was not particularly interesting.

On the other hand, Charpentier's orchestral suite is wonderfully beautiful and was most charmingly given. It was easily the feature of the concert.

There are to be no concerts the coming week, as the orchestra starts tomorrow night on its last southern trip of the season.

BOSTON AMERICAN-
MARCH 15, 1913.

Symphony Gives "Max Und Moritz" as a Novelty

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

A Symphonic Burlesque for Grand Orchestra by Mraczek, one of the modern school of German composers, had the place of honor on the Symphony program yesterday afternoon. This work is entitled "Max und Moritz," two youngsters who correspond in Germany to our friends, the Katzenjammer Kids.

It is descriptive music gone mad. Whether the composer is making fun of the modern programists with his efforts to picture on an orchestra the two little boys climbing down a chimney, falling into a pan of dough, getting baked in an oven and eating their way out, sawing a plank in halves and precipitating a tailor into a river, and finally getting ground up in a saw mill, or whether he is seriously intending to describe these things in a humorous manner, I don't know. He is probably serious.

As description this work is utter rubbish. As music it is atrocious. It is compounded of racket and twaddle of uproar and dinkiness. Its themes are cheap as dirt and its only excuse for appearance upon a Symphony program is its pretentiousness. Not content with a grand orchestra, the composer dragged in an organ and pianoforte to make a show.

Admitting an orchestral dexterity that may appeal to students of cacophony, it is melodiously not half so meritorious as "Alexander's Rag-Time Band."

In marked contrast to this stuff was the suave, dignified and elegant "Impressions of Italy" by Charpentier; music that is a trifle too sentimental, but which makes its appeal without recourse to orchestral eccentricities, and which does suggest the scenes and incidents it purports to describe.

The marvelous "Dance in the Village Tavern" by Liszt, which is the second episode from Lenau's "Faust," is indeed descriptive music that is successful, for it requires little imagination to conceive of the Devil fiddling this wicked, passionate, diabolical waltz.

If we question the taste of performing "Max und Moritz," we must admire the brilliancy with which the thing was played. And the loveliness of the strings, and especially the fine qualities of the violincellos was never more evident than in the Charpentier number.

r. Muck's Symphonic Burlesque ax and Moritz" Made Orchestral Fun

By P. G. C.

AMERICA perhaps is not acquainted with Max and Moritz, but Germany regards them as two of her best-known citizens. Their doings, as set forth in Fliegende r with the droll descriptions and still er drawings of Wilhelm Busch, have diately appealed to the broad humor he German people, so that today, h their creator has been dead only a years, the two urchins are almost as a part of the folklore of their country s Hänsel and Gretel.

ere now emerges from the wild and ly East—to be exact, from Bohemia violinist and composer who has used pranks of Max and Moritz as a basis a symphonic burletta to be played for first time in Boston at the Symphony certs of this week, and the first venture ne orchestra for long into such music. e is known of this composer, from h we may infer that he has written other pieces, since his name—Mraczek—is which when once thoroughly learned uld not be easily forgotten. He dwells Brünn in Bohemia, and he began his er as a player in the orchestra of the n Theatre, later becoming its second t master. He founded a string quar- Brünn, and is now a teacher in the school of the Brünn Musikverein and he newer Conservatory of Music, which first opened in 1900. Mraczek's pub- ed compositions comprise an opera, Er Traum," brought out at the Royal ra, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; uintet in E-flat for piano and strings; Nocturne for violin and piano; Three ces in Dance Form for pianoforte; and present Symphonic Burlesque. Mraczek also written incidental music to the y "Kismet."

sity of Music

"Max and Moritz" presents to the eye a ll-executed score of considerable length, eadth, and thickness, in which the ole of a large orchestra is kept employed with the persistency born of fa- ity. There are no explanatory remarks, the hearer is, of course, expected to be eady familiar with the story. The nposition is a daring and brilliant r de force, and as such it is successful musically satisfactory. It reconciles purely musical and the descriptive elements of the piece with a felicity which alls "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The ematic material is not distinguished, but is adequate and always apt; the development and treatment of this material are not agiaristically imitative of Strauss, but ey take the Strauss idiom for granted as established style and use it with easy liarity. There is nothing in the music d one to believe that Mraczek is a accompanied by soft cackles of the woodwind and an occasional crow; here is a broad sub-climax. Then the typical theme of Max and Moritz gradually squirms into prominence; there is a confused, scuffling development, interspersed with crows and cackles, and finally a long-sustained climax in which the merriment of the Max and Moritz theme and the raging fury of the peaceful theme of the widow suggest the mental states and dynamic relationships of the characters.

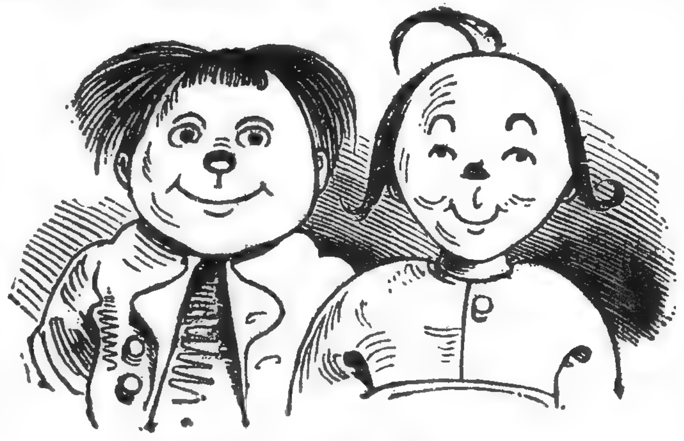
Prank Two—The Cooking

The hens and the rooster having come to an untimely end, the sorrowing Mrs. Bolte—realizing with some agony of spirit that even dead chickens are not without their uses—determines to cook and eat them. With streaming eyes she trusses the birds, and puts them on the stove to fry. The pleasant odor of the cooking birds attracts the attention of Max and Moritz, and those two tormentors scramble to the roof of the widow's cottage, and with the assistance of a fishing rod and line pull the fowls up through the chimney. When the widow perceives that the frying pan is empty she belabors her dog Spitz—an innocent bystander—as the culprit who must have devoured the birds. Meanwhile Max and Moritz have eaten the chickens, and gorged with their booty, are lying asleep in a secluded place.



Max and Moritz

In the music there is, first, a doleful recitative for clarinet, to which a little later, other instruments are added; then instruments in the middle register begin a monotonous repeated figure, which from its use of certain tone colors, is ridiculously suggestive of what good New Englanders call "frizzling." The boys' theme reappears; a succession of upward scales in various instrumental groups suggests the ascent of the chickens through the chimney. The Max and Moritz theme romps with glee; then the consternation of widow Bolte gains the upper hand, and the movement ends with her lamentations.

Prank Three—The Bridge

Herein is related the doleful adventures of Mr. Böck, the tailor—a good-natured fellow, on friendly terms with everyone. Max and Moritz take unkind advantage of the tailor's estimable character, for they saw the plank that crosses the brook which flows before his house. The boys then inveigle forth Mr. Böck by shouting a nickpomposity opens the variation; then the Max and Moritz theme enters and is combined with it, at first quite in accord with the pedantic atmosphere. Soon, however, the mischief crops out again as a cessation of the fugue seems to indicate that the schoolmaster has left the room, and, after a gleeful sub-climax, the boys' theme gradually dies away. Over a "softly waving" accompaniment, the schoolmaster-theme is treated reflectively and peacefully at some length. There is a sudden explosion, a consequent frantic rushing about of the fugue theme, and derisive snatches of the boys' theme. The variation ends with variegated orchestral groans.

Prank Five—The June Bugs

The sad adventure of Uncle Fritz with the June bugs next occupies the poet. Max and Moritz pretend to no large interest in the fascinations of entomology, yet they sally forth to certain leafy districts that they know in order to collect those fat and unwieldy insects. The expedition is undertaken with the ulterior object of bringing discomfort to Uncle Fritz, who is paying a visit to the boys' parents. Having carried home a large and judicious selection of the beetles, Max and Moritz deposit them in Uncle Fritz's bed, and when that relative is tucked between the sheets and has sought and found his slumbers, he is disturbed in the small hours by the enthusiasm of the beetles for exploration. The remainder of the night he spends in persuading the insects that it is the privilege of human beings to sleep when they go to bed. Finally the floor is covered with defunct and dying June bugs, and Uncle Fritz again retires to rest.

In the music an idiotically bland theme suggests the uncle; a theme full of interweaving rapid figures suggests the June bugs; there is a gleeful dance. The theme of uncle Fritz is resumed, and is developed with increasing drowsiness; low woodwind instruments commence softly crawling scales, and the violins make use of the bounding bow to secure a series of flutters and soft thuds. The theme of Uncle Fritz becomes agitated, the crawling and fluttering increase, and there is a petulant climax. Then Uncle Fritz subsides with several yawns.

The Final Pranks

It is Eastertime, and, as is customary at that period in Germany, there is considerable activity in the bakers' shops. Max and Moritz view the village baker with interest. They determine to enter his shop too, but as the purveyor of cakes has closed the door behind him they make their way into the premises by a favorite route—the chimney. Black as ravens, they fall into the flour bin, but they emerge from that receptacle snow-white. Some pretzels on a shelf attract their attention. They climb on a convenient chair in order to obtain the coveted delicacy, but the chair overturns, and the boys tumble into a vat of dough. The baker comes in, catches the dough-covered urchins, rolls them and puts them into the oven to bake. When they are well browned, the baker withdraws his human pretzels and sets them up against the wall. Max and Moritz, who have been preserved by their thick covering of dough, eat themselves out of their coats, and escape while the baker's back is turned.

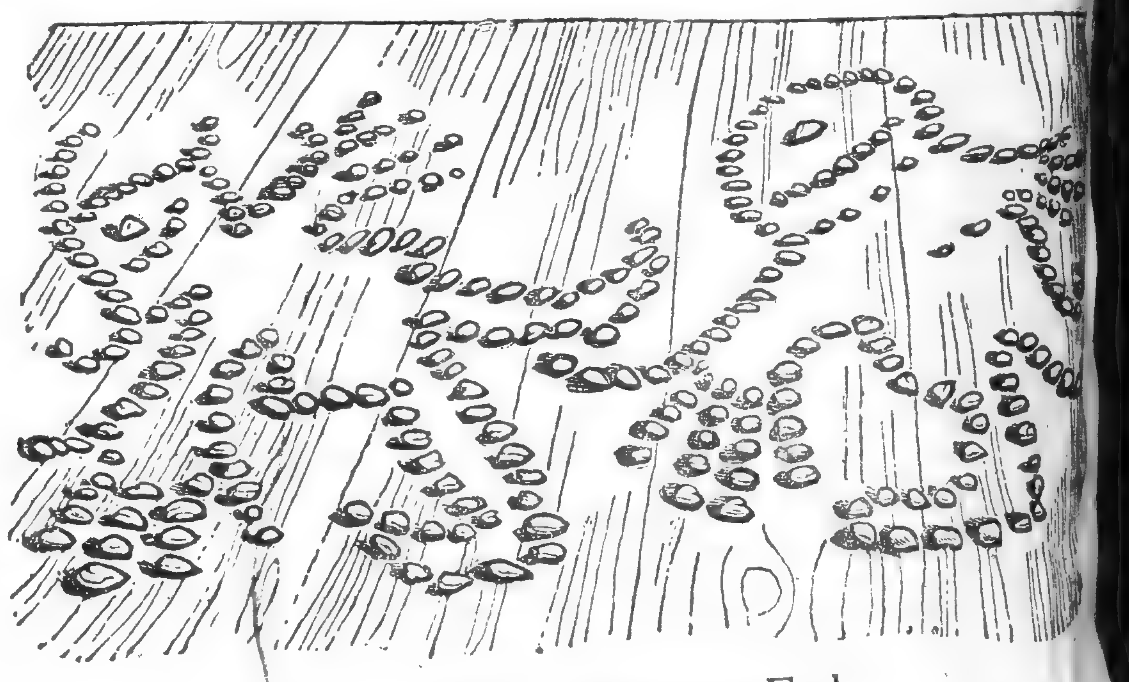
Then follows the last frolic and the sad end of Max and Moritz. They steal into farmer Mecke's barn, and, having provided themselves with a knife, cut slits in his sacks of corn. When the farmer shoulders one of the sacks in order to take it to the miller to have its contents ground, the burden grows unexpectedly light as he holds it. He perceives the hole in the sack with the corn running out, and perceives not less the crouching figures of the two boys who have tried to hide in a little mound of corn. Farmer Mecke pounces upon the lads, shovels them into a sack and marches off with them to the mill. There he has them shot into the hopper, and Max and Moritz emerge, no longer mischief-loving rascals, but ground-up particles of humanity and grain, which are gobbled by the miller's ducks.

Mraczek chooses to combine these two pranks in a single variation. It opens with the song of the bakers at work. This soon ceases, and Max and Moritz are again heard from. There is a downward slide, a splash and a scramble. The bakers' theme is now b for some time; then there is a suggest of conventional "fire music." A bassoon lugubriously croaks the first few notes of the Max and Moritz theme, and there is a pause. The theme of the boys is then heard in a dim and smothered manner; th suddenly brilliant conclusion, however, shows that they have eaten their way to freedom again. The English horn now solemnly intones the Max and Moritz theme, corresponding to the moral remarks which in the text precede the narration of the final adventure. There is development of the Max and Moritz theme; then there is the roaring of the water under the mill and the clatter of the machinery. The boys' theme is pitched violently downward by muted brass instruments, the clatter of the mill reaches a climax, and then silence.

Epilogue

A closing section of Wilhelm Busch's story describes the pathetic circumstance that the disappearance of the two boys evokes no sorrow in the village. The widow who lost her fowls declares that she expected as much. Mr. Böck, the tailor, reflects that wrong-doing should not be the aim of life. The schoolmaster takes advantage of the tragedy to point a moral. "Here we have an example," says he. Nor do the baker and Uncle Fritz and the farmer fail to add their expressions of regret—and relief.

Musically there is a reminiscence of the theme of the boys. The themes of Widow Bolte and Böck, the tailor, are heard together; they are discussing the sad end of the two scapegraces. The themes of the schoolmaster and Uncle Fritz are combined; they, too, must have their and, like the other two, they moralize sadly wag their heads. But the the village remember with envy the brilliant achievements of Max Moritz, and thus the piece ends à la "Till Eulenspiegel," with a restatement of the principal the



The Piteous End

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 15, 1913

FUNNY PRANKS BY SYMPHONY

First Performance of "Symphonic Burleske"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, performed for the first time in Boston the symphonic burleske of Joseph Mraczek, after the "Max and Moritz" sketches of Wilhelm Busch, which have long delighted German children, as they appeared in the pages of the "Fliegende Blatter" of Munich. The other items of the programme of the 18th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra were Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," in the orchestral version, and Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy."

Mraczek, whose music was heard in Boston for the first time, is a native of Brunn. He was born on the 12th of March, 1878. He began his studies with his father, a 'cellist of the orchestra of the Stadt Theatre, and he graduated at the Vienna Conservatory. He is the composer of two operas and of chamber music and smaller pieces for individual instruments. He now teaches in official positions in Brunn

Series of Pranks

The score of the Symphonic Burleske is dedicated, "with the utmost respect," to Dr. Richard Strauss. It may be said that the composer has gone farther than that, for every bar of his music bears testimony to his study and his reverence for Strauss' scores. The Burleske is a sort of rhapsody based on seven of the picture tales of Max and Moritz.

The prologue introduces a theme associated with the mischief-makers, and of this theme there is vigorous and humorous treatment. Prank I.: The boys attach crusts of bread to the end of pieces of thin strings, and the hens of the Widow Bolt swallow the crusts. The hens flop about in pain, until the string catches on a bough of a tree and they are hanged, dead.

Prank II.: The widow resolves to fry the dead hens, but the boys fish for them through an opening in the roof. There is a glissando of harp, celesta and pianoforte as the fowls ascend before the eyes of the astonished widow. The boys eat the chickens, to bacchanalian music in the orchestra; then they fall asleep and snore. Prank III.: The estimable tailor, Mr. Bock, is tormented by the boys, who shout nicknames at him until he steps upon a misleading plank and falls into the brook. And now Bock is a rheumatic. Prank IV.: They put powder in the pipe of the schoolmaster, which explodes. Prank V.: Max and Moritz collect June bugs in the woods and put them in their uncle's bed. Uncle Fritz emerges from retirement and kills the June bugs—as many as he can. Prank VI.: On Easter morning the boys fall into the baker's dough vat. The baker puts them with their dough covering into the oven. This covering saves them, and they eat their way out again. Prank VII.: Max and Moritz are put into a sack and ground up in the mill, to become food for ducks. Public rejoicing over their timely demise.

work of a master, in the poetical days of his youth.

Amusing, but Palls Quickly

Mrazcek's music is least interesting in those passages which are professedly and farcically humorous. The melody which is played during "Prank I.," while the hens cackle in the wind instruments, is of far more value and far more interest than the realistic depiction of the events of the anecdote. This melody takes the place of a second theme, and it is full of German folk-spirit and the charming naive character of German folk-melody. The folk-character of this composition is its finest quality. One often regrets that the composer felt obliged to write music which should illustrate with a club the events of a certain story, and one is curious to hear other works by Mrazcek. He has mastered the orchestral idioms of Strauss. His coloring is always rich and effective, and his melodic vein far from deficient. For such a composer there should be a future, but although there are truly humorous moments in this piece, such as the trudging of the tailor, the ghastly crawling voice of the June bugs, we find the humor often a little labored, and more often the fixed programme of the piece is a direct impediment to the free and spontaneous expression of the composer. And his orchestral box of tricks palls upon one quickly. For five minutes the thing is amusing. Then it commences to be stale and unprofitable. This piece was warmly applauded, and Dr. Muck recalled.

The performance of Liszt's waltz, with its amorous middle section, was all that could be desired. The performances of the burlesque of Mrazcek and of Charpentier's suite were equally sympathetic and brilliant.

Charpentier's Master Pen

The finest music on the programme was the joyous and beautiful music of Charpentier. Today and in days to come more than one composer may find himself able to write as Mrazcek has written in his burlesque, but among hundreds of composers there will arise few, indeed, who can open their heart to nature and sunshine as Charpentier has responded to the intoxication of Italy. Some composers portray nature and people through a highly colored lens furnished by their own nature. Charpentier has echoed marvellously the sun and the song of Italy herself.

With what skill and inspiration are the instruments employed, to weave a spell, to recreate atmosphere so wonderfully that for the moment one lives in a southern, sunny clime. There are

1913 is now busy a suggestion

A bassoon few notes of nd there is a boys is then d manner; its on, however, their way
lish horn now and Moritz moral remarks ne narration of te is develop-tz theme; then water under the machinery.
violently down-nstruments, the a climax, and

Vilhelm Busch's tic circumstance
f the two boys
e village. The declares that she Böck, the tailor, should not be hoolmaster takes to point a moral, ie," says he. Nor e Fritz and the expressions of reminiscence of the themes of Widow or, are heard tong the sad end of

The themes of the Fritz are also
t have their say,
hey moralize and
But the boys of th envious delight
nts of Max and piece ends, again with an energetic ipal theme.

MONITOR, MARCH 15, 1913

SYMPHONY CONCERT

With a "Symphonic Burlesque" by Mraczek as the leading number, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its eighteenth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon before an eager audience. The program was as follows: Mraczek, symphonic burlesque for grand orchestra after Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz," first time in Boston; Liszt, second episode from Lenau's "Faust," "Mephisto Waltz"; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy," orchestral suite.

The concert disclosed the talent of the conductor for interpreting that class of orchestral writing which goes by the name of program music. In every one of the three selections presented there was an attempt to narrate or to describe, or to do both. The chief trait of the first number relating to the two comical fellows, Max and Moritz, was incident. The chief trait of the Charpentier piece on Italy was scenery. In the "Mephisto" episode of Liszt, incident and scene were about equally combined.

Dr. Muck long ago proved himself a brilliant reader of the evanescent, impalpable type of expression we call program music. More than anybody else he has been able to persuade the community that the orchestra can narrate an event and describe a scene. His achievement with the Strauss "Domestic Symphony" during his first engagement in Boston was so memorable that enthusiastic believers in program formulas will hardly dare wish a revival of the work at his hands, apprehending that the picture of the composer's family and its day at home may have reverted with the lapse of time to mere instrumental sound and melodic geometry.

Dr. Muck in the first year of his second engagement in Boston has shown himself a captivating reader of the works of the orchestral humorists. Whoever the humorist is, whether Beethoven in his restrained expression of fun in the fifth symphony, Tschaikowsky in his delicate satire in the third movement of the "Pathetic" symphony, the rollicking Strauss in "Till," or the grotesque Dukas in the "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dr. Muck finds the composer's point and gets into the composer's own vein every time.

The symphonic burlesque of the new composer, Mraczek, was a success from the moment it was announced as the leading number of the eighteenth pair of symphony concerts. The work is an out and out example of farce, and perhaps the best ever written. It certainly goes farther with its fun than any orchestral composition in the grand style has gone to date. The man who can bring frying pans and ducks into a symphony concert and keep the situation dignified is one of a generation. Of course Richard Strauss would permit such a master comedian to couple his name with his own on the playbill. The composer of "Till" is honored by having "Max and Moritz" dedicated to him.

The editor of the program book provided an excellent guide to the seven pranks of the boys who are the heroes of the drama. The fact that he could do this in paragraphs exactly proportioned to the time employed in the performance of the divisions is one of the most convincing proofs that the composer applied his narrative formulas with success.

How Mraczek on the program side of his enterprise made his point, can best be studied by those who actually hear the music played. His method of carrying out his ideas can be hinted at in a review.

The episodes of "Max and Moritz" are a sort of extension of the variation form of musical composition which Beethoven perfected along serious lines in many of his slow movements. In recent times the form has been used in the independent scherzo and in program forms which undertake to develop character or narrate incidents. Reger in his "Hiller" variations uses the form for binding a little book of orchestral essays into unity. Strauss has used an extension of the form to detail the chapters of a long romance in his "Don Quixote."

The new piece is probably more difficult of performance than it seemed, else the conductor would not have made it take up the usual place on the program of an entire symphony. The audience was enthusiastic over the music, and showed its appreciation by applauding at the close until Dr. Muck called on the men of the orchestra to stand.

The suite of Charpentier was next in interest to the burlesque of Mraczek, and it proved a most successful revival. Those who on former occasions have found Karl Muck an inexplicable program-maker certainly could have nothing to say against the choice of pieces for this concert.

The Charpentier work has mellowed wonderfully in its rest of 10 years on the library shelf. A more entrancing work of meditative description is not to be found in the orchestral repertory. A rare thing is it for a piece of music to make such an appeal to the rehearsal audience as the serenade with which the "Impressions of Italy" opens made on Friday. Emotion seldom gets away with the matinee listeners to such an extent that at the end of a number it surges over the hall in a murmur of approval.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 15, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME OF REALISTIC MUSIC

Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" Revived After Ten Years of Undeserved Neglect — Their Unusual Interest and Quality—Max and Moritz in Tonal Burlesque—Wherein the Composer Has Not Quite Brought Off His Feat—Old-Fashioned Romantic Realism with Liszt

CHARPENTIER, ending the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon with his twenty-year-old "Impressions of Italy," seemed more impressive and interesting than Mraczek who began it with his new and heralded symphonic burletta, "Max and Moritz." Yet the Frenchman's music must have sounded almost as novel to the applauding audience, since for ten years it has not been played at the Symphony Concerts. It has been overlooked far too long and more than once this season Dr. Muck has done deserving music good service and given fresh pleasure to his hearers by similar rediscoveries on the crowded shelves of the orchestra's library. Charpentier set down these Italian impressions at the end of the eighties when he was dwelling in Rome, and they made their way quickly into concert-rooms. In the years next succeeding he was busy with "Louise." His music-drama was produced in 1900; made him known in many quarters where he was ignored or obscured; and established his reputation and what the observant world now construes as his cast of thought and style of expression, since he has written little since to alter either. Spontaneously most of us refer all that Charpentier has written to the methods and the standards of "Louise." As it happens, the "Impressions of Italy" curiously accord with them. Charpentier was nearly thirty years old when he wrote the music. Naturally, he was beginning to have a clear and fairly stable individuality.

In the first place, the Italy of Charpentier is not the Italy of haloing poetry and romance or the Italy of the Cæsars or the Italy of the empurpled despots of the Renaissance. It is the Italy in which he dwelt and upon which he looked in the last years of the eighties. It fed and stimulated his imagination but that imagination had already its realistic quality and trend. The serenade of the first "impression" for example, is an unidealized Italian song such as he might have heard at midnight down some shadowy by-street on any evening in those years in Rome. It is ordinary Italian song, with its biting accent and its mounting sensuousness. Charpentier has glorified it little in the harmonic and the instrumental dress in which he has clothed it. His treatment of it is realistic and such poetic suggestion as there is in the ordinary sense of the words flows from the gradual dying of the serenade as the listener or the serenader goes his way. Yet that too is plausibly realistic. In the second "impression" Charpentier would have his music suggest in its insistent rhythm and in its quiet march, a train of girls, with their jugs upon their shoulders, seeking the waters of a stream that furnishes the village. And on the hillsides the shepherds are piping. In the third impression, the carts are returning up the hill-roads to the village. The mules keep their steady trot; the muleteers sing to themselves or else to the girls kneeling in the carts who answer them.

Now both these are impressions of the actual every-day Italy that Charpentier had seen and known. He makes them into tone-pictures by the virtues of his musical imagination but in this translation, they still keep their truth. Next he turns to the moods of landscape, not to landscape dotted with Roman ruins or crowned with some mediæval stronghold; but to the great hills outspread above Sorrento or Amalfi, where the wayfarer may lie in solitude between sky and sea and yet hear all the sounds of the nature around him and the human life below him mingling within his ears. Here again is realistic sensation of actual place and hour translated into music of mood. Finally stands the "impression" of Naples in which Charpentier would have tones yield to the hearer as much as they may of the din, tumultuous or rhythmed, with which the streets used to echo, of the ardent changeful life of the vivacious, noisy, passionate folk; of the glow and the glamor, the churning bustle, the intermittent languor that make Naples like a heady wine to the imagination. He would nd, he did find, sounds into which he could and concentrate these swarming im- For Naples yiel one, bu

It is easy to call the Suite the prose, the realistic prose of music, but it is no little achievement to write such well-ordered, eloquent and vivid musical prose. It is a still finer achievement to translate into music, be it prose or poetry, the actualities of the Italy of these days of ours, to turn resolutely from the easy Italy of conventional imagination, poetry and romance, and to try courageously to make music mirror and express the things of life as it is lived here and now, as well as the things of dream and vision, passion and reflection. For that life has its emotions and its sensations that music may bear and intensify. So has Charpentier wrought in this Suite even as he wrought in "Louise"; while in another respect the two musics are akin. With all his realistic temperament and achievement, Charpentier is the born rhetorician in tones. His passion for rhetoric in music is the other side of the exuberant temperament that makes him so ardent for truth and actuality, but not careful in the choice and the invention of the means by which he would express them. There are passages in "Louise" that the detractors of the music-drama call bombastic and that those who admire it are content to find rhetorical and of the big commonplace of opera.

Similar passages recur in the "Impressions of Italy." The tone-picturing of the landscape in the long rise and fall of the strings and in the songful upswellings of the melodies is big musical rhetoric and not much else. There are "effects" a-plenty in the music of Naples with all its vividness, vivacity and sustained power of sharp imagination. Charpentier does not hesitate over the obvious contrast of the shepherd's bright and running piping against the slow march of the girls. He lets clear French melody written for the sake of the mood tell against clear Italian melody written in the faith of actuality. These are the devices of the rhetorician in music; but they do not much lessen the vividness of the tone-picturing, the truth of mood and vision, the sensation of an actual Italy glamored by an imagination living in the present that make these Italian impressions remarkable in their kind and almost a strange thing in descriptive music. And they tickle the merely sensuous ear as well. O! cunning Charpentier, alive with Gallic prudence as well as Gallic exuberance more.

Possibly Mraczek is overmuch the realist in the music in while he would suggest the pranks of Max and Moritz, and make us who listen merry over them and over the composer, too. His symphonic burletta is not in the least spontaneous in impression. Plainly he has "toiled terribly" over it, and knows not the means to hide his labors. How patiently and arduously he must have experimented and imaginted with timbres before he found just the instrumental suggestion that he believed would impart this or that episode in the urchins' tricks. How diligently he must have exercised his composing thews and sinews in the swinging of the huge orchestra that he employs, with all sorts of accessory instruments besides. Even so, he is not always artful in his handling of it en masse, in its separate choirs or its individual voices. He raises needless difficulties even for the virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra, laboring no less than he, w some of his delineation, in spite of all his pains, does not quite "come off" or passes ear and imagination so swiftly that it leaves no clear impression behind. His representative motives seem to have cost him no less striving. Sometimes it has been fruitful, as in that which represents the milk-and-water amiability of the complacent and the stupid Uncle Fritz. Sometimes is leans a little on other music, as in the reiterated and much-transmuted motive of Max and Moritz themselves. Sometimes he has gone far afield to find the musical suggestion for the verse, as in the Easter choral that heralds the incident of the baker's oven. For are not bakers busy with many cakes at Easter time in Germany? "With the utmost respect" Mraczek dedicates his burletta to Strauss. With the utmost respect he uses also the Straussian method of the interweaving, the contrast and the mere juxtaposition of motives for delineative ends. He uses it often by main force, as Strauss himself has been known to do. Now and then these polyphonies are vivid and amusing, as when the victims of Max and Moritz prattle over the fate of the boys and the general relief. Once and again they are no more than arbitrary relationships, not easy to grasp from the delineative side.

By these tokens Mraczek labored long and reflectively over his burletta. So working, he became, as it were, immersed in it. Every stroke of his tonal delineation was clear before his ears and imagination. He knew exactly what it was intended to suggest or summon; he answered to the humor that he had sought to put in it. The whole was clear as the day to him who had toiled and reflected so long. So doing and perhaps so reasoning, he forgot his audiences who must hear the whole burletta in twenty-five minutes, who must receive each impression and answer to it on the instant, and who do not as a rule come to concerts prepared by assiduous study of new scores. "Max and Moritz" is more amusing to read on the engraved page than it is to hear in actual performance. The delineation comes off better there and more humor runs through it. Now any music—even the music of burletta—ought to sound better than it reads. Mraczek's does not, because it moves far too quickly to enable the listening ear and fancy to fasten upon it, because its strokes are too quick, sharp and pelting. Mraczek has written all unconsciously for an audience of Mraczeks as intimate with the music as he himself. Or he has written it at least for an audience that knows the whole course of the pranks of Max and Moritz and the verse and the picture that embody them as well as do Germans reared upon the rhymes and the drawings of Busch.

The average audience, especially in concert-halls outside of Germany is in no such happy case. When the flying music pauses long enough to develop itself or when it is written so graphically that in its flight it touches ear and fancy immediately and sharply, then it is often vividly and drolly delineative, with invention, orchestral imagination and humor in merry sport through it. The motive of Max and Moritz and many of its transformations are characteristic and diverting. So are the motives of some of their victims. The music of the widow, who lost and mourned her fowls, is of the very spirit of tonal burlesque in the exaggerations with which it is developed. The tonal course of some of the pranks is clear and telling enough to provoke the smile of amusement and give the pleasure of effective ingenuity. The rest comes and goes too fleetly and too confusedly in comparison with the transparent clearness of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" or the etched tonal outline and detail of "Till Eulenspiegel." Time and again, as so many of the youngsters do, Miraczeh has written for himself and for readers rather than for actual hearers. Brevity, since music is slow-paced, is the weakness of much of his wit.

Realism has evidently "unified" Dr. Muck's programme; but the middle piece —Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was realism of another sort, the romantic realism that would give tonal form and substance to macabre imaginings, seeking to make them as actual to the listener as they were to the composer shaping and coloring them. Mephistopheles is the fiddler in this dance of the tavern. He fiddles uncannily; the waltz has hollow intervals; its rhythm becomes a morbid rhythm; the tang of the music grows sensuous, sensual, animal. Away go Faust and the peasant girl toward the forest and the fiddling Mephistopheles sets the waltz jangling in his breathless, guffawing elation. It is all very sharply imagined in the old romantic manner and as graphically translated into tones. Our fathers believed and said the piece was "diabolical" music and hinted that their reluctant flesh crept as it heard. We of another day take these romantic excursions into sinister, bizarre and macabre music much more complacently. To us they are only one little facet of the romanticism of a century past. Our minds applaud the ingenuity of the "Mephisto Waltz"; our imaginations answer comprehendingly to it; but the music is as empty to us of emotional impression as are its own hollow fifths. It belongs with the jack-o'-lanterns of Hallow'een. H. T. P.

JOURNAL—

MARCH 15, 1913.

COMIC SUPPLEMENT IS SET TO MUSIC

Burlesque Takes First Place on Program of Symphony.

IS GREATLY ENJOYED

Cackle of Hens and Flopedy-Flop of Beetles Tickles Orchestra and Audience.

By E. F. Harkins

A symphonic setting of "Peck's Bad Boy," or the Yellow Kid, by C. M. Loeffler or Gustav Strube, may be expected next. For first place on this week's Symphony program is taken by a symphonic burlesque inspired by two young scamps who formerly figured among the heroes of Germany's famous comic periodical, the Fliegende Blaetter, with the result that the audience is treated to realistic tone pictures of the Widow Bolte's hens hanging themselves with the boys' assistance, of the rheumatic Tailor Boeck being ironed out by his faithful frau after his involuntary dip in the brook, of Schoolmaster Laempel smoking the pipe the boys have filled with gunpowder, of Uncle Fritz's midnight bout with the beetles the rascals put in his bed, and finally of the mill grinding the village imps up into food for ducks.

Pranks Enjoyed

At a time when the nonsense of the comic supplement is being roundly berated, it is interesting to note that the Symphony audience yesterday enjoyed these musical pranks openly, heartily, calling Dr. Muck back to the platform several times to tell him with handclaps how much the burlesque was enjoyed and insisting on having the orchestra rise.

It's a wonder the orchestra played as well as it did, for the members simply couldn't help being tickled themselves with the cackle of the hens, the glissando of harp, celesta and piano representing the boys yanking the birds up the chimney after the poor widow had roasted them to console herself for their execution. the blowing up of Hans Brietmann's pipe and—most comical of all—the gentle flop, flop of the beetles as they made for Uncle Fritz's nose.

This tonal skit is by Joseph Gustav Mraczek—if you sneeze you will pronounce it properly—and judging by the melodiousness of the themes and the ingenious, vivid way in which the pranks are pictured, the undeniably gifted composer could easily supply that much sought sequel to "Haensel and Gretel." Perhaps he will do it yet in the shape of a musical setting of "Alice in Wonderland" or "Buster Brown's Sunday at Home."

Delightful Performance

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" showed Dr. Muck's firm hand and clear head and the orchestra's dazzling technical power. The concert ended with a thoroughly delightful performance of Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy," a work that reveals the young French composer at his best, although it preceded the opera "Louise" by nearly ten years. The orchestra last played the suite in 1903, so that to many who hear it this week it must be as new as the Mraczek burlesque.

Mr. Ferir played the viola solo in the first movement of the suite beautifully. Alfredo de Voto was the assisting pianist in the first number.

The orchestra will be en tour next week. At the concerts the week after next Norman Wilks will be the soloist and the orchestra will perform for the first time George W. Chadwick's symphonic fantasia, "Aphrodite," which was inspired by a bust presented to the Boston Art Museum by Francis Bartlett.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 15, 1913.

MRACZEK WORK AT SYMPHONY

Humorous Piece "Max und Moritz," Given Its First Performance in Boston.

PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" in Striking Contrast; No Concert Next Week.

The 18th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Mraczek, Symphonic Burlesque for Grand Orchestra (after Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz"). (In one movement.)
Liszt, Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust": The Dance in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for putting on the program so delightful a work as Mraczek's Symphonic Burlesque, which was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon. It is brilliant and of a refreshing vitality, full of surprises and happily contrasted themes of marked individuality. A remarkably clever piece of descriptive writing of the ultra-modern school, the composer has revealed inventiveness and consummate skill in orchestration, while he has combined the use of certain instruments to gain realistic effects with ingenious dexterity. Written in a wildly fantastical vein and jocund mood, the work depicts certain adventures of Max and Moritz, the mischievous urchins made famous by Wilhelm Busch. There are themes for the boys, for their victims and for every episode of their existence as told in music. Strongly rhythmed and full of rich coloring, the piece sparkles with merriment. Mraczek now laughs with the boys at their pranks, now mocks them. The humor is in turn flippant, satirical, caustic. But even without its purpose of illustrating a definite story, the piece would remain unique, the admirable expression of a momentary flash of genius on the part of the composer. The performance by the orchestra rivalled the work in brilliance, and never have the keen musical insight and finished art of Dr. Muck been more conspicuously in evidence. There was much applause on the part of the large audience and the conductor was repeatedly recalled.

In striking contrast of mood was Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," with its wealth of local color, its melodies ladened with indolent sensuality, its rhythms now languorous, now compelling. Liszt's episode from Lenau's "Faust" was an agreeable intermezzo.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week as the orchestra will be away. On Friday afternoon, March 28, and Saturday evening, March 29, Norman Wilks, the English pianist, will be the soloist and the program will include Chadwick's symphonic Fantasia, "Aphrodite"; Schubert's symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished"; Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra in A-minor, and Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 15, 1913.

"MAX AND MORITZ" IN SYMPHONIC HUMOR

Mraczek Novelty Played in Brilliant Fashion.

"Program" Music Pushed to Limits Inviting Debate.

The 18th Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Mraczek ....
....Symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz"
Liszt.................................Mephisto waltz
Charpentier ...."Impressions of Italy"

No music of Joseph Gustav Mraczek had previously been heard in Boston. This composer, born 35 years ago at Brueun, is now teacher of violin and second concert master of the orchestra in that city. He has written music in the smaller forms, as well as operas. The last of these, "Der Traum," was produced a year ago at the Berlin Royal Opera.

This symphonic burlesque was inspired by the humorous drawings for children by Wilhelm Busch, in which are exploited the wit and daring of Max and Moritz, two youths tireless in the pursuit of amusement. Mraczek has chosen seven of these episodes, or "pranks," and has written music intended to be indicative of them.

Here are serious matters to be pondered. Those who merely tolerated Strauss' employment of a symphony orchestra for the phonographic reproduction of baa-ing sheep and whirling windmills will style this undertaking a monstrous perversion of its dignity. Members of the society for the suppression of comic supplements as means for putting mischief into the heads of small boys will make a wry face. They should remember that virtue triumphs and the malefactors are ground into cornmeal. Nor is that all.

Mraczek's "symphonic burleske" stirs up anew the eternal question of how far literal delineation of ideas may be carried in "program" music; to what degree, for example, a composer may portray through tone the clear intelligence that a company of June bugs is promenading by night up and down the bed and person of an elderly and peaceable gentleman so that at length he rises and exterminates them; or, that two unruly urchins tumble into a baker's flour bin, are baked into pretzels and eat their way out.

When these trifles are accomplished, let music, heavenly maid, yet tarry, again disguise herself as pantomime, bring shame to the cheek of the plastic arts, and confide to a waiting world that the industrious and beloved tailor of the village has fallen into a stream through a bridge of boards diabolically arranged for that purpose, and has been ironed dry by his good wife to counteract the rheumatic effects of the bath.

Just how much of the true inwardness of all this the audience of yesterday afternoon would have perceived without the aid of the program book is wholly uncertain. There was close attention given the new piece; there were smiles to be seen, if little or no outright laughter to be heard, and there was warm applause after the number. It therefore gave pleasure. More than this it contained unmistakable tokens of bubbling youth, lusty, incorrigible Teutonic youth to be sure, but unvarnished youth nevertheless, which is more than Mr Aubert has succeeded in doing in his music of childhood recently heard.

The opening theme, dedicated to the young scamps, is typically, graphically impish and mischievous. It suggests little compunction of conscience, and little regard for man or beast. The piccolo aids to this end. The piano has been used skilfully, and the honeyed celesta disarms resentment by adding the guise of sweet innocence.

The fugal theme of the schoolmaster who plays the organ at the village church, ignorant of the impending explosion of his pipe, is characteristically serious and pompous, but what shall be said of the theme of the Widow Bolte? One might have expected a frowsy, matronly, prosaic person who kept pet chickens in a barnyard, and fried them when, alas, they were no more. But behold, the erotic splendor of this sumptuous woman, as the cellos sing of her an impassioned and rapturous song, haunting, sombre and strangely disturbing. One would fain know more of her than the meagre fact that she tended her dog Spitz and her fowls, three hens and a rooster.

Mraczek's talent is worthy of a serious subject and of serious consideration. He has creative invention. He is not above writing melody; he develops his musical ideas with skill and often with spontaneity; he derives much vitality from his use of rhythms, and he shows no little imagination in mixing color. He pays his respects both to Wagner and to Strauss—particularly Till Eulenspiegel—but he has an individuality of his own.

With no thought of a series of comic pictures, his music would have commanded admiration for the beauty of certain pages and for the exalted dramatic intensity of others. Notwithstanding its name, the humorously descriptive parts of this music lack the gross perversion commonly associated with the burlesque.

The performance was a brilliant one and rewarded Dr Muck and his players for their great care in preparation. It might be questioned, whether, in a work of this character, there should not be required of the instrumentalist the same mobility of facial expression as, for example, of the singer of lieder. The strings with one accord sat impassive of countenance. The wood winds were less remiss. Mr Longy and Mr Lenom tipping off the careful observer as to the esoteric points. Mr Grisez played the widow Bolte's lament with profound compassion.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 17, 1913

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE PLANS OF DR. MUCK AND THE OPERA

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, but Not Sibelius's New Piece, to Be Played Next Month at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Marcoux, Miss Hempel and Miss Bori Re-engaged for Next Season at the Opera —Mr. Urban to Continue as Stage Director and Scene-Painter — Another Recital by Mr. Ysaye — Mr. Urack at "The Pops"—The Cast for "Tristan"— Items and Opinions

At last, for the first time in seven years, a symphony by Mahler will be played at the Symphony Concerts. From the beginning of the season Dr. Muck has contemplated performance of one or another of Mahler's symphonies that required neither chorus nor solo voices. Finally, he chose the fifth, the only one of them that has been heard here—in the last year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. As soon, however, as he scrutinized the score and the parts in the library of the orchestra, he discovered that they required many corrections since Mr. Gericke had "edited" the symphony somewhat freely. The correcting process required time and Dr. Muck has been uncertain whether the restored parts could be made ready this season. Fortunately the work is nearly done and at a pair of concerts in April, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play the symphony. If it goes well, other symphonies by Mahler are likely to follow in succeeding seasons.

It is high time that Mahler had his just place on the programmes of the Symphony Orchestra, since he is the one eminent and established composer of our time whom they have persistently and without reason ignored. Mr. Gericke discovered Mahler's music in the final months of his service here, but seven years ago it was less known than it is now and it was just beginning to establish itself in the repertories of symphony concerts. Not once did Dr. Muck turn to Mahler during his first term in Boston. Mr. Fiedler in his schedules for two seasons announced a symphony by Mahler. Possibly he really intended to bring one to performance, but his choice was the second, which may be Mahler's masterpiece, but which also requires a huge chorus difficult to gather and rehearse. So again for four years Mahler's music went unheard in concerts noted the world over for the catholicity of their repertory and for their open doors to contemporary composers. Meanwhile, on all sides Mahler's symphonies have been oftener and oftener heard, whether the hearer listened with an impressed or an unimpressed ear; they abundantly deserved performance; and there is no questioning now Mahler's high place among the composers of our time. The neglect of his music has been a persistent, strange and unexplained reproach to the Symphony Orchestra. Now, at last Dr. Muck is to remove it.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date .... MAR 16 1913

The Boston Symphony.

The last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, will be devoted to modern music. At the Thursday evening concert there will be a soloist, Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, who will play the Brahms Concerto.

Est 1884

A feature of the programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. The tone poem was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring." Loeffler—"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. Brahms—Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major. Dvorak—Overture, "Carnaval."

There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The feature of this concert will be the first performance in New York of the Symphonic Burleske by Mrazek entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is a teacher. His Symphonic Burleske "Max and Moritz" is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. The full programme of the Saturday concert is:

Sinding—Symphony in D minor. Mrazek—Tone poem, "Max and Moritz." Liszt—Episode from Lenau's "Faust," scene in the village tavern (Mephisto waltz). Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe.

NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date .... MAR 15 1913

Establ 84

The final New York concerts for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, at Carnegie Hall. The programme of the first concert offers Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra, piano, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, as its chief number. On it also are Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Brahms's violin concerto, and Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra.

At the second concert there will be no soloist. Its feature will be the first performance in New York of a "Symphonic Burlesque," by Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." The other pieces announced are Sinding's symphony in D minor, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier."

In response to many requests that Mme Julia Culp sing the "Frauenliebe und Leben" and the "Liederkreis" of Schumann, the distinguished Lieder-singer will give two recitals at the Little Theatre, Wednesday afternoon, March 26, and Friday evening, March 28. Besides the Schumann songs, Mme Culp will sing songs by Schubert, Brahms, and Wolf.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

ROMEIKE NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date .... [illegible]

Es 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, respectively, will be devoted entirely to modern music. At the Thursday evening concert there will be a soloist, Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play the Brahms Concerto.

The feature of the programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati.

The tone poem was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as "Pharmaceutria." It consists of two love songs, that of Damon and that of Alphesibœus. The latter tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who, by the aid of magical spells, endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring"........Goldmark
"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), Op. 14. Loeffler
For orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets; obbligati
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major..........................Brahms
Overture, "Carnaval"................Dvorak

There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The feature of this concert will be the first performance in New York of the symphonic burlesque by Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz."

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettle drums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. The full programme of the concert is as follows:

Symphony in D minor.................Sinding
Tone poem, "Max and Moritz"......Mrazek
Episode from Lenau's "Faust," Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz) ....Liszt
"L'Apprenti Sorcier": Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)...................Dukas

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date MAR 16 1913

"Farewells" on Concert Stage

FAREWELL concerts being the style now. it falls to the lot of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to start the custom for symphony organizations, for their concerts this week at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, will conclude their New York season. For both concerts Dr. Muck has selected programmes devoted exclusively to modern music. A feature Thursday evening will be Mr. Charles Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." Besides this the orchestra will play Dvorak's overture "Carnaval" and Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, and Mr. Witek, concert master, will play the Brahms violin concerto in D major.

The Saturday programme includes Mrazek's tone poem founded on the adventures of "Max und Moritz," as well as Liszt's Mephisto Waltz, Sindig's D minor symphony and Dukas' scherzo "L'Apparenti Sorcier."

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date MAR 16 1913

The last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will be devoted entirely to modern music. At the Thursday evening concert Witek, concert master of the orchestra, will play the Brahms Concerto.

The feature of the programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. Loeffler wrote this work originally in 1901 for piano, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. Afterward it was arranged for two pianos and three trumpets, and in 1905-06 the composer put it into its present shape, in which it had its first performances in Boston on November 22 and 23, 1907. under Dr. Muck. Later in the same season it was played in New York.

The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring"	Goldmark
"A Pagan Poem," after Virgil, opus 14, for orchestra, pianoforte. English horn and three trumpets obbligati	Loeffler
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major,	Brahms
Overture, "Carneval"	Dvorak

There will be no soloist on Saturday afternoon. The feature of this concert will be the first performance in New York of a "symphonic burlesque" by Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Little is known of the composer, except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet." His symphonic burlesque "Max and Moritz" is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters entitled "pranks" and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

"Max and Moritz" may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. The full programme of the concert is as follows:

Symphony in D Minor	Sinding
Tone poem, "Max and Moritz"	Mrazek
Episode from Lenau's "Faust," Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz)	Liszt
"L'Apprenti Sorcier": Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)	Dukas

Ferdinand Sinzig will give a piano recital in Rumford Hall this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date MAR 16 1913

The last concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Otto Urack, a distinguished 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who will be heard in Brooklyn for the first time as a 'cellist. Mr. Urack as a 'cellist, as a composer and as a conductor is considered one of the leading musicians, and his engagement by the Boston Symphony was in line with its policy in bringing to this country only musicians of great talent. He will play d'Albert's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in C Major."

The principal orchestral number will be Edward MacDowell's orchestral suite in E Minor, called "Indian Suite." Of all his works for orchestra there is no question that this composition is his finest achievement. Dr. Muck is a great admirer of the work as a whole. and he regards the "Dirge' as one of the finest things in the literature of music. With him conducting the playing of this MacDowell suite his work is a labor of love.

The other numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture" Duka's brilliant scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, "Indian," Op. 48	MacDowell
A "Faust" Overture	Wagner
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C Major, Op. 20	D'Albert
"L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)	Dukas

Carl Fique, director of the United Singing Societies of Brooklyn, will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That is set for Friday evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, and the lecture recital for Thursday afternoon, in the lecture hall of the Academy. It will close the series of lecture recitals which, like the concerts, are presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, will be devoted entirely to modern music. At the Thursday evening concert there will be a soloist, Mr. Witek, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the Brahms concerto. The feature of the programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. Loeffler, who is one of the most interesting figures in the musical life of this country, wrote this work originally in 1901 for performances of chamber music for pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring"	Goldmark
"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), opus 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati.	Loeffler
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major	Brahms
Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak

There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The feature of this concert will be the first performance in New York of the symphonic burleske by Mrazek entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is a teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet." His symphonic burleske "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections. This work may also be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castanets, harp celesta, piano and strings. The full programme of the concert is as follows:

Symphony in D minor	Sinding
Tone poem "Max and Moritz"	Mrazek
Episode from Lenau's "Faust," Scene in the village tavern (Mephisto waltz)	Lizst
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" scherzo (after ballad by Goethe)	Dukas

M 16

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date MAR 16 1913

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, next, at 8:15. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished 'cellist and assistant conductor of the Orchestra, who will be heard in this capacity in Brooklyn for the first time. Mr. Urack as a 'cellist, as a composer, and as a conductor, is one of the greatest musicians among the younger men of to-day, and his engagement by the Boston symphony was in line with its policy to bring to this country only those of great talents. He will play d'Albert's concerto for violincello and orchestra in C major. The principal orchestral number on the programme will be Edward MacDowell's orchestral suite in E minor called "Indian." Although years have elapsed since the mind of this composer became clouded, and although the number of native composers has grown mightily, none has yet come to take MacDowell's place. He seems to have been, by general consent, the only American composer who has written music of permanent value. Of all his works for orchestra there is no question that this "Indian" suite is his finest achievement. Dr. Muck is a great admirer of the suite as a whole, and he regards the "Dirge" as one of the finest things in the literature of music. With him the playing of this MacDowell suite is always a labor of love. The other numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Dukas's brilliant scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

OTTO URACK,
'Cello Soloist.

Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, "Iindian," op. 48	MacDowell
A Faust Overture	Wagner
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in C major, op. 20.	d'Albert
L'Apprenti Sorcier, scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)	Dukas

Carl Fique, director of the United Singing Societies of Brooklyn, will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic cocert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That is set for Friday evening next, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, and the lecture recital for Thursday afternoon, in the lecture hall of the Academy. It will close the series of lecture recitals, which, like the concerts, are presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date MAR 16 1913

The last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, will be devoted entirely to modern music. At the Thursday evening concert there will be a soloist, Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, who will play the Brahms concerto.

The feature of the programme will be Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati.

The tone poem was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as "Pharmaceutria." It consists of two love songs, that of Damon and that of Alphesiboeus. The latter tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who by the aid of magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati, Loeffler; concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Brahms; overture, "Carneval," Dvorak.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date MAR 16 1913

E

1884

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Kommenden Donnerstag Abend, reſp. Samstag Nachmittag finden in Carnegie Hall die diesjährigen Schlußkonzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie = Orcheſters unter Leitung von Dr. Muck ſtatt. Das Donnerstag-Programm umfaßt Goldmark's Ouverture „Im Frühling", Chas. Martin Loeffler's „A Pagan poem" nach Virgil, Po. 14 für Orcheſter, Piano, engl. Horn und drei Trompeten. Brahms' Violinkonzert von Herrn Anton Witek, dem Konzertmeiſter des Orcheſters mit Orcheſterbegleitung geſpielt, und Dvorak's

---

Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date [illegible]

Establis

COMING CONCERTS

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, a Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created a deep impression. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs. Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." It is a symphonic leske by Joseph Gustax Mrazek, e "Max and Moritz." The composer violinist who lives in Bruenn whe is teacher in the Bruenn Musik and the newer Conservatory of His published compositions compri opera, "Der Traum," first produc the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the part of 1912; several pieces of cha music and incidental music to the "Kismet." His Symphonic Bur "Max and Moritz," to be heard he founded on Wilhelm Busch's hum collection of sketches of the same n written and drawn for the edificati the children of Germany. The pro follows:

Mrazek, Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Mo
Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert, Songs with orchestra—
  "Raste Krieger."
  "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
Liszt, Episode from "Lenou's "Faust" Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra—
  Wagner—
    "Traume."
  Beethoven—
    "Freud voll und Leidvoll."
    "Die Trommel geruhret."

From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Es

1884

Last Boston Symphony Concert

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created a notable impression upon the musical public during the past season.

Miss Culp is the possessor of a beautiful voice, which she uses with skill, and as a poetic interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

Doctor Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a symphonic burleske by Josef Gustav Marzek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912, several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

The work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

JULIA CULP ≡ MEZZO-SOPRANO.

SOLOISTS IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, will be heard at tomorrow evening's Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music. Ernest Schelling, the eminent Philadelphia

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR

Estab

884

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created a profound impression upon the musical public during the season. Miss Culp is the possessor of a beautiful voice, which she uses with skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traeume" and two Beethoven songs.

JULIA CULP.

Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a Symphonic Burleske by Josef Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play, "Kismet." His Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

The work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettle drums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. The full program of the concert is as follows:

Mrazek, Symphonic Burleska, "Max and Moritz."
Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert—Songs with orchestra.
  "Raste Krieger."
  "Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
Liszt, Episode from Lenau's "Faust," Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra.
  Wagner, "Traeume."

From EVENING TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 15 1913

Established:

Soloists With Orchestras

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Last Boston Symphony Concert—Its New Singer and Novel Number—Ernest Schelling, Native Philadelphian and Musical Cosmopolite, With Local Orchestra.

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created such an impression upon the musical public during the past season. She will sing a group of Schubert songs with orchestra, including "Ave Maria," Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs. Dr. Muck has placed on this program the Symphonic Burleske by Joseph Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play, "Kismet." His Symphonic Burleske is founded on Wilhelm Busch's skits, written and drawn for German children. The book's prologue, six chapters—entitled "pranks"—and epilogue have corresponding musical sections. This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. Its enlarged orchestra comprises piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. Other program numbers follow: Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring;" Liszt, episode from Lenau's "Faust" scene in the village tavern (Mephisto waltz), and Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier: Scherzo." The Burleske plays twenty-five minutes without stop. The audience should be seated promptly before 8.15 to avoid a long wait before being admitted.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR

Estal

Julia Culp—Soloist With Boston Symphony

Dorothea Thullen, the Philadelphia soprano, appeared with success as soloist at the last of the series of popular concerts of the Orchestra on Wednesday evening. She sang "Micaela's Prayer," from "Carmen," and gave as an encore an excerpt from Mozart's "Nozzi di Figaro." The finished art and charming personality of the young singer combined to make a most favorable impression upon her hearers, and her further progress will be watched with interest.

* * *

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, March 17th, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past season. Miss Culp, like Miss Gerhardt, is an illustration that, despite tradition, really artistic singers do at times come from Germany. Miss Culp is the possessor of a very beautiful voice, which she uses with utmost skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

* * *

Doctor Muck has placed on this programme what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a symphonic burleske by Joseph Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist, who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet." His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than 60 editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date MAR 1 6 1913

Established 1884

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Kommenden Donnerstag Abend, reſp. Samstag Nachmittag finden in Carnegie Hall die diesjährigen Schlußkonzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters unter Leitung von Dr. Muck ſtatt. Das Donnerstag-Programm umfaßt Goldmark's Ouverture „Im Frühling", Chas. Martin Loeffler's „A Pagan poem" nach Virgil, Po. 14 für Orcheſter, Piano, engl. Horn und drei Trompeten. Brahms' Violinkonzert von Herrn Anton Witek, dem Konzertmeiſter des Orcheſters mit Orcheſterbegleitung geſpielt, und Dvorak's „Karneval"-Ouverture

---

and Most Complete
Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date MAR 15 1913

Establis

COMING CONCERTS

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, a Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created a deep impression. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs. Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." It is a symphonic burleske by Joseph Gustax Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." The composer is a violinist who lives in Bruenn where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverei and the newer Conservatory of Musi His published compositions comprise opera, "Der Traum," first produced the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the ea part of 1912; several pieces of cham music and incidental music to the "Kismet." His Symphonic Burles "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, founded on Wilhelm Busch's humor collection of sketches of the same nan written and drawn for the edification the children of Germany. The progra follows:

Mrazek, Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz.
Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert, Songs with orchestra—
  "Raste Krieger."
  "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
Liszt, Episode from "Lenou's "Faust" Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra—
  Wagner—
    "Traume."
  Beethoven—
    "Freud voll und Leidvoll."
    "Die Trommel geruhret."
Duka "L'Apprenti

From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Es 1884

Last Boston Symphony Concert

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created a notable impression upon the musical public during the past season.

Miss Culp is the possessor of a beautiful voice, which she uses with skill, and as a poetic interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

Doctor Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a symphonic burleske by Josef Gustav Marzek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912, several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

The work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

JULIA CULP = MEZZO - SOPRANO

SOLOISTS IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, will be heard at tomorrow evening's Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music. Ernest Schelling, the eminent Philadelph

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created a profound impression upon the musical public during the season. Miss Culp is the possessor of a beautiful voice, which she uses with skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traeume" and two Beethoven songs.

JULIA CULP.

Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a Symphonic Burleske by Josef Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play, "Kismet." His Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than sixty editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

The work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettle drums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. The full program of the concert is as follows:

Mrazek, Symphonic Burleska, "Max and Moritz."
Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert—Songs with orchestra.
  "Raste Krieger."
  "Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
Liszt, Episode from Lenau's "Faust," Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra.
  Wagner, "Traume."

From EVENING TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 15 1913

Soloists With Orchestras

Established:

JULIA CULP

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Last Boston Symphony Concert—Its New Singer and Novel Number—Ernest Schelling, Native Philadelphian and Musical Cosmopolite, With Local Orchestra.

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created such an impression upon the musical public during the past season. She will sing a group of Schubert songs with orchestra, including "Ave Maria," Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs. Dr. Muck has placed on this program the Symphonic Burleske by Joseph Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer little is known except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play, "Kismet." His Symphonic Burleske is founded on Wilhelm Busch's skits, written and drawn for German children. The book's prologue, six chapters—entitled "pranks"—and epilogue have corresponding musical sections. This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. Its enlarged orchestra comprises piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings. Other program numbers follow: Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring;" Liszt, episode from Lenau's "Faust" scene in the village tavern (Mephisto waltz), and Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier: Scherzo." The Burleske plays twenty-five minutes without stop. The audience should be seated promptly before 8.15 to avoid a long wait before being admitted.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1

Estal

Julia Culp—Soloist With Boston Symphony

Dorothea Thullen, the Philadelphia soprano, appeared with success as soloist at the last of the series of popular concerts of the Orchestra on Wednesday evening. She sang "Micaela's Prayer," from "Carmen," and gave as an encore an excerpt from Mozart's "Nozzi di Figaro." The finished art and charming personality of the young singer combined to make a most favorable impression upon her hearers, and her further progress will be watched with interest.

* * *

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, March 17th, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past season. Miss Culp, like Miss Gerhardt, is an illustration that, despite tradition, really artistic singers do at times come from Germany. Miss Culp is the possessor of a very beautiful voice, which she uses with utmost skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

* * *

Doctor Muck has placed on this programme what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Eulenspiegel." This is a symphonic burleske by Joseph Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz." Of the composer of this piece little is known except that he is a violinist, who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music. His published compositions comprise an opera, Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet." His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for the edification of the children of Germany. This work went through no less than 60 editions. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address. Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 16 191

Estab 884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, March 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past season. Miss Culp is the possessor of a very beautiful voice which he uses with utmost skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Bulenspiegel." This is a Symphnic Burleske by Josef Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz," which may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drumr cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celestra, piano and strings. The full progrdam of the concert is as follows:

Mrazek. Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz."
Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert, songs with orchestra—"Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd," "Ave Maria."
Liszt, episode from Lenau's "Faust," scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra—
Wagner, "Traume."
Beethoven, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret."
Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).

MISS JULIA CULP

[illegible] with Boston Symphony Orche

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date MAR

Establ

MUSICAL ATTRACTIONS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National on next Tuesday afternoon, March 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The solist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, under whose skillful leadership the orchestra was heard in Washington at its January concert, when Dr. Muck was ill. He will play Eugen d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major.

The symphony will be the first in D minor, by the Danish composer, Christian Sinding. Sinding is one of the great figures in Scandinavian music, and by many he is regarded as a greater man than Grieg, and almost on a par with Sibelius. His music partakes largely of northern feeling and northern color, and many of his sons are rare masterpieces. Richard Strauss will be represented by his tone poem, "Don Juan," the work which really made him famous. The program concludes with Dvorak's overture, "Carnaval."

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 16 1913

Est 884

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The socolist will be Mr. Otto Urack, the distinguished 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, under whose skillful leadership the orchestra was heard in Washington at its January concert, when Dr. Muck was ill. He will play Eugen d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major.

The symphony will be the first in D minor by the Danish composer, Christion Sinding. Sinding is one of the great figures in Scandinavian music and by many he is regarded as a greater man than Grieg and almost on a par with Sibelius. His music partakes largely of Northern feeling and Northern color and many of his songs are rare masterpieces. The symphony to be played here is one of extreme effectiveness.

Richard Strauss will be represented by his tone poem, "Don Juan," the work which really made him famous, for in all of his compositions which preceded it, his symphony, his "Aus Italiens" and his "Macbeth," he was finding himself. In "Don Juan" he became the great Strauss that we know to-day, and many believe that he never gets to a higher point in dramatic beauty than in this symphonic poem which was inspired by Lenau's poem of "Don Juan." The full programme is as follows: Symphony in D minor (Sinding); tone poem, "Don Juan" (Strauss); concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major, Op. 20 (d'-Albert); overture, "Carnaval" (Dvorak).

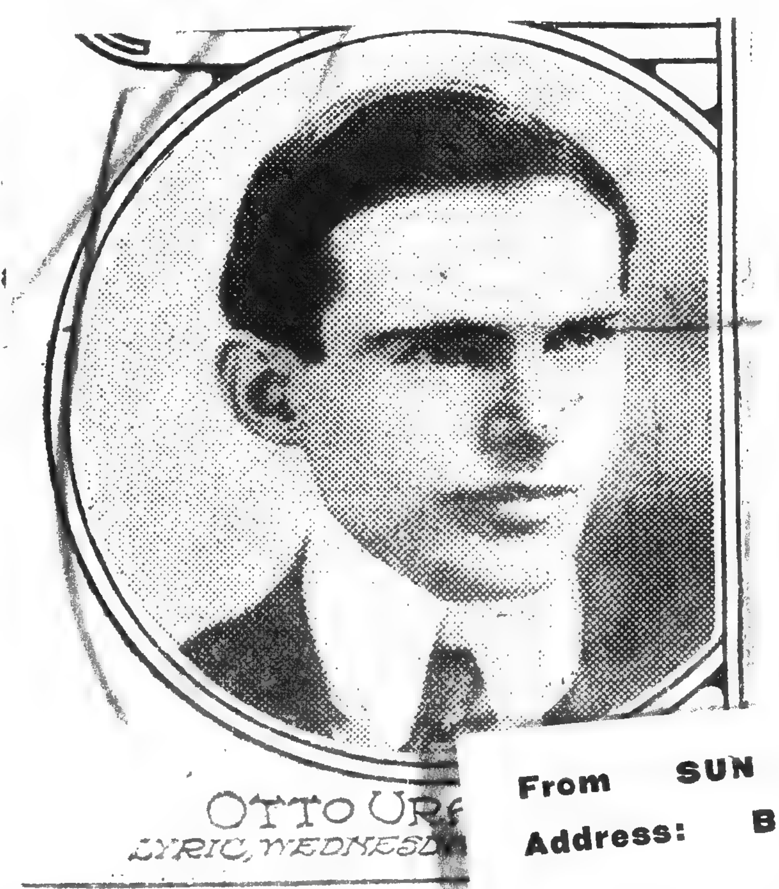
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Est



OTTO UR
LYRIC, WEDNESD

FINAL CONCERT BOSTON SYMPH

Orchestra Will Be He Lyric Wednesday Evening.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 19, at 8.15. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished cellist and assistant conductor of the Orchestra. He will play d'Albert's concerto in C Major, which has not been heard here since Alwin Schroeder played it a number of years ago.

MacDowell's "Indian Suite," generally regarded as the most beautiful work that American genius has yet given to music, and Dukas' brilliant "L'Apprenti Sorcier" are included in the program. Baltimore will also hear for the first time the symphonic burleske of Mrazck, entitled "Max and Moritz." This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra.

The full program of the concert is is follows:

Mrazek—
  Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz."
MacDowell—
  Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, "Indian", Op. 48.
D'Albert—
  Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in C Major, Op. 20.
Dukas—
  "L'Apprenti Sorcier." Scherzo. (After a Ballad by Goethe.)

Newspap

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestr

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 19, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who will play d'Albert's concerto in C major, which has not been heard here since Alwin Schroeder played it a number of years ago.

The program is one of especial interest. It includes MacDowell's Indian Suite, generally regarded as the most beautiful work that American genius has yet given to music, and Dukas' brilliant L'Apprenti Sorcier. Baltimore will also hear for the first time the extraordinary symphonic burleske of Mrazek entitled Max and Moritz. Of the composer of this piece little is known, except that he is a violinist who lives in Bruenn, where he is teacher in the Bruenn Musikverein and the newer Conservatory of Music.

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 9

Est 884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have n named Felix Weingartner as hi ssor.

These reports have c ch annoyance to those vitally ed in the Boston Symphony Orc Dr. Muck's present contract with estra has four years to run a d shade of truth in the report that he has intention whatever of asking a rel In other words, there has been absolut no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Motti. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to him back.

In addi ers, Mr. Muck d special per stadt and other the last week call to conduct sfal" in January amps Elysees l these offers ston at least

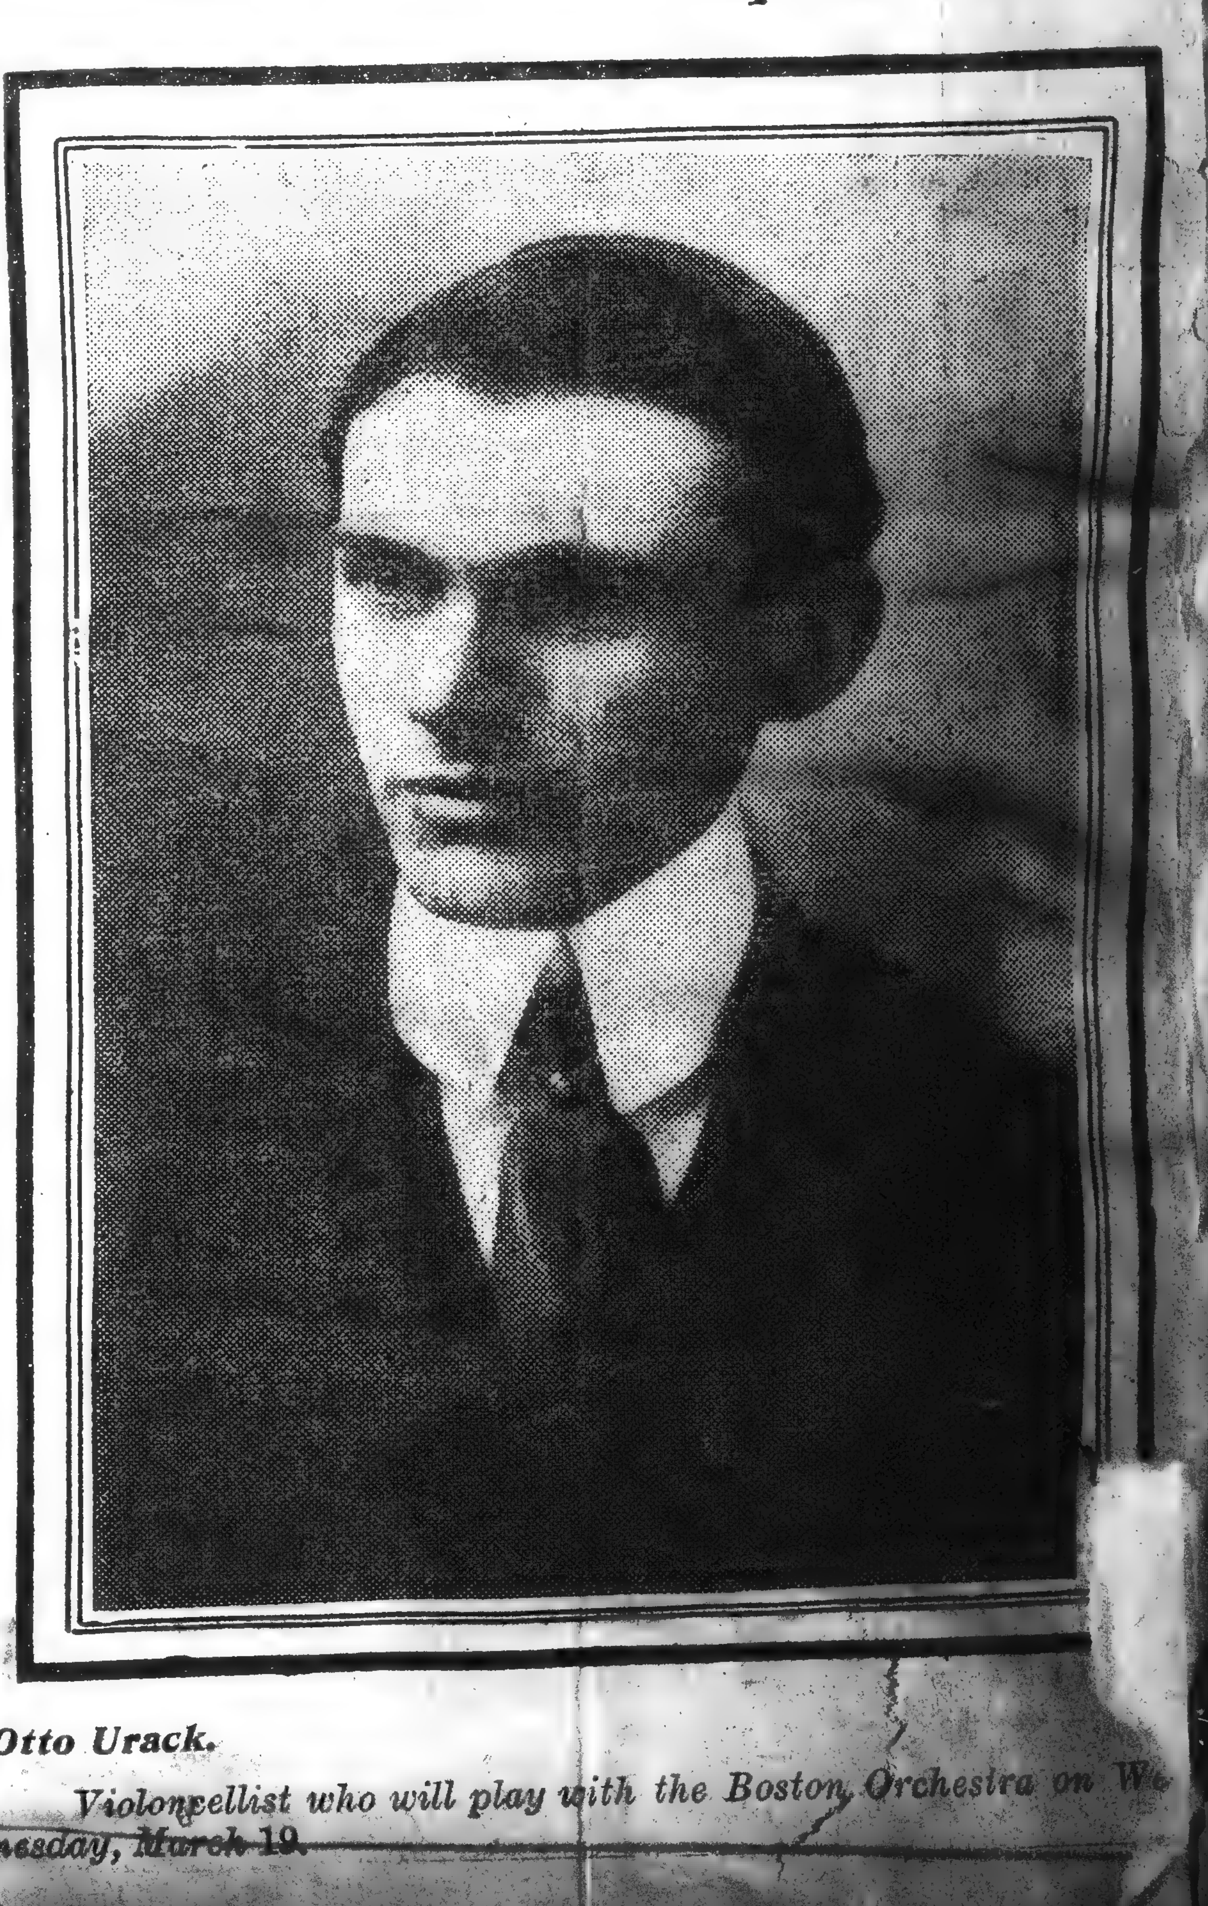
From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established:

Soloist At Symphony



Otto Urack.

Violoncellist who will play with the Boston Orchestra on Wednesday, March 19.

lphia soas soloist
pular con-
Wednesday
's Prayer," an encore
"Nozzi di charming inger comvorable im-
nd her fur-es with in-ason by the ra will be ic tomorrow

7th, at 8:15
Julia Culp,
oprano, who impression ing the past
ss Gerhardt,
te tradition,
times come is the pos-voice, which and as an als. She will orchestra by ne" and two on this pro-regarded as s music that ill Eulenspie-burleske by ntitled "Max poser of this that he is a nn, where he Musikverein

ory of Music.
comprise an produced at in the early s of chamber to the play
nic burleske, heard here, is h's humorous e same name
edification of
This work
0 editions. As ch contains a y are entitled
d an epilogue, divided into

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 16 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, March 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past season. Miss Culp is the possessor of a very beautiful voice which he uses with utmost skill, and as an interpreter she has few equals. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded as the finest piece of humorous music that has been written since "Till Bulenspiegel." This is a Symphnic Burleske by Josef Gustav Mrazek, entitled "Max and Moritz," which may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra, comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drumr cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celestra, piano and strings. The full progrdam of the concert is as follows:

Mrazek. Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz."
Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring."
Schubert, songs with orchestra—"Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd," "Ave Maria."
Liszt, episode from Lenau's "Faust," scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with orchestra—
Wagner, "Traume."
Beethoven, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret."
Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).

Estab 384

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 6 1913

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The socolist will be Mr. Otto Urack, the distinguished 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, under whose skillful leadership the orchestra was heard in Washington at its January concert, when Dr. Muck was ill. He will play Eugen d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major.

The Symphony will be the first in D minor by the Danish composer, Chrlstion Sinding. Sinding is one of the great figures in Scandinavian music and by many he is regarded as a greater man than Grieg and almost on a par with Sibelius. His music partakes largely of Northern feeling and Northern color and many of his songs are rare masterpieces. The symphony to be played here is one of extreme effectiveness.

Richard Strauss will be represented by his tone poem, "Don Juan," the work which really made him famous, for in all of his compositions which preceded it, his symphony, his "Aus Italiens" and his "Macbeth," he was finding himself. In "Don Juan" he became the great Strauss that we know to-day, and many believe that he never gets to a higher point in dramatic beauty than in this symphonic poem which was inspired by Lenau's poem of "Don Juan." The full programme is as follows: Symphony in D minor (Sinding); tone poem, "Don Juan" (Strauss); concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major, Op. 20 (d'-Albert); overture, "Carnaval" (Dvorak).

Est 884

Newspape

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MAR. 19
OTTO URACH.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
LYRIC

Miss Bessie Kally, of Norfolk, is the guest of Mrs. Guy Mix.

mong the arrivals this week registered m New York are Mr. and Mrs. R. S. rling, Mr. and Mrs Fred a Behrens d son, G. M. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. W. Richards, C. C. Williams, Mr. and s. Lambert Munson and Master Lamrt Munson, Jr., Miss Corinne Munson, rederick Willis, Oscar Frommel and Miss C. Y. Frommel, Mr. and Mrs. E. Stienbrugger, Mrs. A. Hickey and Miss M. R. Hickey, of Lockport, N. Y.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Jameson, Misses Isabelle and Elizabeth Jameson, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Bineles, Miss Hood and Miss Alice Hood, Mr. and Mrs. Moses Swain and family, of Haverford, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Bergner and Misses Bergner, of Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. James K. Jonston, of Reading.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. M. Crady, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Schafer, Miss Schafer and

NEW YORK
Most Complete in the World

MAR

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips have n named Felix Weingartner as his ssor.

These reports have c ch annoyance to those vitally ed in the Boston Symphony Orc Dr. Muck's present contract with rchestra has four years to run and shade of truth in the report that he has intention whatever of asking a rel In other words, there has been absolut no foundation for any of these reports which have caused so much comment.

Since Dr. Muck arrived in America last fall he has been besieged with requests to take various important posts in Europe. As long ago as last spring great influence was brought to bear on him to take the post left vacant in Munich by the death of Felix Mottl. Efforts of every kind have been made to secure him for head of the Vienna Opera. Nor is it violating confidence to say that Berlin would be only too happy to have him back.

In addition to these offers, Mr. Muck has been requested to lead special performances of opera in Armstadt and other German cities, and within the last week he received a most urgent call to conduct the performances of "Parisfal" in January, 1914, in the new Champs Elysees Opera House in Paris. All these offers he has positively declined.

Dr. Muck will be in Boston at least until the end of season of 1916-1917.

Est 884

MISS JULIA CULP

~~[illegible] with Boston Symphony Orchestra~~

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1913

MUSICAL ATTRACTIONS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National on next Tuesday afternoon, March 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The solist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra, under whose skillful leadership the orchestra was heard in Washington at its January concert, when Dr. Muck was ill. He will play Eugen d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major.

The symphony will be the first in D minor, by the Danish composer, Christian Sinding. Sinding is one of the great figures in Scandinavian music, and by many he is regarded as a greater man than Grieg, and almost on a par with Sibelius. His music partakes largely of northern feeling and northern color, and many of his sons are rare masterpieces.

Richard Strauss will be represented by his tone poem, "Don Juan," the work which really made him famous. The program concludes with Dvorak's overture, "Carnaval."

Establ

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

OTTO URACK
LYRIC, WEDNESDAY, MAR 19

FINAL CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Will Be Heard At Lyric Wednesday Evening.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 19, at 8.15. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the distinguished cellist and assistant conductor of the Orchestra. He will play d'Albert's concerto in C Major, which has not been heard here since Alwin Schroeder played it a number of years ago.

MacDowell's "Indian Suite," generally regarded as the most beautiful work that American genius has yet given to music, and Dukas' brilliant "L'Apprenti Sorcier" are included in the program. Baltimore will also hear for the first time the symphonic burleske of Mrazck, entitled "Max and Moritz." This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra.

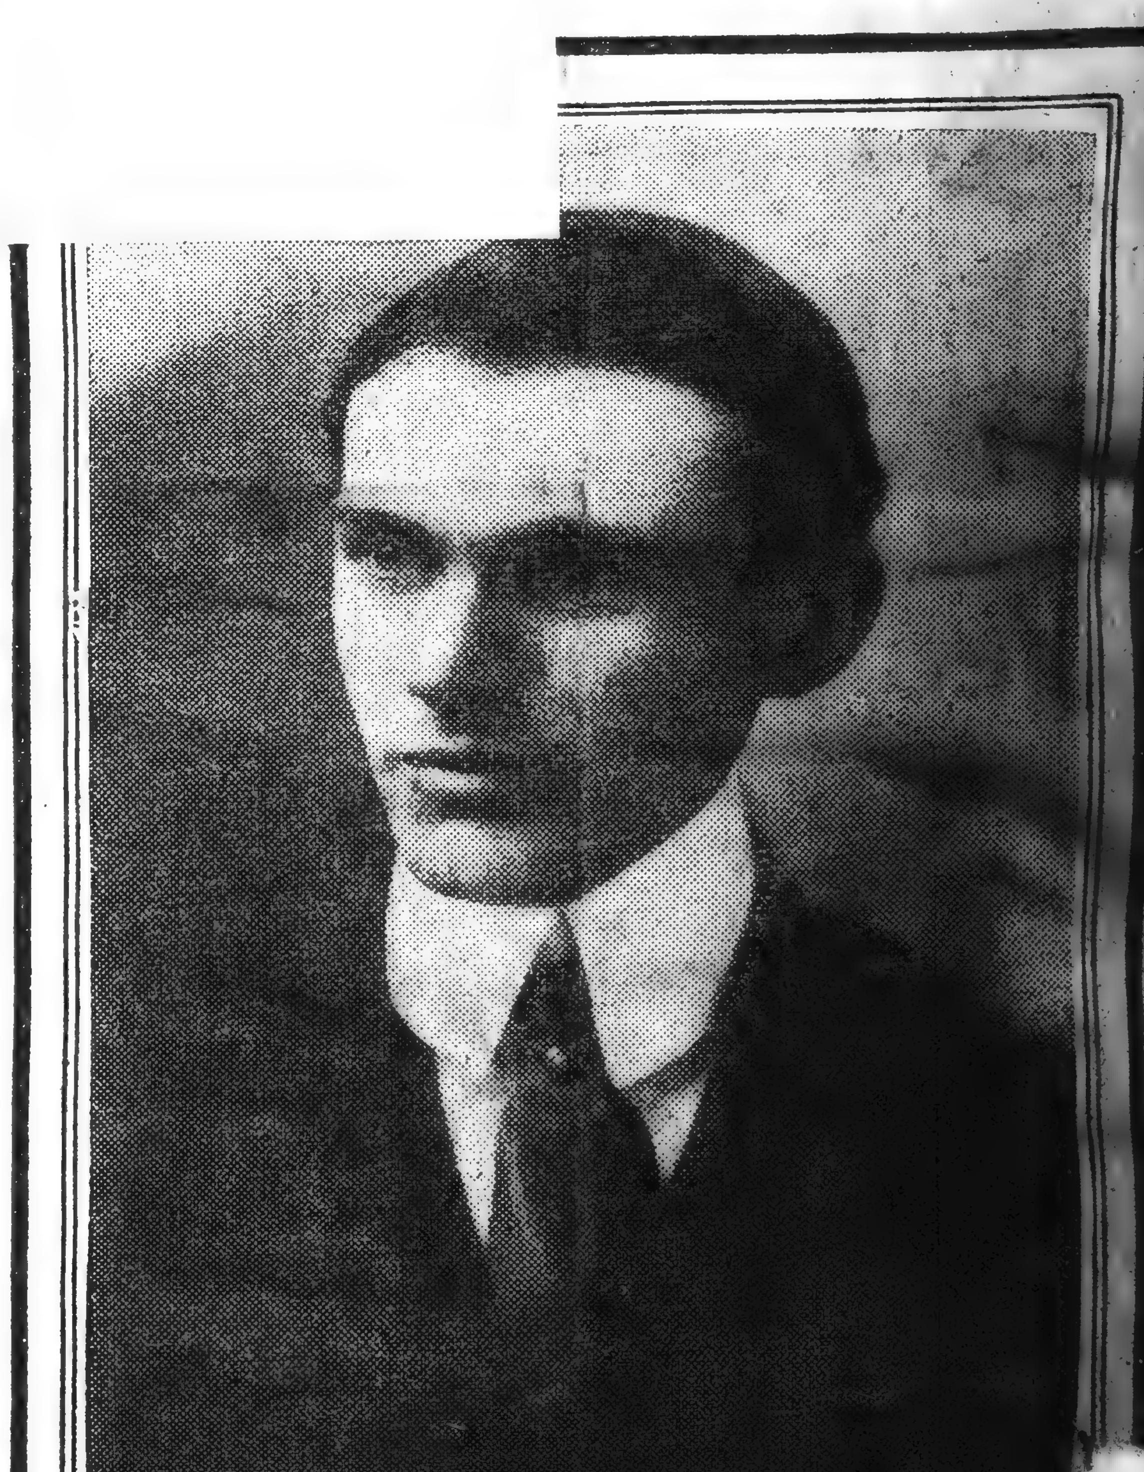
The full program of the concert is is follows:

Mrazek—
Symphonic Burleske, "Max and Moritz."
MacDowell—
Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, "Indian", Op. 48.
D'Albert—
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in C Major, Op. 20.
Dukas—
"L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo. (After a Ballad by Goethe.)

Est

---

mphony



Otto Urack.

Violoncellist who will play with the Boston Orchestra on We nesday, March 19.

From EVENING TELEGRAPH,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 8

THE MUSICAL WORLD

Boston Band Plays Symphonic Burlesque—Another Ornstein Recital.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who paid their final visit of the season to the Academy last evening, may always be trusted to give a performance of high artistic merit whatever the character of the music they elect to interpret. Truth to tell, the orchestral numbers on last night's program were of lighter quality than is usual, and, judged from the somewhat teetering platform of contemporary standards, might even be called frivolous.

Instead of effective "showpieces," which might have been chosen by a conductor less sure of the resources of his orchestra, Dr. Muck chose to present a series of oddities. His program might be compared to a bouquet of musical orchids, the exotic flowerings of a superheated, overstimulated musical soil.

Also, there was the added attraction of a soloist of unusual distinction, Julia Culp, the Holland-born mezzo-soprano, interpreter of "lieder," who made her local debut. The peculiarity of the program gave rise to a condition rare enough in the annals of the Boston Orchestra—the soloist, rather than the orchestra, was the dominant feature of the evening.

The opening number was Mraczek's symphonic burlesque of Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz," dedicated by the composer to Dr. Richard Strauss "with the utmost respect." The composition is intended to furnish musical exposition of the antics of the two prankish, impish little Teutons, dear to the hearts of thousands in the fatherland. It holds much of interest doubtless, and with the assistance of the dedication it is possible to draw a parallel between it and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." A prologue and episode and seven incidents comprise the poem, which is played without intermission and with the slightest of pauses between its parts. So elaborate and realistic a piece of fooling, heard once, has the interest of a rare curio. To be forced to listen to it as a frequent orchestral visitor would certainly be painful.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which closed the program, was possibly inserted for the purpose of contrasting the Mraczek number. The delicacy and grace which characterized it and the dramatic climax of the Sorcerer's return place it in a higher sphere than Mraczek's frank though skilful fooling.

Still a third number, which, in its time, was considered a shockingly realistic piece of descriptive writing, Liszt's Second Mephisto Waltz, from his setting to Lenau's "Faust," was also included, but its erstwhile horror seemed to have departed before the stranger dissonances and more complicated harmonies of the later composers.

Goldmark's dainty "Spring" overture, which completed the orchestra's part in the evening, furnished a delightful contrast to the eerieness of the other numbers.

Miss Culp, whose vocalism has won her high praise elsewhere, demonstrated that she is entitled to be considered among the leading interpreters of "lieder." Her voice is of pleasing quality and under excellent control, used with the minimum of effort and effective, both in half voice and at full pitch. She gave first a group of three Schubert songs inspired by the lyrics in Scott's "Lady of the Lake," the "Raste Krieger," "Jaeger, Ruhe von der Jagd," and "Ave Maria," and later Wagner's poetic "Traeume," followed by Claerchen's two songs from Beethoven's Egmont "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Trommel Gerhuehret."

Ornstein Recital

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Weird Burlesque, "Max und Moritz," Proves Wearisome. Other Numbers Memorable.

JULIA CULP THE SOLOIST

PROGRAMME.

Mraczek—"Max und Moritz," Burleske.
Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Songs with Orchestra—Schubert: (a) Raste, Krieger; (b) Jaeger, ruhe; (c) Ave Maria.
Julia Culp.
Liszt—"Mephisto" Waltz.
Songs with Orchestra—Wagner, "Traeume"; Beethoven, "Freudvoll" and "Die Trommel."
Dukas—"Sorcerer's Apprentice," Scherzo.

The initial number of the Boston Symphony programme, at the Academy, last evening, was programme music with a vengeance—the vengeance being that of the miller who grinds the two mischievous urchins into flour, after the perpetration of the seven tricks that Wilhelm Busch depicted, in the German sublimation of the livid "comic" supplement of American Sunday newspapers. The music, with its recurrent motive of the irrepressible youngsters, brings alive the pictures—but after half an hour of the juvenile diablerie the most sympathetic listener has had rather more than enough of it.

There is not very much difference in the idiom that describes stealing the widow's fowls and that which projects the distresses of the tailor, the schoolmaster, Uncle Fritz with the beetles, or the irate baker. There is all the ingenuity of Richard Strauss—to whom Mraczek inscribes the work—in episodes that are more lucid and coherent reminders of "Elektra" and "Feuersnot." But it is not the highest type of [illegible] the running commentary of cold type to explain it; orchestral music should not have to lean heavily upon a libretto. Noteworthy was the skill of the united violins, the clarinet

Doctor Muck, moreover, clarified what might have been viscous and turgid by putting the accent just where it belonged and preserving the disciplinary balance between the small boys and their elders. But when all was bowed and blown and fingered, the net result was rather dubiously worth the virtuosity expended upon it.

It was, on the whole, a relief to find oneself in the vernal joyfulness and buoyant lyricism of Goldmark's version of the Spring. Like Schumann's "Spring" symphony, played by our own orchestra last Friday, it is tuned to the season of reawakenings and renewed aspirations of the earth-mother and her disobedient children. There was the breath of outdoors in it and "vital feelings of delight."

Julia Culp, the Dutch contralto, was the soloist. She has not a beautiful voice, but she sings beautifully. The distinction here is that her inspired art atones for a timbre that is not by nature ingratiating. Every syllable counts for its full value; every emotional stress is informed by acute intelligence; and through all and in all is the spirit that giveth life. Hence it is a constant pleasure to hear her and to watch her as she sings. The "Ave Maria," admirably supported by violins and harp, was nobly set forth and made to mean everything the author of it intended. Whatever the mood, the singer gave her personality to it with a rational intensity, in which mind and heart never lost sight of each other.

In Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Dukas Sherzo the genial necromancy of Doctor Muck found dramatic expression, not alone through the corporate voice of the orchestra, but through the rare skill of Mr. Shuecker's harp, the singing violin of Concertmeister Witek, the pellucid flute of Maquarre, the grumpily humorous argument of the bassoons. The strings—particularly the first violins—are the peculiar glory of the Boston Orchestra. There was a single trill of the latter in the Dukas Scherzo that was as eloquent of tireless rehearsal as Giotto's free-hand circle was of his ability to draw. The concert was the fifth and last of the season's series, and it was one to be remembered.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established: Lond

BOSTON SYMPHON PRESENTS NOVELT

Mraczek's "Burleske" a Uniq and Striking Composition.

PROGRAM.

Mraczek. Symphonic Burleske for Grand Orchestra (after Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz.")
First time in Philadelphia.
Goldmark. Overture, "Im Fruhling" ("In the Spring"), Op. 36.
Songs with Orchestra
Schubert.
(a) Raste, Krieger
(b) Jager, ruhe von der Jagd
(c) Ave Maria
Liszt. Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust;" The Dance in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with Orchestra.
Wagner .... "Traume"
Beethoven .... Freudvoll und Leidvoll
Beethoven .... Die Trommel geruhret
Dukas. "L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"); Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).
Conductor .... Dr. Kark Muck
Soloist .... Miss Juliæ Culp

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their last concert for this year at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting the most delightful and varied program of the season, and one of the most enjoyable they have ever given here. The opening number on the program was a novelty and in many ways the most unique orchestral composition Philadelphians have had the privilege of hearing. It is entitled "Symphonic Burleske," and was written by Mraczek, a composer practically unknown to us. For its presentation the orchestra had to be considerably augmented and with instruments rarely used. This is necessary to bring out in imitation all the gay pranks of "Max and Moritz."

Cartoons Set To Music.

"Max and Moritz" are the creation of a German cartoonist, Wilhelm Busch, and their pranks greatly amused the Teutons for some time. The composer has treated, in eight parts, these pranks, introducing them with a prologue and ending them with an epilogue. The Glockenspiel, celesta and a grand piano are important instruments used to illustrate the antics of the mischievous urchins, as well as all the other instruments. The woodwind are used to present the young cocks and hens of the barnyard "first prank." The clarinet sings the widow's grief when they are killed, and when they are put on to boil, and the boys draw them from the pot up the chimney with a fishline, it is the harp, celesta and piano which represent the ascent. Muted and divided second violins imitate the crawling bugs the boys place in Uncle Fritz's bed, and there is also music descriptive of the escaping corn from the miller's bag, and the grinding of the mill.

Delightful Nonsense.

All this seems nonsense, but if considered as such, it is most delightful, and admirably worked into a composition requiring close to an hour in its presentation. Dr. Muck would seem almost too dignified and sincere to lend himself to such interpretation, but he entered into the work with the greatest enthusiasm, and was compelled at the finish, to mop his brow from the exertion of helping along the jollification. The orchestra played the number in excellent spirit and gave it admirable significance, for it requires the skill of such a finished body of musicians to bring out all its beauty and to make emphatic its many points of musical burlesque.

The other numbers given by the orchestra were Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring;" Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" from the Lenau "Faust," and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Of these the most striking was the Liszt number, and it gave 'Cellist H. Warnke a chance to make a, splendid impression.

The soloist was Miss Julia Culp, who sang three Schubert songs from Scott's "Lady of the Lake" as her first number. Miss Culp had an even and melodious voice, the "Ave Marie" being the most effective of the three numbers, as far as her interpretation was concerned. Later she sang three more songs, Wagner's "Dreams" and two by Beethoven, written for Goethe's "Egmont." The second number, "The Drums Loud Are Beating," was admirably sung, and the singer was liberally applauded after all six numbers.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date MAR 1 8 1913

TAKING its farewell for the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives two concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert, Anton Witek, first violin, plays the Brahms concerto. Carl Muck conducts the American Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" and two overtures, Dvorak's "Carnival" and Goldmark's "In the Spring."

MacDowell's "Indian" suite opens the Boston Orchestra's last programme at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening, followed by Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and D'Albert's concerto for 'cello, played by Otto Urack.

With Sinding's symphony in D minor, the Boston men on Saturday present, for the first time in New York, a symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz,"

From HERALD
Address: New York MAR 1 9 1913
Date

Miss Wilson Takes Guests to the Symphony

Several Persons in Washington Society Also Had Friends at Concert of Boston Orchestra.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

Miss Margaret W. Wilson took several guests to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this afternoon. Her party included Mrs. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Richmond Pearson Hobson, Miss Helen Woodrow Bones and Miss Isabel Hagner.

The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained Mrs. George von L. Meyer, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Mrs. Carl Muck and Commander Boy-Ed, naval attaché of the German Embassy. Miss Mae Williams, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. I. T. Mann and Mrs. Preston Gibson also had guests at the concert.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 18 1913

CARTOONS IN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mraczek's 'Max and Moritz' Played at Orchestra's Final Concert

JULIA CULP AS SOLOIST

Gifted Lieder Singer Heard to Advantage in Classical Songs

By H. T. Craven

NOVELTY prevailed at the final concert here of the Boston Symphony this season, given last evening in the Academy of Music. Julia Culp, a gifted Dutch lieder interpreter, made her first appearance in this city as sololist. Doctor Muck, directing the Boston instrumentalists, brought forward as a new offering Mraczek's "Symphonic Burlesk.," "Max und Moritz."

To find the American analogy this music material, one must turn to "Mutt and Jeff," "The Hall Room Boys" or "The Yellow Kid." But Mr. Fisher and his fellow-journalistic artists are frequently funny. They are seldom cruel. Wilhelm Busch, long known as an artist of the Fliegende Blaetter staff devised a series of cartoons, alleged to be for children. They presented the exceedingly malicious pranks of "Max und Moritz," eventually punished by being ground up in meal bags. The drawings are technically elegant, but the spirit of the work, said to be highly popular in the Fatherland, is merely rather revolting. The episodes are about as funny as the conduct of the ass who rocks the boat, or the "playful" imp who pulls the chair from under his grandmother. At any rate they are grotesque and so is Mraczek's music, intended somewhat as companion piece to the genuinely fanciful "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, and dedicated with profound respect to that eminent composer.

It is but just to Mraczek to confess that his elaborate score is more comical than its pictorial inspiration. Some of the effects are quaint and droll, and unique tones are achieved by the employment of a vast assemblage of instruments, which includes among other things the tinkling celeste, and a grand pianoforte "with the lid raised." In this musical version there a prologue and epilogue and seven nks."

ss Culp is more generously endowed vocal assets than her fellow-worker he same field, the justly admired ıa Gerhardt, and she interprets her s with equal charm, taste and poetic gination. Hers was a thoroughly de- tful contribution to the concert. She ed Schubert's music to three songs ıslated by Storch from Scott's "The y of the Lake," Wagner's enchanting lovely "Traeume" and Beethoven's eudvoll und Liedvoll" and "Die mmell gerueret" from Goethe's gmont," with music by Beethoven. ch the exception of "Traeume," all these songs are seldom heard in this vicinity.

The orchestra, which was in brilliant form, played Goldmark's sunny overture, "Im Fruehling" and Dukas' daintily whimsical "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

From EVENING TELEGRAPH,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 18

THE MUSICAL WORLD

Boston Band Plays Symphonic Burlesque—Another Ornstein Recital.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who paid their final visit of the season to the Academy last evening, may always be trusted to give a performance of high artistic merit whatever the character of the music they elect to interpret. Truth to tell, the orchestral numbers on last night's program were of lighter quality than is usual, and, judged from the somewhat teetering platform of contemporary standards, might even be called frivolous.

Instead of effective "showpieces," which might have been chosen by a conductor less sure of the resources of his orchestra, Dr. Muck chose to present a series of oddities. His program might be compared to a bouquet of musical orchids, the exotic flowerings of a superheated, overstimulated musical soil.

Also, there was the added attraction of a soloist of unusual distinction, Julia Culp, the Holland-born mezzo-soprano, interpreter of "lieder," who made her local debut. The peculiarity of the program gave rise to a condition rare enough in the annals of the Boston Orchestra—the soloist, rather than the orchestra, was the dominant feature of the evening.

The opening number was Mraczek's symphonic burlesque of Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz," dedicated by the composer to Dr. Richard Strauss "with the utmost respect." The composition is intended to furnish musical exposition of the antics of the two prankish, impish little Teutons, dear to the hearts of thousands in the fatherland. It holds much of interest doubtless, and with the assistance of the dedication it is possible to draw a parallel between it and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." A prologue and episode and seven incidents comprise the poem, which is played without intermission and with the slightest of pauses between its parts. So elaborate and realistic a piece of fooling, heard once, has the interest of a rare curio. To be forced to listen to it as a frequent orchestral visitor would certainly be painful.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which closed the program, was possibly inserted for the purpose of contrasting the Mraczek number. The delicacy and grace which characterized it and the dramatic climax of the Sorcerer's return place it in a higher sphere than Mraczek's frank though skilful fooling.

Still a third number, which, in its time, was considered a shockingly realistic piece of descriptive writing, Liszt's Second Mephisto Waltz, from his setting to Lenau's "Faust," was also included, but its erstwhile horror seemed to have departed before the stranger dissonances and more complicated harmonies of the later composers.

Goldmark's dainty "Spring" overture, which completed the orchestra's part in the evening, furnished a delightful contrast to the eerieness of the other numbers.

Miss Culp, whose vocalism has won her high praise elsewhere, demonstrated that she is entitled to be considered among the leading interpreters of "lieder." Her voice is of pleasing quality and under excellent control, used with the minimum of effort and effective, both in half voice and at full pitch. She gave first a group of three Schubert songs inspired by the lyrics in Scott's "Lady of the Lake," the "Raste Krieger," "Jaeger, Ruhe von der Jagd," and "Ave Maria," and later Wagner's poetic "Traeume," followed by Claerchen's two songs from Beethoven's Egmont "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and 'Die Trommel Gerhuehret."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Weird Burlesque, "Max und Moritz," Proves Wearisome. Other Numbers Memorable.

JULIA CULP THE SOLOIST

PROGRAMME.

Mraczek—"Max und Moritz," Burleske.
Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Songs with Orchestra—Schubert: (a) Raste, Krieger, (b) Jaeger, ruhe; (c) Ave Maria.
Julia Culp.
Liszt—"Mephisto" Waltz.
Songs with Orchestra—Wagner, "Traeume"; Beethoven, "Freudvoll" and "Die Trommel."
Dukas—"Sorcerer's Apprentice," Scherzo.

The initial number of the Boston Symphony programme, at the Academy, last evening, was programme music with a vengeance—the vengeance being that of the miller who grinds the two mischievous urchins into flour, after the perpetration of the seven tricks that Wilhelm Busch depicted, in the German sublimation of the livid "comic" supplement of American Sunday newspapers. The music, with its recurrent motive of the irrepressible youngsters, brings alive the pictures—but after half an hour of the juvenile diablerie the most sympathetic listener has had rather more than enough of it.

There is not very much difference in the idiom that describes stealing the widow's fowls and that which projects the distresses of the tailor, the schoolmaster, Uncle Fritz with the beetles, or the irate baker. There is all the ingenuity of Richard Strauss—to whom Mraczek inscribes the work—in episodes that are more lucid and coherent reminders of "Elektra" and "Feuersnot." But it is not the highest type of [illegible] the running commentary of cold type to explain it; orchestral music should not have to lean heavily upon a libretto. Noteworthy was the skill of the united violins, the clarinet

Doctor Muck, moreover, clarified what might have been viscous and turgid by putting the accent just where it belonged and preserving the disciplinary balance between the small boys and their elders. But when all was bowed and blown and fingered, the net result was rather dubiously worth the virtuosity expended upon it.

It was, on the whole, a relief to find oneself in the vernal joyfulness and buoyant lyricism of Goldmark's version of the Spring. Like Schumann's "Spring" symphony, played by our own orchestra last Friday, it is tuned to the season of reawakenings and renewed aspirations of the earth-mother and her disobedient children. There was the breath of outdoors in it and "vital feelings of delight."

Julia Culp, the Dutch contralto, was the soloist. She has not a beautiful voice, but she sings beautifully. The distinction here is that her inspired art atones for a timbre that is not by nature ingratiating. Every syllable counts for its full value; every emotional stress is informed by acute intelligence; and through all and in all is the spirit that giveth life. Hence it is a constant pleasure to hear her and to watch her as she sings. The "Ave Maria," admirably supported by violins and harp, was nobly set forth and made to mean everything the author of it intended. Whatever the mood, the singer gave her personality to it with a rational intensity, in which mind and heart never lost sight of each other.

In Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Dukas Sherzo the genial necromancy of Doctor Muck found dramatic expression, not alone through the corporate voice of the orchestra, but through the rare skill of Mr. Shuecker's harp, the singing violin of Concertmeister Witek, the pellucid flute of Maquarre, the grumpily humorous argument of the bassoons. The strings—particularly the first violins—are the peculiar glory of the Boston Orchestra. There was a single trill of the latter in the Dukas Scherzo that was as eloquent of tireless rehearsal as Giotto's free-hand circle was of his ability to draw. The concert was the fifth and last of the season's series, and it was one to be remembered.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established: Lond

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOVELTY

Mraczek's "Burleske" a Unique and Striking Composition.

PROGRAM.

Mraczek. Symphonic Burleske for Grand Orchestra (after Wilhelm Busch's "Max und Moritz.")
First time in Philadelphia.
Goldmark. Overture, "Im Fruhling" ("In the Spring"), Op. 36.
Songs with Orchestra
Schubert.
(a) Raste, Krieger
(b) Jager, ruhe von der Jagd
(c) Ave Maria
Liszt. Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust:" The Dance in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz).
Songs with Orchestra.
Wagner .... "Traume"
Beethoven .... Freudvoll und Leidvoll
Beethoven .... Die Trommel geruhret
Dukas. "L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"): Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).
Conductor .... Dr. Kark Muck
Soloist .... Miss Julia Culp

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their last concert for this year at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting the most delightful and varied program of the season, and one of the most enjoyable they have ever given here. The opening number on the program was a novelty and in many ways the most unique orchestral composition Philadelphians have had the privilege of hearing. It is entitled "Symphonic Burleske," and was written by Mraczek, a composer practically unknown to us. For its presentation the orchestra had to be considerably augmented and with instruments rarely used. This is necessary to bring out in imitation all the gay pranks of "Max and Moritz."

Cartoons Set To Music.

"Max and Moritz" are the creation of a German cartoonist. Wilhelm Busch, and their pranks greatly amused the Teutons for some time. The composer has treated, in eight parts, these pranks, introducing them with a prologue and ending them with an epilogue. The Glockenspiel, celesta and a grand piano are important instruments used to illustrate the antics of the mischievous urchins, as well as all the other instruments. The woodwind are used to present the young cocks and hens of the barnyard "first prank." The clarinet sings the widow's grief when they are killed, and when they are put on to boil, and the boys draw them from the pot up the chimney with a fishline, it is the harp, celesta and piano which represent the ascent. Muted and divided second violins imitate the crawling bugs the boys place in Uncle Fritz's bed, and there is also music descriptive of the escaping corn from the miller's bag, and the grinding of the mill.

Delightful Nonsense.

All this seems nonsense, but if considered as such, it is most delightful, and admirably worked into a composition requiring close to an hour in its presentation. Dr. Muck would seem almost too dignified and sincere to lend himself to such interpretation, but he entered into the work with the greatest enthusiasm, and was compelled at the finish, to mop his brow from the exertion of helping along the jollification. The orchestra played the number in excellent spirit and gave it admirable significance, for it requires the skill of such a finished body of musicians to bring out all its beauty and to make emphatic its many points of musical burlesque.

The other numbers given by the orchestra were Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring;" Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" from the Lenau "Faust," and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Of these the most striking was the Liszt number, and it gave 'Cellist H. Warnke a chance to make a, splendid impression.

The soloist was Miss Julia Culp, who sang three Schubert songs from Scott's "Lady of the Lake" as her first number. Miss Culp had an even and melodious voice, the "Ave Marie" being the most effective of the three numbers, as far as her interpretation was concerned. Later she sang three more songs, Wagner's "Dreams" and two by Beethoven, written for Goethe's "Egmont." The second number, "The Drums Loud Are Beating," was admirably sung, and the singer was liberally applauded after all six numbers.

EVG. SUN
ess: New York
MAR 1 8 19

TAKING its farewell for the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra ives two concerts in Carnegie Hall next hursday evening and Saturday afteron. At the evening concert, Anton 'itek, first violin, plays the Brahms conrto. Carl Muck conducts the Amer in Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" and two ertures, Dvorak's "Carnival" and ldmark's "In the Spring."

MacDowell's "Indian" suite opens the Boston Orchestra's last programme at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening, followed by Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and D'Albert's concerto for 'cello, played by Otto Urack.

With Sinding's symphony in D minor, the Boston men on Saturday present, for the first time in New York, a symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz,"

From HERALD
Address: New York MAR 19 1913
Date

Miss Wilson Takes Guests to the Symphony

Several Persons in Washington Society Also Had Friends at Concert of Boston Orchestra.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

Miss Margaret W. Wilson took several guests to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this afternoon. Her party included Mrs. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Richmond Pearson Hobson, Miss Helen Woodrow Bones and Miss Isabel Hagner.

The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained Mrs. George von L. Meyer, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Mrs. Carl Muck and Commander Boy-Ed, naval attaché of the German Embassy. Miss Mae Williams, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. I. T. Mann and Mrs. Preston Gibson also had guests at the concert.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 18

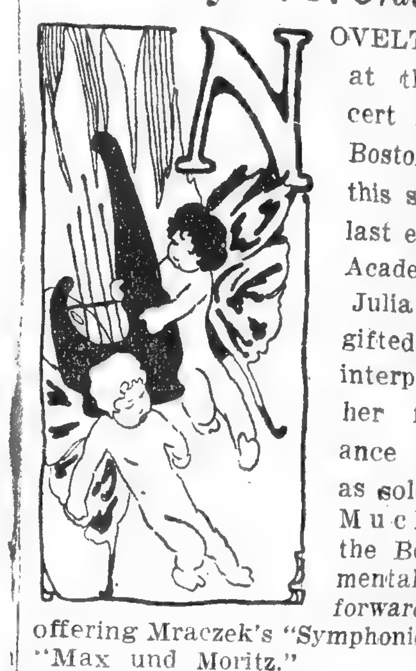
CARTOONS IN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mraczek's 'Max and Moritz' Played at Orchestra's Final Concert

JULIA CULP AS SOLOIST

Gifted Lieder Singer Heard to Advantage in Classical Songs

By H. T. Craven



NOVELTY prevailed at the final concert here of the Boston Symphony this season, given last evening in the Academy of Music. Julia Culp, a gifted Dutch lieder interpreter, made her first appearance in this city as sololist. Doctor Muck, directing the Boston instrumentalists, brought forward as a new offering Mraczek's "Symphonic Burleske," "Max und Moritz."

To find the American analogy ths basic material, one must turn to "Mutt and Jeff." "The Hall Room Boys" or "The Yellow Kid." But Mr. Fisher and his fellow-journalistic artists are frequently funny. They are seldom cruel. Wilhelm Busch, long known as an artist of the Fliegende Blaetter staff devised a series of cartoons, alleged to be for children. They presented the exceedingly vicious pranks of "Max und Moritz," eventually punished by being ground up in meal bags. The drawings are technically elegant, but the spirit of the work, said to be highly popular in the Fatherland, is surely rather revolting. The episodes are about as funny as the conduct of the ass who rocks the boat, or the "playful" imp who pulls the chair from under his grandmother. At any rate they are grotesque and so is Mraczek's music, intended somewhat as companion piece to the genuinely fanciful "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, and dedicated with profound respect to that eminent composer.

It is but just to Mraczek to confess that his elaborate score is more comical than its pictorial inspiration. Some of the effects are quaint and droll, and unique tones are achieved by the employment of a vast assemblage of instruments, which includes among other things the tinkling celeste, and a grand pianoforte "with the lid raised." In this musical version there are a prologue and epilogue and seven "pranks."

Miss Culp is more generously endowed with vocal assets than her fellow-worker in the same field, the justly admired Elena Gerhardt, and she interprets her songs with equal charm, taste and poetic imagination. Hers was a thoroughly delightful contribution to the concert. She offered Schubert's music to three songs translated by Storch from Scott's "The Lady of the Lake," Wagner's enchantingly lovely "Traeume" and Beethoven's "Freudvoll und Liedvoll" and "Die Trommell gerduehret" from Goethe's "Egmont," with music by Beethoven. With the exception of "Traueme," all of these songs are seldom heard in this vicinity.

The orchestra, which was in brilliant form, played Goldmark's sunny overture, "Im Fruehling" and Dukas' daintily whimsical "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

From BULLET[illegible]
Address PHILADELPHIA,
Date MAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Closing Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music

One of the largest audiences that have assembled for any musical performance this season greeted Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. The concert marked the closing of the orchestra's twenty-eighth season in Philadelphia, and was attended by an audience which, in size and general aspect, had every appearance of an opening night at the opera.

The program Dr. Muck had arranged for the closing concert was one made up entirely of modern compositions, with the exception of two songs by Beethoven, and one of the numbers was a distinct novelty never before heard in this city. This was the symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," written by Josef Gustav Mraczek, a composer of Brunn, of whom little is known. Mraczek was trained as a violinist and began his musical studies with his father, a 'cellist. After finishing his studies he made concert tours and then settled down in Brunn to compose. Among his works are two operas, a pianoforte quintet, incidental music to the drama "Kismet," and several small pieces for violin and pianoforte. The "Max and Moritz" burleske deals with the pranks of two mischievous boys told of in a collection of tales by Wilhelm Busch, written for the amusement of German children. The work is in nine movements, each of which is intended to picture one of the pranks of the two boys. It is dedicated to Richard Strauss and is written in the same vein as that master's "Till Eulenspiegal." The composition requires an enormous orchestra, and calls for a triangle, cymbals, glockenspiel, celesta, and piano, besides the usual array of instruments. Many of the grotesque idioms employed by Strauss are used, while in parts the work degenerates from musical portrayal into ordinary descriptive sound, particularly where the composer trys to imitate the crowing of chickens, the quacking of geese and kindred noises. The composition is very difficult and although a flawless interpretation was given to it under Dr. Muck's careful direction, it could be seen that the audience applauded for the work of the orchestra and not for the composition itself.

The soloist was Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzo-soprano, who has been charming audiences in New York and throughout the east during the present season. Miss Culp has a full, rich voice which has been perfectly trained. She [illegible] the famous song-writers with genuine expression, while her enunciation and tone are always clear and intelligible. She also has a charming personality which wins audiences much in the same manner as that of Madam Schumann-Heinck. She is always smiling, whenever a smile does not interfere with her work, is perfectly at home on the platform, and sings artistically and with taste. Last night she sang two songs by Beethoven, three by Schubert, and one by Wagner. All of them were well done, but if any stood out from the others, it was Wagner's ineffably beautiful "Traume," with its reminders of "Tristan und Isolda." Schubert's "Jager, rhue von der Jagd," and "Ave Maria" were also poetically rendered. Miss Culp won her audience after the first song and all of her work was loudly applauded. The third Schubert song was "Raste, Krieger," and the two of Beethoven were "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," and "Die Trommel geruhret."

Besides the Mraczek number the purely orchestral part of the program comprised the "Mephisto Waltz" from Lenau's

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MAR 21 1913

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Da

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Carl Fique Analyzes Programme to Be Played at the Academy.

Carl Fique gave, yesterday afternoon in the lecture hall of the Academy, the closing lecture recital of the season on the programme of the Philharmonic concert. Omitting the "'Cello Concerto," which Otto Urack will play, he took the purely orchestral numbers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the opera house of the Academy this evening. Both the lecture recital and concert are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. After a brief consideration of Dukas' "L 'Apprenti Sorcier," which is to be the closing number tonight, Mr. Fique made thematic study of MacDowell's "Orchestral Suite in E-minor," No. 2, Opus 48, which is the "Indian" suite. It was composed in 1891-92, and was dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its then conductor, Emil Paur. It will be remembered that its thematic material was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies.

Mr. Fique then spoke of the numerous compositions nowadays which are built on Indian melodies, and said that when as a boy he read and enjoyed stories about the Indians he frequently saw this phrase, "There is no good Indian but a dead Indian." He gathers the impression now that, "having made the most of the Indians' 'good,' we are putting up monuments in their honor in these compositions."

Wagner's "A 'Faust' Overture," which belongs in the first period of his composing, though it was written shortly after his "Rienzi," which is considered its close, was played by Mr. Fique, after he had given it the usual detail study. He named the themes "the philosopher," "the woman—or the ideal—a theme which sounds like the great composer, the Wagner of the third period of composition," he said in playing it, and "the longing." The last is, note for note, a theme in "Tristan." The two subsidiary themes were found to express "desire for happi-

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 22 1913
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

A loud crash coming at the end of Dukas' "L' Apprenti Sorcier" closed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy last night and brought its season here to an end. The crash followed a long, monotonous passage and came abruptly, with startling effect.

Those who regard the composer as a musical joke began to laugh; those who regard him as a musical madman, showed their disgust; those who confessedly could not understand his musical idiom were mystified. The Dukas admirers, however, were obviously delighted at the artistry displayed in creating a weird, uncanny, goblinish atmosphere for Gotehe's ballad, "Der Zauberlehrling."

The ballad tells of a sorcerer's apprentice, who changes a broom into a human being to do his bidding and makes the animate broom do his work, carrying pails of water to the house. The apprentice forgets the words of the charm and the house is almost flooded when he suddenly remembers them. "The broom," as a programme note explained, "flies to its corner and is quiet."

The crash at the end apparently was the flying broom. It was perhaps unfortunate that a number which inspired such mixed feelings should have been chosen by Dr. Muck to close the last concert of his orchestra here. The loud laughter, with an undercurrent of subdued hissing, the enthusiastic applause, and the mute indifference of most of the audience, made a most unusual scene at a Boston Symphony concert.

The main theme of the composition is repeated over and over again with insistance and its monotony creates an unusual effect. It was written as a tone poem of mystery, in accordance with the idiom of the Debussy school. The composer, whose "Ariane et Barbe Bleu" had but a brief existence at the Metropolitan Opera last season, despite the charm of Miss Farrar's performance as Blue Beard's wife, is able to create an atmosphere in music, but his work is of a rare sort—caviare to the general. It is doubtful if such music will ever achieve popularity or lasting success.

Another composer on last night's programme whose work was called to public attention by the advertisement of a production at the Metropolitan was Eugen d'Alber. His "Tiefland" opera, founded on the Spanish drama, "Marta of the Lowlands," had a short career. Last night Otto Urack, one of the regular 'cellists of the orchestra, appeared as a soloist and played the Scotch-German composer's concerto in C major, Opus 20, ofr violincello.

The concerto proved to be a somewhat stupid affair, but it served to show Mr. Urack as a player, of capable if not distinguished qualities. He was received with enthusiastic applause and recalled several times.

The concert opened with MacDowell's "Indian Suite." It is a powerful and poetic series of six pictures, which display the individual and imaginative qualities of the most veristic musical genius America has produced. American composers are heard on concert programmes far too seldom.

The other number was Wagner's "Faust" overture, heard earlier in the season at the Philharmonic and New York Symphony's Wagner Memorial concerts.

It was not played in the same distinguished manner, however, that marked its rendition last night. The pure singing tone of the orchestra and the readings of Dr. Muck, marked by a high quality of imagination and subtle insight, make an interpretation by the Boston Symphony a constant delight.

Newspaper Cutting

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date MAR 1913
Established:

Dr. Muck Ends His Season with Comic Symphony

Burlesque of Dr. Strauss' Tone Poems Feature of Boston Orchestra's Last Concert.

What Messrs. Weber and Fields are to polite drama Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Orchestra were to symphonic music yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Music Hall, at their last concert of the season in New York. They presented a symphonic burlesque written by Mr. Mraczek, a Polish composer, to glorify the antics and escapades of "Max und Moritz," impish lads of pictorial fiction drawn by Mr. Wilhelm Busch, one of Germany's leading humorous illustrators. It was the first performance of the jocular work in New York.

It was a concert of merry mood throughout. It began with Sinding's first symphony, of vigorous color and broad melody, and ended with Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

To the audience this lapse of the sedate orchestra from dignity was most delightful and the applause was of that spontaneous character that is provoked by humor. The burlesque symphony was wonderfully and weirdly performed. It follows closely the structure of the tone poems of Dr. Richard Strauss, which seem to be favorites with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mraczek has overlooked no instrument and no effect in his score. The composition calls for glockenspiel, piano and harp in addition to the usual instruments and keeps the horn players busy putting in and removing the mutes. There are agile and prankish passages for piccolo and bassoon and phrases of dainty melody treading on one another's heels, as it were. Added to all this was the spirit of dignity making merry, as exemplified by Dr. Muck and his players.

"Max und Moritz" was followed by Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" and Dukas' scherzo, which was as delightful as Mr. Mrascek's work, for, while no less merry, it gave the audience an impression of better form and conception. Also, the basson had more of an opportunity to play the buffoon, which was as it ought to be on such a spring afternoon.

From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 22 1913
Date
Estab

BOSTON PLAYERS' FINAL CONCERT

Dr. Muck's Men at the Academy of Music.

'CELLIST OTTO URACK APPEARS AS SOLOIST

Splendid Playing of Concerto by D'Albert, MacDowell "Indian" Suite, Wagner and Dukas Compositions.

Dr. Carl Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra made their season's farewell at the Academy of Music last night. And, as if to show us that in addition to its wonderful ensemble, it had some exceptional virtuosi in its personnel, Dr. Muck presented Otto Urack, first 'cellist, as soloist.

It must be said, however, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented more interesting and artistic programmes than the one last evening. It was evidently Dr. Muck's idea to give a "novelty evening," as the MacDowell "Indian Suite" and "L'Appenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) by Paul Ducas, were distinctive novelties to Brooklyn audiences of the past few seasons.

The MacDowell Suite, a collection of Iroquois, Chippewa and Dakota Indian chants, love songs, dirges, war and scalp dances, is a really beautiful piece of orchestral writing, at times displaying exquisite tone-color effects.

With the exception of the opening measures of the first part, "Legend," which calls for a passage for the horns, the suite was wonderfully performed by this master aggregation of musicians. The horns, which hardly had time to warm up, played entirely out of tune during the greater part of this first movement.

The "Faust" overture, written by Wagner, in Paris, in 1839, which we are told is supposedly the first movement to a "Faust" Symphony which the composer had in mind, suffers greatly in comparison with the master's later works, both as to melodic finish and fullness of orchestration. But it was much appreciated, judging from the volume of applause it evoked. Although it is merely a fragment of what might have been a great work, it was more acceptable than some of the works of our so-called "modernists."

It is seldom in these days of dearth of 'cellist soloists that we have had the pleasure of hearing so sterling a performer as Mr. Urack.

This young man, who acts as assistant conductor of the orchestra, and who, although only 29 years of age, was first conductor of the Municipal Theatre at Barmen, Germany, and was promoted to the position of conductor at the Royal Opera, at Berlin, played the Concerto in C major, by Eugen D'Albert, the celebrated composer-pianist. He showed a wealth of luscious tone, exceptional elasticity of bowing and splendid execution. In addition to this, his double-stopping—an almost insurmountable obstacle for many 'cellists—was dazzling. He received an ovation after his number.

The concert concluded with the "Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, which the composer calls an orchestral scherzo. It is a number of the modern French school, which makes free use of the whole-tone scale, and the principal theme reminds one of the lilt that the little boys shout in the streets to keep time with a pedestrian's stride which is unusually pronounced or heavy on the pavement. It was superbly rendered and greatly pleased the capacity audience present.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 22 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last Concert in a Remarkably Good Programme, and With Otto Urack as 'Cello Virtuoso.

Many atmospheres in music pervaded the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening, when Dr. Muck brought his men for, be it said with regret, the last Boston Symphony concert for this season. Notwithstanding the day on the church calendar there was a very large attendance. For American, aboriginal atmosphere there was, for the opening number, the MacDowell "Orchestral Suite in E Minor." MacDowell is the only composer who has brought into adequate musical form a musical picture of the native Indian. Grieg, in the "New World" symphony, was inspired partly by the grandeur of the American forests and by teh almost illimitable vastness of the Western country and partly by the negro music of the South; but MacDowell, without attempting to copy individual character in Indian music, as have Mr. Cadman and other composers, succeeded in giving the very breath of the spirit of the Indian nature and daily existence. He took notice, indeed, of what sparse material he could find, especially in the most favored instruments employed by early Indian musicians, and also of the modes in the limited scale which they used. So it was something like genius in the composer to adopt at the beginning movement "legend" the minor key relative to the G Major, which was the key almost universally used in song. It served to voice the plaintive lament, native to the Indian. The second movement, "love song," was tenderly given and in it MacDowell wrote like an American Debussy, so far as suavity is concerned but without the indefiniteness of Debussy. The "in war time" movement, under Dr. Muck's classic baton, while it was not without decision, was scarcely so savagely sent forth as the composer had indicated; but in the "dirge" his directing was not to be surpassed. And the same should be said of the "village festival" movement, swift and light and yet instinct with barbarity in its fun-making.

Otto Urack,

Virtuoso on the 'Cello, Who Played Last Evening With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

In Eugen d'Albert's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra" appeared Otto Urack as solo 'cellist, who came with an enviable reputation, for in the municipal theater in Barmen he produced almost all of Wagner's operas as well as Strauss' "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosencavalier." In the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth he was long the chief 'cellist. The number was, in the spirit that both Mr. Urack and Dr. Muck gave it, a long and beautiful meditation, the 'cellist proving himself to be without doubt a virtuoso of the finest caliber. Alwyn Schroeder, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, who played the concerto on its first production in Boston, in 1901, may have given it with more vigor in the "allegro vivace" movement, but as a whole he could scarcely have contributed so much poetry and beauty of sentiment as did Mr. Urack. The soloist has much extremely difficult work to do, especially in "allegro" in the first movement, and Mr. Urack rose to the occasion with ease, while his tone was always soft and mellow. Great applause followed the number and the 'cellist was summoned again and again to respond. That he severed a contract in Europe in order to join the Boston Symphony is something for music lovers to rejoice over, for he is a decidedly fortunate addition to its ranks.

"A Faust Overture," by Richard Wagner, showed little of the Wagner of the great operas, and yet the master's hand was felt in the use of the themes, in the logical development of them and in the unity of the composition. It was tempered finely, too, by Dr. Muck's discriminating baton, and full effect was given in depicting the soul of Faust, weary of life and yet struggling up and on to meet succeeding struggles to which mankind is born. For a close to the concert there was Paul Dukas' rollicking mystic "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Here Dukas is, as he is in the opera, "Barbe Bleue," accustomed to use dissonance, but here discords were positively delightful, for they belong to the atmosphere. And there were not too many of them, for they were tucked with great skill into the warp and woof of the composition, with its strange concatenation of orchestral effects. [illegible] it was with a snap that the last concert by the Boston Symphony was brought to a close. There was frequent applause for the orchestra and for Dr. Muck.

The [illegible] Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date MAR 23 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Musical Joke on a Musical Joker.

It is probable, at least, that Dr. Muck indulged in a Mephistophelian smile, which would much befit him, when he arranged the programme for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave under his direction in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. After Sinding's symphony in D minor, which we have been inclined to receive seriously and admire because of its obvious sincerity, Dr. Muck gave us a novelty in the shape of a symphonic piece by a Bohemian composer named Mraczek. It was frankly announced on the programme as a "burlesque" after the famous comic stories and pictures by Wilhelm Busch entitled "Max und Moritz," but, as was intimated by the genial Mr. Hale in his programme notes, the joke went further than that. Mr. or Herr or Pan Mraczek's music is an elaborate joke on Richard Strauss, to whom it professes to be "reverentially" dedicated. If it has any purpose in this world it is to poke fun at that musician, whom, it must be confessed, a large part of the world is inclined to think of (as another large part thinks of the cubists in painting) as habitually occupying the attitude attributed to some of the ancient oracles—with his tongue in his cheek.

Herr Strauss wrote a capital bit of humorous music—perhaps the best thing he has ever done—and called it after Till Eulenspiegel. His reverent or irreverent imitator has written another piece scarcely less comical, but far less clever, and has called it "Max und Moritz." If it were not so obviously farcical the composition might call into court for judgment the whole question of the limitations of music and the boundaries of the programmatic art. Can music, or ought it, attempt to describe four fowls pulling at as many ends of an interknotted string? Can music depict the theft of the roasted fowls by means of line and hook let down the chimney? Can music describe how a plank bridge was weakened by sawing so that a would-be passenger over it was plunged into a brook? Can music tell of the troubles caused to a sleepy man by bugs surreptitiously inserted in his bed? Granted that since all German village schoolmasters sit on the organ bench in church on Sundays, must we recognize that a fugue may be used under circumstances to characterize a village schoolmaster? Is it a likely procedure in America, where village schoolmasters do not play the organ on Sundays? And so on, and so on. To enjoy fully the music which Dr. Muck gave us yesterday it was necessary to know all about the amusing pranks of Max and Moritz and to believe that they can be portrayed, or suggested, by devices familiar to composers. That knowledge was the possession, possibly, of a few score of the listeners. Why, then, was so much time sacrificed which might have been made enjoyable to the many? Only a few score appreciated and enjoyed the joke on Strauss. But for these it was a joke brilliantly carried out.

The other numbers, besides the symphony already mentioned, were Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier"—two other musical jokes. Evidently Dr. Muck is a humorist.

H. E. K.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 22 1913

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

MacDowell's Indian Suite Splendidly Played—Otto Urack, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and concluding concert in the Brooklyn series for the present season in the Academy of Music last night. The programme offered by Dr. Carl Muck was both brilliant and interesting.

MacDowell's beautiful orchestral Indian Suite was the principal number. It is a composition which grows steadily in favor—a composition which, aside from its intrinsic interest as a dignity and high musical excellence, has a great significance, for the composer himself is authority for the statement that its thematic material was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies.

It was especially well played, with the perfection of ensemble and unanimity of sentiment always to be counted upon in this body of players. The pianissimos were of an ethereal tone, spun to an elusive fineness. In virile quality there was not less to admire, and between the extremes were innumerable nuances of color and sentiment.

The tender grace and idyllic beauty of the second movement, "The Love Song," and the war-like elemental savagery of the third movement, "In War Time," afforded opportunity for the revelation of stirring contracts in treatment. These two were noteworthy features in a performance in itself noteworthy. The dirge was given hardly less satisfying.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Duka's robustly humorous orchestral scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," were the other orchestral numbers. The latter in particular was rendered with great spirit.

Otto Urack, member of the orchestra, was the soloist of the occasion, playing Eugen d'Albert's Concerto in C major for violoncello. The three connected movements which compose the work afford ample opportunity for both soloist and orchestra. Mr. Urack's performance was successful in high degree, winning warm recognition, not only for the virtuosic qualities he displayed, but for his beauty of

---

Newspaper

From AMERICAN

Address: New York

Date 13

BOSTON SYMPHONY RIDICULES STRAUSS

Clever Burlesque of His Tone Poem, "Don Quixote," Given in Final Concert.

Yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was the final appearance for the season of that admirable aggregation of musicians. There was no soloist, but the programme was of such a varied and unusual character that an assisting artist was not missed.

Although an important work of Sinding's—his First Symphony—appeared on the programme interest centred in the "Symphonic Burleske for Grand Orchestra" by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a comparatively unknown writer. This composer, evidently impressed by the daring and assuranc of Srauss's musical writings, has undertaken to burlesque that revolutionary. In Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," orchestral instruments are expected to portray the swishing of the horse's tail or the flash of a lady's eye.

Mr. Mraczek takes the Wilhelm Busch Story, "Max and Moritz" (evidently the prototype of Hans and Fritz Katzenjammer), and sets a number of their mischievous pranks to dissonances, undoubtedly poking fun at Strauss meanwhile. The boys, so runs the programme description, tie crusts to strings and coax the Widow Bolte's chickens to swallow the pieces. There is a theme announcing the Widows' appearance, followed by a mixture of sounds supposed to represent the flopping fowls.

The "Symphonic Burleske" was a real body-blow to the Strauss "tone poem" idea.

Dr. Muck and his musicians presented the freakish eccentricities of the work with a true appreciation of their meanings and humor.

The Sinding Symphony gave opportunities for superior musicianship that were realized to their utmost.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From WORLD

Address: New York MAR 2

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Farewell Concert in Which New Work Is Played.

That superlatively fine organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left New York after its matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme was not wholly satisfying, a fact noticeable on other occasions when the visiting musicians have been heard in this city under Karl Muck's direction.

Nevertheless, there was much sincere applause, some of it bestowed by the thousands present who were sorry no more concerts are to be offered until next autumn.

While the important composition of the afternoon was the Sinding first symphony in D minor, the novelty proved to be a symphonic burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, introduced for its initial hearing. This work is a descriptive piece based on incidents from a volume of children's sketches written by William Busch that were originally published in the early sixties. It is in seven movements, each illustrating through music some bit of mischief-making of Max and Moritz—and a prologue and epilogue.

The composer is thirty-five years old, a resident of Brunn, and he is a musician of mature powers and genuine gifts. He has succeeded admirably in imparting a real comedy spirit to his composition, but it is doubtful if the imagination could accurately classify the qualities which the music is intended to convey if written programme notes were not available to make these qualities clear.

Mr. Mraczek composes with facility, he is fond of modern dissonances and his instrumentation is varied and well colored. One of the finest moments is in the epilogue, where, in a musical recapitulation, his measures are melodiously original and effectively scored.

This number was played with appropriate spirit, fine tone and technical skill, as was the symphony, Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust" and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas. Dr. Muck's readings were scholarly and the responsiveness of his musicians provided much in the way of finished interpretation.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 22 1913
Dat

Est 384

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last Concert in a Remarkably Good Programme, and With Otto Urack as 'Cello Virtuoso.

Many atmospheres in music pervaded the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening, when Dr. Muck brought his men for, be it said with regret, the last Boston Symphony concert for this season. Notwithstanding the day on the church calendar there was a very large attendance. For American, aboriginal atmosphere there was, for the opening number, the MacDowell "Orchestral Suite in E Minor." MacDowell is the only composer who has brought into adequate musical form a musical picture of the native Indian. Grieg, in the "New World" symphony, was inspired partly by the grandeur of the American forests and by teh almost illimitable vastness of the Western country and partly by the negro music of the South; but MacDowell, without attempting to copy individual character in Indian music, as have Mr. Cadman and other composers, succeeded in giving the very breath of the spirit of the Indian nature and daily existence. He took notice, indeed, of what sparse material he could find, especially in the most favored instruments employed by early Indian musicians, and also of the modes in the limited scale which they used. So it was something like genius in

Otto Urack,

Virtuoso on the 'Cello, Who Played Last Evening With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

the composer to adopt at the beginning movement "legend" the minor key relative to the G Major, which was the key almost universally used in song. It served to voice the plaintive lament, native to the Indian. The second movement, "love song," was tenderly given and in it MacDowell wrote like an American Debussy, so far as suavity is concerned but without the indefiniteness of Debussy. The "in war time" movement, under Dr. Muck's classic baton, while it was not without decision, was scarcely so savagely sent forth as the composer had indicated; but in the "dirge" his directing was not to be surpassed. And the same should be said of the "village festival" movement, swift and light and yet instinct with barbarity in its fun-making.

In Eugen d'Albert's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra" appeared Otto Urack as solo 'cellist, who came with an enviable reputation, for in the municipal theater in Barmen he produced almost all of Wagner's operas as well as Strauss' "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosencavalier." In the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth he was long the chief 'cellist. The number was, in the spirit that both Mr. Urack and Dr. Muck gave it, a long and beautiful meditation, the 'cellist proving himself to be without doubt a virtuoso of the finest caliber. Alwyn Schroeder, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, who played the concerto on its first production in Boston, in 1901, may have given it with more vigor in the "allegro vivace" movement, but as a whole he could scarcely have contributed so much poetry and beauty of sentiment as did Mr. Urack. The soloist has much extremely difficult work to do, especially in "allegro" in the first movement, and Mr. Urack rose to the occasion with ease, while his tone was always soft and mellow. Great applause followed the number and the 'cellist was summoned again and again to respond. That he severed a contract in Europe in order to join the Boston Symphony is something for music lovers to rejoice over, for he is a decidedly fortunate addition to its ranks.

"A Faust Overture," by Richard Wagner, showed little of the Wagner of the great operas, and yet the master's hand was felt in the use of the themes, in the logical development of them and in the unity of the composition. It was tempered finely, too, by Dr. Muck's discriminating baton, and full effect was given in depicting the soul of Faust, weary of life and yet struggling up and on to meet succeeding struggles to which mankind is born. For a close to the concert there was Paul Dukas' rollicking mystic, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Here Dukas is, as he is in the opera, "Barbe Bleue," accustomed to use dissonance, but here discords were positively delightful, for they belong to the atmosphere. And there were not too many of them, for they were tucked with great skill into the warp and woof of the composition, with its strange concatenation of orchestral effects. [illegible] it was with a snap that the last concert by the Boston Symphony was brought to a close. There was frequent applause for the orchestra and for Dr. Muck.

The Newspaper Cutting Bure

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date MAR 23 1913

Estab

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Musical Joke on a Musical Joker.

It is probable, at least, that Dr. Muck indulged in a Mephistophelian smile, which would much befit him, when he arranged the programme for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave under his direction in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. After Sinding's symphony in D minor, which we have been inclined to receive seriously and admire because of its obvious sincerity, Dr. Muck gave us a novelty in the shape of a symphonic piece by a Bohemian composer named Mraczek. It was frankly announced on the programme as a "burlesque" after the famous comic stories and pictures by Wilhelm Busch entitled "Max und Moritz," but, as was intimated by the genial Mr. Hale in his programme notes, the joke went further than that. Mr. or Herr or Pan Mraczek's music is an elaborate joke on Richard Strauss, to whom it professes to be "reverentially" dedicated. If it has any purpose in this world it is to poke fun at that musician, whom, it must be confessed, a large part of the world is inclined to think of (as another large part thinks of the cubists in painting) as habitually occupying the attitude attributed to some of the ancient oracles—with his tongue in his cheek.

Herr Strauss wrote a capital bit of humorous music—perhaps the best thing he has ever done—and called it after Till Eulenspiegel. His reverent or irreverent imitator has written another piece scarcely less comical, but far less clever, and has called it "Max und Moritz." If it were not so obviously farcical the composition might call into court for judgment the whole question of the limitations of music and the boundaries of the programmatic art. Can music, or ought it, attempt to describe four fowls pulling at as many ends of an interknotted string? Can music depict the theft of the roasted fowls by means of line and hook let down the chimney? Can music describe how a plank bridge was weakened by sawing so that a would-be passenger over it was plunged into a brook? Can music tell of the troubles caused to a sleepy man by bugs surreptitiously inserted in his bed? Granted that since all German village schoolmasters sit on the organ bench in church on Sundays, must we recognize that a fugue may be used under circumstances to characterize a village schoolmaster? Is it a likely procedure in America, where village schoolmasters do not play the organ on Sundays? And so on, and so on. To enjoy fully the music which Dr. Muck gave us yesterday it was necessary to know all about the amusing pranks of Max and Moritz and to believe that they can be portrayed, or suggested, by devices familiar to composers. That knowledge was the possession, possibly, of a few score of the listeners. Why, then, was so much time sacrificed which might have been made enjoyable to the many? Only a few score appreciated and enjoyed the joke on Strauss. But for these it was a joke brilliantly carried out.

The other numbers, besides the symphony already mentioned, were Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier"—two other musical jokes. Evidently Dr. Muck is a humorist.

H. E. K.

Y.
2 1913

Es 188

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

MacDowell's Indian Suite Splendidly Played—Otto Urack, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and concluding concert in the Brooklyn series for the present season in the Academy of Music last night. The programme offered by Dr. Carl Muck was both brilliant and interesting.

MacDowell's beautiful orchestral Indian Suite was the principal number. It is a composition which grows steadily in favor—a composition which, aside from its intrinsic interest as a dignity and high musical excellence, has a great significance, for the composer himself is authority for the statement that its thematic material was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies.

It was especially well played, with the perfection of ensemble and unanimity of sentiment always to be counted upon in this body of players. The pianissimos were of an ethereal tone, spun to an elusive fineness. In virile quality there was not less to admire, and between the extremes were innumerable nuances of color and sentiment.

The tender grace and idyllic beauty of the second movement, "The Love Song," and the war-like elemental savagery of the third movement, "In War Time," afforded opportunity for the revelation of stirring contracts in treatment. These two were noteworthy features in a performance in itself noteworthy. The dirge was given hardly less satisfying.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Duka's robustly humorous orchestral scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," were the other orchestral numbers. The latter in particular was rendered with great spirit.

Otto Urack, member of the orchestra, was the soloist of the occasion, playing Eugen d'Albert's Concerto in C major for violoncello. The three connected movements which compose the work afford ample opportunity for both soloist and orchestra. Mr. Urack's performance was successful in high degree, winning warm recognition, not only for the virtuosic qualities he displayed, but for his beauty of

---

Newspape

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date 13

Estab 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY RIDICULES STRAUSS

Clever Burlesque of His Tone Poem, "Don Quixote," Given in Final Concert.

Yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was the final appearance for the season of that admirable aggregation of musicians. There was no soloist, but the programme was of such a varied and unusual character that an assisting artist was not missed.

Although an important work of Sinding's—his First Symphony—appeared on the programme interest centred in the "Symphonic Burleske for Grand Orchestra" by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a comparatively unknown writer. This composer, evidently impressed by the daring and assuranc of Srauss's musical writings, has undertaken to burlesque that revolutionary. In Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," orchestral instruments are expected to portray the swishing of the horse's tail or the flash of a lady's eye.

Mr. Mraczek takes the Wilhelm Busch Story, "Max and Moritz" (evidently the prototype of Hans and Fritz Katzenjammer), and sets a number of their mischievous pranks to dissonances, undoubtedly poking fun at Strauss meanwhile. The boys, so runs the programme description, tie crusts to strings and coax the Widow Bolte's chickens to swallow the pieces. There is a theme announcing the Widows' appearance, followed by a mixture of sounds supposed to represent the flopping fowls.

The "Symphonic Burleske" was a real body-blow to the Strauss "tone poem" idea.

Dr. Muck and his musicians presented the freakish eccentricities of the work with a true appreciation of their meanings and humor.

The Sinding Symphony gave opportunities for superior musicianship that were realized to their utmost.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From WORLD
Address: New York MAR 23
Date

Establ 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Farewell Concert in Which New Work Is Played.

That superlatively fine organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left New York after its matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme was not wholly satisfying, a fact noticeable on other occasions when the visiting musicians have been heard in this city under Karl Muck's direction.

Nevertheless, there was much sincere applause, some of it bestowed by the thousands present who were sorry no more concerts are to be offered until next autumn.

While the important composition of the afternoon was the Sinding first symphony in D minor, the novelty proved to be a symphonic burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, introduced for its initial hearing. This work is a descriptive piece based on incidents from a volume of children's sketches written by William Busch that were originally published in the early sixties. It is in seven movements, each illustrating through music some bit of mischief-making of Max and Moritz—and a prologue and epilogue.

The composer is thirty-five years old, a resident of Brunn, and he is a musician of mature powers and genuine gifts. He has succeeded admirably in imparting a real comedy spirit to his composition, but it is doubtful if the imagination could accurately classify the qualities which the music is intended to convey if written programme notes were not available to make these qualities clear.

Mr. Mraczek composes with facility, he is fond of modern dissonances and his instrumentation is varied and well colored. One of the finest moments is in the epilogue, where, in a musical recapitulation, his measures are melodiously original and effectively scored.

This number was played with appropriate spirit, fine tone and technical skill, as was the symphony, Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust" and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas. Dr. Muck's readings were scholarly and the responsiveness of his musicians provided much in the way of finished interpretation.

Newspaper

From SUN
Address: New York
Date 23 1913
Establ

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Symphonic Burlesque Produced at Last Matinee.

The fifth and last afternoon concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Sinding's symphony in D minor, No. 1; Josef Gustav Mraczek's symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz;" Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The novelty of the occasion was the composition of Mr. Mraczek, a work which was first made known by the Musik Verein of Bruenn, the composer's native city and present home, in 1911. Its first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra on December 20, 1912.

The subject of the composition is a series of humorous sketches for children entitled "Max und Moritz, eine Bubengeschichte in sieben Streichen," by Wilhelm Busch. It was published in Munich in the early '60s and is now in its sixty-first edition. Its humor is essentially German and it relies for praise chiefly on the pictures, which are full of character. They belong to that line of rollicking creations which have made the worldwide fame of Der Fliegende Blaetter and Simplicissimus.

Max and Moritz are two boys who are incarnations of mischief. They keep their village in a perpetual state of turmoil with their pranks. First they tie four pieces of bread together with crossed strings to tempt the innocent pet chickens of the Widow Bolte. The chickens swallow the bait and then in their struggles to free themselves tangle the string over a tree limb and hang themselves.

The weeping widow determines as an economical Hausfrau that she must eat them. Having put them on the hearth to fry she descends for a few moments to her cellar. The boys are on her roof with fish hook and line and they draw the chickens up through the chimney. The widow, finding that they have disappeared beats her poor innocent dog, while the boys repair to the woods and stuff themselves into torpor.

The second exploit is the sawing of a plank over a brook, whereby a highly respected tailor is plunged into cold water and rescued by two geese. He is so chilled that his wife has to thaw him out by ironing him as if he were linen. Then comes schoolmaster Lampel as a victim. His pipe is stuffed with powder and blows up. Pretty cheap fun, that. Uncle Fritz comes on a visit and the boys put beetles in his bed. Uproarious, isn't it? Now comes Easter and music finds her chance with a choral. This time the boys fall into a vat of dough in a baker's and are cooked, but eat their way out of the dough and escape. This is more like real fun and the pictures are sidesplitting. But Mraczek cannot compose them.

At last the two boys go into Farmer Meck's barn and make holes in the corn bags so that the corn runs out. The farmer catches them, puts them in a bag and takes them to the mill, where they are ground into duck food. After this there is an epilogue in which certain reflections are published.

The composition is dedicated to Richard Strauss and is obviously an attempt to create a second "Til Eulenspiegel," but it lacks the humor and the music of that wonderfully clever sketch. It is by no means without real merit, however, nor is it without a good share of musical humor. The composer has shown originality in his instrumental devices, especially in his treatment of the celesta, which plays a very important part in the tone painting. Piano and harp are also used with great skill and naturally mutes bob in and out of the brass instruments from trumpets to tuba with unceasing activity.

But when the thing is done no firm impression remains. Too many things have been attempted and music has been asked to say things which are not in her language. Wilhelm Busch's pictures are infinitely more humorous and characteristic than anything in this composition, despite the fact that they consist only of a few free lines and some thin, flat washes.

Address New York City.
Date MAR 23 1913
Est. 1884

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Academy of Music last Friday evening. The soloist was Otto Urack, the distinguished 'cellist, and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who was heard in this capacity in Brooklyn for the first time. Mr. Urack as a 'cellist, as a composer and as a conductor is one of the greatest students among the younger men of today, and his engagement by the Boston Symphony was in line with its policy to bring to this country only great talents. He played Albert's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major. The principal orchestral number on the programme was Edward MacDowell's Orchestral Suite in E minor called "Indian." Dr. Muck is a great admirer of the suite as a whole and he regards the "Dirge" as one of the finest things in the literature of music. With him the playing of this MacDowell Suite is always a labor of love. The other numbers were Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Dukas's brilliant scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme in its proper order was as follows:

MacDowell Orchestral Suite in E minor, No. 2 "Indian," Op. 48.

Wagner, "A Faust Overture."

D'Albert, concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major, op. 20.

Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date 913
Established:

PRANKS OF 2 BOYS AS SERIOUS MUSIC

"Max und Moritz" Played Here by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MRACZEK CHOOSES UNUSUAL THEME

Dr. Karl Muck Conducts Last Concert of Season in Carnegie Hall.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert in New York this season, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Dr. Karl Muck, dispensing once more with the services of a soloist, cast before his audience a composition new to this city, though already produced by him last week in the Hub and by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra on December 20, 1912, in Chicago. The work was Josef Gustav Mraczek's Symphonic Burlesque after "Max und Moritz," based on seven "pranks" by those two rascally youngsters as immortalized in the sketches of Wilhelm Busch, and it proved to be a very extraordinary and highly unimportant contribution to the literature of modern orchestral music.

Mraczek has dedicated his "Burleske" to Dr. Richard Strauss "with the utmost respect," and no doubt he had a lot of ponderous fun in applying that composer's idiom to his elephantine joke. To accomplish the end he had in view he utilized a gigantic orchestral instrument which includes kettledrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, castanets, a concert grand pianoforte (with lid raised) and a celesta. With this apparatus he evolves a set of striking pictures, easy enough to understand with the aid of a descriptive programme. The boy terrors are introduced in the prologue by a theme that illustrates their "high spirits." Soon we discover that they are occupied with Widow Bolte's chickens, whose cackling in the wood-wind cannot be mistaken. Attentive ears may even catch a suggestion of the final duties performed so pathetically by the three strangling hens.

After the poor widow has expressed her sorrow in the melancholy song of a clarinet and has prepared her pets for cooking we hear the fowl sizzling in the frying-pan. Suddenly, a glissando of harp, celesta and piano apprises us that Max and Moritz are drawing the savory quartet up the chimney on fishing lines.

Next we meet the amusing tailor Boeck and witness aurally how he is dumped into the stream, much to the wicked joy of his tormenters. Then we hear schoolmaster Laempel playing a fugue on the organ and the explosion of the pipe he is smoking so peacefully after his manual exaction causes a tremendous din in the orchestra.

Wierdly effective is the passage that illustrates the activities of the busy beetles, placed in the bed of Uncle Fritz, who is just preparing for a good night's rest, and the old Easter choral, "Christ ist erstanden," which opens the "Prank" in the bakery shop, is an episode of real beauty. But the composition as a whole, though it revealed Mraczek's orchestral technique in a brilliant light and gave Dr. Muck's musicians an opportunity to exult in their virtuoso accomplishments, is out of all proportion to the subject on which it is based. Surely Mraczek's gifts could be used to better advantage. But he typifies the sophisticated tendencies of German art.

The matinee opened with Sinding's symphony in D minor, No. 1, which provided more enjoyment than any other work on the programme. Surely Dr. Muck could have made better selections, however, to round out the afternoon than Liszt's "Waltz in the Village Tavern," which he read in a manner surprisingly rigid, colorless and dry, and Dukas's scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." Both are interesting pieces in their way. But Mraczek's "Max and Moritz" furnished quite enough of the grotesque for a single concert.

MAX SMITH.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date MA
Est.

LOEFFLER MUSIC GIVES PLEA

His "Pagan Poem" Play Again With Succes Boston Orchestra

ANTON WITEK SOL

The Concert Master of the Organization Is Heard in Brahms Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruehling"; Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets; the Brahms violin concerto and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. The pianist was Heinrich Gebhard of Boston, who has officiated in other performances of Mr. Loeffler's composition.

The "Pagan Poem" was last heard here on January 30, 1910, when it was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch at the New Theatre (now the Century). Those were strenuous days in the realm of music, for on the following evening Richard Strauss's "Elektra" was produced at the Manhattan Theatre under the management of Oscar Hammerstein. It need hardly be said that in propinquity to this remarkable struggle of music for existence Mr. Loeffler's paganism was like the breath of violets.

One of Virgil's eclogues suggested the composition to Mr. Loeffler, who lives not far from Harvard University and roams easily in classic shades. The story is of a young woman whose recreant lover lingers too long in the white light district of a distant city. So she makes libations to the gods, burns incense and, best of all, sings and bids her songs draw Daphnis back to her. The three trumpets sound off the stage and they draw nearer and nearer as the foolish Daphnis is lured by the songs, and in the end they unite with the swelling peal of his triumphant welcome to the longing arms.

It was worth while to hear the composition again. Mr. Loeffler, as music lovers know, is a disciple of the contemporaneous French school, and he leans strongly toward the style of Debussy. Although he sacrifices much for the sake of this, he nevertheless has a rich vein of originality. His "Pagan Poem" is a full blooded piece of writing and it publishes moods which are communicative.

The hopes of the maiden of Thessaly run high, they sink to doubt, they rise again, and are finally blessed with brilliant realiation. The instrumental plan of the composition is striking and while the piano almost rises to the postion of a solo instrument, it never steps quite out of the picture. Its value in providing a rich texture of exotic scale passages is unquestionable.

The brief prominence of the English horn is admirably introduced and the three trumpets speak with vigor. It is not unlikely, however, that most music lovers would find more conviction in the work were it more compact. It was warmly applauded last evening and the composer, who sat in a box, was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times.

The Brahms violin concerto was placed on the programme to enable Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, to appear as a sole performer. Mr. Witek has been heard in the same capacity before, but he did not then gain as much sound approval as he did last evening. His playing of the Brahms music was praiseworthy. It had clarity and beauty of tone, accuracy of intonation, skill in technic and musical judgment to commend it.

The playing of the orchestra, as usual, was something to remember with delight. A flexible and temperamental instrument is this aggregation from Boston and he who plays upon it with a little baton is a past master of his art. Such an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity and of fine intelligence and commanding enthusiasm in conducting as that presented in the "Pagan Poem" was inspiring.

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date MAR 23 1913
Established:

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CLOSES SEASON HERE

Burlesque of Strauss's Programme in a Selection of Modern Music.

PLAYS SINDING'S SYMPHONY

The Burlesque Proves a Humorous Parody on the Works of the Vienna Composer.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and was devoted, like the evening concert on Thursday, to music of the modern composers. The symphony was Christian Sinding's in D minor, a work that has endured longer than many modern ones, and has been oftener played. The Philharmonic Society first gave it in New York in 1894, under Seidl's direction, and it had been heard the year before in Chicago under Thomas's; it has had several performances in Boston.

It bears repetition well; if it is not wholly original in its substance, it is yet strong and vigorous music, with the youthful vigor of the North. It has well defined and easily grasped themes, which are developed sometimes at greater length than their intrinsic importance seems to warrant, and its rhythms are strongly marked. The influence of Wagner is pronounced, especially in the first movement. There are passages which are reminiscent of "Götterdämmerung" and of the forging scene in "Siegfried"; and yet these are more in feeling and color than in definite and tangible appropriations. There is a Norse influence in this music that is unmistakable.

A novelty on the programme was a "symphonic burlesque," after Wilhelm Busch's inimitable German tale of the naughty boys, Max and Moritz. It is by one Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a name not easily grasped and not hitherto known in New York, and yet, as his composition attested, a musician of very considerable attainments.

The piece is dedicated "with the utmost respect" to Richard Strauss; whether the music shows so much respect as the dedication might be questioned, for it is an elaborate burlesque of Dr. Strauss's conceptions of programme music and his embodiment of them in his symphonic poems, especially his later ones. Mr. Mraczek has used quite as formidable an instrumental apparatus as his model, including most of the known orchestral instruments, and his jest is on a most elaborate scale. It consists of a prologue, seven pranks, and an epilogue. The substance of these is carefully detailed in the programme notes, and the listener is expected to follow them in the approved manner, and, of course, also to enjoy the composition purely as music.

It may be said that Mr. Mraczek has shown a good deal of humorous appreciation of the points that lend themselves to burlesque in the later period of Strauss's music, as well as skill in carrying out his conceit. He has used all the portentious volume of sound, the strained and unnatural instrumental cackle, the imitative noises, the large number and elaborate combinations of representative themes, the bruising discords, the sudden contrasts between passages of cacophony, and more or less commonplace and mellifluous melody that concertgoers by this time know very well in Strauss's tonal picturings.

It has been said that nothing is easier than to parody a masterpiece, but leaving aside the question whether in this instance masterpieces are parodied it takes a highly developed skill to write for orchestra as Mr. Mraczek has done in this composition, whether for serious or humorous purposes. And while this burlesque may not convulse the listener with laughter, striking him under the fifth rib, it will give amusement and the pleasurable stimulation that comes from a really witty performance to those who are sufficiently familiar with the subject to appreciate all the good points that have been made. To others it will afford amusement for what it is. Dr. Muck and his men played it brilliantly and most effectively—and it is a very difficult joke.

The other modern pieces on the programme, also in an ironical or humorous vein, were Liszt's glittering "Mephisto Waltz" and Paul Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," both of which are well known.

Newspaper

From SUN
Address: New York
Date 23 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Symphonic Burlesque Produced at Last Matinee.

The fifth and last afternoon concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Sinding's symphony in D minor, No. 1; Josef Gustav Mraczek's symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz;" Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The novelty of the occasion was the composition of Mr. Mraczek, a work which was first made known by the Musik Verein of Bruenn, the composer's native city and present home, in 1911. Its first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra on December 20, 1912.

The subject of the composition is a series of humorous sketches for children entitled "Max und Moritz, eine Bubengeschichte in sieben Streichen," by Wilhelm Busch. It was published in Munich in the early '60s and is now in its sixty-first edition. Its humor is essentially German and it relies for praise chiefly on the pictures, which are full of character. They belong to that line of rollicking creations which have made the worldwide fame of Der Fliegende Blaetter and Simplicissimus.

Max and Moritz are two boys who are incarnations of mischief. They keep their village in a perpetual state of turmoil with their pranks. First they tie four pieces of bread together with crossed strings to tempt the innocent pet chickens of the Widow Bolte. The chickens swallow the bait and then in their struggles to free themselves tangle the string over a tree limb and hang themselves.

The weeping widow determines as an economical Hausfrau that she must eat them. Having put them on the hearth to fry she descends for a few moments to her cellar. The boys are on her roof with fish hook and line and they draw the chickens up through the chimney. The widow, finding that they have disappeared beats her poor innocent dog, while the boys repair to the woods and stuff themselves into torpor.

The second exploit is the sawing of a plank over a brook, whereby a highly respected tailor is plunged into cold water and rescued by two geese. He is so chilled that his wife has to thaw him out by ironing him as if he were linen. Then comes schoolmaster Lampel as a victim. His pipe is stuffed with powder and blows up. Pretty cheap fun, that. Uncle Fritz comes on a visit and the boys put beetles in his bed. Uproarious, isn't it? Now comes Easter and music finds her chance with a choral. This time the boys fall into a vat of dough in a baker's and are cooked, but eat their way out of the dough and escape. This is more like real fun and the pictures are sidesplitting. But Mraczek cannot compose them.

At last the two boys go into Farmer Meck's barn and make holes in the corn bags so that the corn runs out. The farmer catches them, puts them in a bag and takes them to the mill, where they are ground into duck food. After this there is an epilogue in which certain reflections are published.

The composition is dedicated to Richard Strauss and is obviously an attempt to create a second "Til Eulenspiegel," but it lacks the humor and the music of that wonderfully clever sketch. It is by no means without real merit, however, nor is it without a good share of musical humor. The composer has shown originality in his instrumental devices, especially in his treatment of the celesta, which plays a very important part in the tone painting. Piano and harp are also used with great skill and naturally mutes bob in and out of the brass instruments from trumpets to tuba with unceasing activity.

But when the thing is done no firm impression remains. Too many things have been attempted and music has been asked to say things which are not in her language. Wilhelm Busch's pictures are infinitely more humorous and characteristic than anything in this composition, despite the fact that they consist only of a few free lines and some thin, flat washes.

Address New York City.
Date MAR [illegible]

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Academy of Music last Friday evening. The soloist was Otto Urack, the distinguished 'cellist, and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who was heard in this capacity in Brooklyn for the first time. Mr. Urack as a 'cellist, as a composer and as a conductor is one of the greatest students among the younger men of today, and his engagement by the Boston Symphony was in line with its policy to bring to this country only great talents. He played Albert's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major. The principal orchestral number on the programme was Edward MacDowell's Orchestral Suite in E minor called "Indian." Dr. Muck is a great admirer of the suite as a whole and he regards the "Dirge" as one of the finest things in the literature of music. With him the playing of this MacDowell Suite is always a labor of love. The other numbers were Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Dukas's brilliant scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme in its proper order was as follows:

MacDowell Orchestral Suite in E minor, No. 2 "Indian," Op. 48.

Wagner, "A Faust Overture."

D'Albert, concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major, op. 20.

Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe).

Est. 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date 23 1913

PRANKS OF 2 BOYS AS SERIOUS MUSIC

Established:

"Max und Moritz" Played Here by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MRACZEK CHOOSES UNUSUAL THEME

Dr. Karl Muck Conducts Last Concert of Season in Carnegie Hall.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert in New York this season, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Dr. Karl Muck, dispensing once more with the services of a soloist, cast before his audience a composition new to this city, though already produced by him last week in the Hub and by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra on December 20, 1912, in Chicago. The work was Josef Gustav Mraczek's Symphonic Burlesque after "Max und Moritz," based on seven "pranks" by those two rascally youngsters as immortalized in the sketches of Wilhelm Busch, and it proved to be a very extraordinary and highly unimportant contribution to the literature of modern orchestral music.

Mraczek has dedicated his "Burleske" to Dr. Richard Strauss "with the utmost respect," and no doubt he had a lot of ponderous fun in applying that composer's idiom to his elephantine joke. To accomplish the end he had in view he utilized a gigantic orchestral instrument which includes kettledrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, castanets, a concert grand pianoforte (with lid raised) and a celesta. With this apparatus he evolves a set of striking pictures, easy enough to understand with the aid of a descriptive programme. The boy terrors are introduced in the prologue by a theme that illustrates their "high spirits." Soon we discover that they are occupied with Widow Bolte's chickens, whose cackling in the wood-wind cannot be mistaken. Attentive ears may even catch a suggestion of the final duties performed so pathetically by the three strangling hens.

After the poor widow has expressed her sorrow in the melancholy song of a clarinet and has prepared her pets for cooking we hear the fowl sizzling in the frying-pan. Suddenly, a glissando of harp, celesta and piano apprises us that Max and Moritz are drawing the savory quartet up the chimney on fishing lines.

Next we meet the amusing tailor Boeck and witness aurally how he is dumped into the stream, much to the wicked joy of his tormenters. Then we hear schoolmaster Laempel playing a fugue on the organ and the explosion of the pipe he is smoking so peacefully after his manual exaction causes a tremendous din in the orchestra.

Wierdly effective is the passage that illustrates the activities of the busy beetles, placed in the bed of Uncle Fritz, who is just preparing for a good night's rest, and the old Easter choral, "Christ ist erstanden," which opens the "Prank" in the bakery shop, is an episode of real beauty. But the composition as a whole, though it revealed Mraczek's orchestral technique in a brilliant light and gave Dr. Muck's musicians an opportunity to exult in their virtuoso accomplishments, is out of all proportion to the subject on which it is based. Surely Mraczek's gifts could be used to better advantage. But he typifies the sophisticated tendencies of German art.

The matinee opened with Sinding's symphony in D minor, No. 1, which provided more enjoyment than any other work on the programme. Surely Dr. Muck could have made better selections, however, to round out the afternoon than Liszt's "Waltz in the Village Tavern," which he read in a manner surprisingly rigid, colorless and dry, and Dukas's scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." Both are interesting pieces in their way. But Mraczek's "Max and Moritz" furnished quite enough of the grotesque for a single concert.

MAX SMITH.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date MAR 21 191

LOEFFLER MUSIC GIVES PLEASURE

Est

His "Pagan Poem" Played Once Again With Success by Boston Orchestra.

ANTON WITEK SOLOIST

The Concert Master of the Organization Is Heard in Brahms Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruehling"; Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets; the Brahms violin concerto and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. The pianist was Heinrich Gebhard of Boston, who has officiated in other performances of Mr. Loeffler's composition.

The "Pagan Poem" was last heard here on January 30, 1910, when it was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch at the New Theatre (now the Century). Those were strenuous days in the realm of music, for on the following evening Richard Strauss's "Elektra" was produced at the Manhattan Theatre under the management of Oscar Hammerstein. It need hardly be said that in propinquity to this remarkable struggle of music for existence Mr. Loeffler's paganism was like the breath of violets.

One of Virgil's eclogues suggested the composition to Mr. Loeffler, who lives not far from Harvard University and roams easily in classic shades. The story is of a young woman whose recreant lover lingers too long in the white light district of a distant city. So she makes libations to the gods, burns incense and, best of all, sings and bids her songs draw Daphnis back to her. The three trumpets sound off the stage and they draw nearer and nearer as the foolish Daphnis is lured by the songs, and in the end they unite with the swelling peal of his triumphant welcome to the longing arms.

It was worth while to hear the composition again. Mr. Loeffler, as music lovers know, is a disciple of the contemporaneous French school, and he leans strongly toward the style of Debussy. Although he sacrifices much for the sake of this, he nevertheless has a rich vein of originality. His "Pagan Poem" is a full blooded piece of writing and it publishes moods which are communicative.

The hopes of the maiden of Thessaly run high, they sink to doubt, they rise again, and are finally blessed with brilliant realiation. The instrumental plan of the composition is striking and while the piano almost rises to the postion of a solo instrument, it never steps quite out of the picture. Its value in providing a rich texture of exotic scale passages is unquestionable.

The brief prominence of the English horn is admirably introduced and the three trumpets speak with vigor. It is not unlikely, however, that most music lovers would find more conviction in the work were it more compact. It was warmly applauded last evening and the composer, who sat in a box, was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times.

The Brahms violin concerto was placed on the programme to enable Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, to appear as a sole performer. Mr. Witek has been heard in the same capacity before, but he did not then gain as much sound approval as he did last evening. His playing of the Brahms music was praiseworthy. It had clarity and beauty of tone, accuracy of intonation, skill in technic and musical judgment to commend it.

The playing of the orchestra, as usual, was something to remember with delight. A flexible and temperamental instrument is this aggregation from Boston and he who plays upon it with a little baton is a past master of his art. Such an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity and of fine intelligence and commanding enthusiasm in conducting as that presented in the "Pagan Poem" was inspiring.

MAR 23 1913

ORCHESTRA SS SEASON HERE

Burlesque of Strauss's Programme in a Selection of Modern Music.

PLAYS SINDING'S SYMPHONY

The Burlesque Proves a Humorous Parody on the Works of the Vienna Composer.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and was devoted, like the evening concert on Thursday, to music of the modern composers. The symphony was Christian Sinding's in D minor, a work that has endured longer than many modern ones, and has been oftener played. The Philharmonic Society first gave it in New York in 1894, under Seidl's direction, and it had been heard the year before in Chicago under Thomas's; it has had several performances in Boston.

It bears repetition well; if it is not wholly original in its substance, it is yet strong and vigorous music, with the youthful vigor of the North. It has well defined and easily grasped themes, which are developed sometimes at greater length than their intrinsic importance seems to warrant, and its rhythms are strongly marked. The influence of Wagner is pronounced, especially in the first movement. There are passages which are reminiscent of "Götterdämmerung" and of the forging scene in "Siegfried"; and yet these are more in feeling and color than in definite and tangible appropriations. There is a Norse influence in this music that is unmistakable.

A novelty on the programme was a "symphonic burlesque," after Wilhelm Busch's inimitable German tale of the naughty boys, Max and Moritz. It is by one Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a name not easily grasped and not hitherto known in New York, and yet, as his composition attested, a musician of very considerable attainments.

The piece is dedicated "with the utmost respect" to Richard Strauss; whether the music shows so much respect as the dedication might be questioned, for it is an elaborate burlesque of Dr. Strauss's conceptions of programme music and his embodiment of them in his symphonic poems, especially his later ones. Mr. Mraczek has used quite as formidable an instrumental apparatus as his model, including most of the known orchestral instruments, and his jest is on a most elaborate scale. It consists of a prologue, seven pranks, and an epilogue. The substance of these is carefully detailed in the programme notes, and the listener is expected to follow them in the approved manner, and, of course, also to enjoy the composition purely as music.

It may be said that Mr. Mraczek has shown a good deal of humorous appreciation of the points that lend themselves to burlesque in the later period of Strauss's music, as well as skill in carrying out his conceit. He has used all the portentious volume of sound, the strained and unnatural instrumental cackle, the imitative noises, the large number and elaborate combinations of representative themes, the bruising discords, the sudden contrasts between passages of cacophony, and more or less commonplace and mellifluous melody that concertgoers by this time know very well in Strauss's tonal picturings.

It has been said that nothing is easier than to parody a masterpiece, but leaving aside the question whether in this instance masterpieces are parodied it takes a highly developed skill to write for orchestra as Mr. Mraczek has done in this composition, whether for serious or humorous purposes. And while this burlesque may not convulse the listener with laughter, striking him under the fifth rib, it will give amusement and the pleasurable stimulation that comes from a really witty performance to those who are sufficiently familiar with the subject to appreciate all the good points that have been made. To others it will afford amusement for what it is. Dr. Muck and his men played it brilliantly and most effectively—and it is a very difficult joke.

The other modern pieces on the programme, also in an ironical or humorous vein, were Liszt's glittering "Mephisto Waltz" and Paul Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," both of which are well known.

CABLE ADDRESS,
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date MAR 2 1 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Orchestra Gives Brilliant Concert at Carnegie Hall.

Major Higginson's band from Boston came to us again last night for their last Thursday night concert of the season, and Carnegie Hall was filled with the usual Boston Symphony audience, an audience that both for intelligence and size knows no peers in New York's musical life. The solo performer of the evening was Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, who played Brahms's concerto in D major for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Witek has appeared before in this city, but he never has revealed himself as the splendid artist he proved himself last night. The cadenzas in the concerto are difficult in the extreme, yet he threw them off with a dexterity and precision that appeared the negation of effort, while his tone was uniformly warm and clear. Let us hope that we shall hear Mr. Witek often in the future and always in the vein he showed last night.

In the main orchestral number, Dr. Muck chose Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," a composition which has been heard before in New York and which is one of the most inspired things that the Alsatian-Bostonian composer has written. It is, to be sure, altogether too long, but there are in it passages of great beauty and brilliancy. The three trumpets which, behind the scene, give out the musical expression of Vergilian refrain as written in the poem upon which the composition is founded, make an innovation of which the effectiveness is remarkable.

Though the "Poem" is founded upon certain verses in the eighth eclogue of Vergil, it is not strictly programme music and is abundantly able to stand by its own purely musical appeal The splendid orchestra, inspired by Dr. Muck's informing spirit, gave it a performance that was one of the finest things of which even that great band is capable. The other two orchestral numbers were Goldmark's overture, "Im Frühling," and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York.
Date ....

Dr. Karl Muck was evidently in a playful mood when he arranged the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

After Sinding's ambitious symphony in D minor, in which the Norwegian composer applied native local color with Wagnerian skill to a big but sombre score, the tone of the performance changed.

Mraczek's symphonic burlesque on Busch's "Max and Moritz" was a work of delicious humor. It owes its existence to works like Dr. Richard Strauss' "Hero Life" and "Domestic Symphony." Had these noble pictures in music never been penned we should never have had the exquisite joy of listening to Max and Moritz stealing chickens and drowning

Miss [illegible]lanche Duffield
Phot[illegible]y Otto Sarony Co.

tailors in three-fourths time by means of a great orchestra assisted by a grand pianoforte with the lid raised.

Franz Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" followed, and Duka's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" brought to a close a programme which was more unique than noble.

Needless to say, Dr. Muck conducted with that mastery and repose which are characteristic of him, while the great orchestra played with the same unanimity and power which it expends on merely musical works by Beethoven, Brahms or other masters.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Date MAR 21 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Modern Music Occupies First of the Final Appearances This Season.

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra final concerts here was given in Carnegie Hall last evening and was devoted entirely to modern music. Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing the Brahms concerto.

The programme was:

Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte. English horn and three trumpets obbligati, Loeffler; concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Brahms; overture, "Carneval,"

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 24 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ADIEU.

Symphonic Burlesque on Richard Strauss Feature of Final Concert.

A symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz," by Mrazek, was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday. The work is generally considered to be a parody on the extreme features of Richard Strauss's style. The other numbers on the programme were a symphony in D minor; Sinding; episode from Lenau's "Faust," and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) by Dukas.

[illegible] the Russian Symphony popular price

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS: NEW YORK
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date ....

PAGAN POEM CHARMS LARGE AUDIENCE HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, generaled by Dr. Karl Muck, brought back to New York last night Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," offering it as the principal contribution of a programme in Carnegie Hall which opened with Goldmark's overture "Im Fruehling"—veritable nursery music in comparison—and included Brahms's violin concerto in D major, with Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

Loeffler's stupendous score was first introduced to local music lovers six years ago by Dr. Muck and his musicians. About three years ago Walter Damrosch's Symphony Orchestra produced it again in the Century Theatre. In all likelihood therefore the work was not entirely new to the majority of last night's audience, which may have accounted for the enthusiasm it aroused.

But Loeffler's highly impressionistic and elaborate music, with its ear-puzzling dissonances and perplexing rhythms, cannot be absorbed and digested in one or two hearings, though the brilliancy of its instrumental investiture makes an immediate impression. Probably much of the applause was offered as a tribute to the superb playing of the orchestra and as a personal compliment to the composer, who sat in a first tier box near the stage and stood up twice to bow his thanks.

The playing of the orchestra under Dr. Muck's alert and incisive baton certainly deserved every bit of the approval it evoked, for Loeffler's score, which enlists not only the special services of a piano and an English Horn, but also of three trumpets stationed at a distance behind the scenes and guided by signals from an electric button held in the conductor's left hand, presents unusual difficulties. That those difficulties were solved last night goes almost without saying, though the strangely effective harmonic progressions of the hidden brass sounded perhaps somewhat too near and palpable.

To Heinrich Gebhardt, who handled the extremely exacting piano part with extraordinary skill, special praise is due. How he managed accomplish his task—a veritable Chinese puzzle in conflicting rhythms—from memory, it is not easy to understand. Anton Witek, as always when he appears in the capacity of a soloist, exhibited qualities which few musicians accustomed to orchestral routine succeed in preserving. That his performance of the Brahmns concerto inspired genuine admiration was not left for a moment in doubt.

MAX SMITH.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS: NEW YORK
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date MAR 21 1913

Dr. Muck and His Men Give a Pleasing Concert

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" Wins Applause, Which Includes the Composer Himself.

Conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The feature of the programme was Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem, "A Pagan Poem." The audience waxed enthusiastic over the manner in which Dr. Muck conducted and the orchestra played it, and then it recognized Mr. Loeffler in a front box and renewed its applause. To this the composer bowed.

There were persons in the audience who wanted to go up and ask Mr. Loeffler what it was all about, this "Pagan Poem," with its moments of melody and general atmosphere of musical cubism. It calls for a piano in the orchestra, and in the score are obligatos for three trumpets and an English horn. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. The other solo parts were played with clearness and beauty of tone by Messrs. Louis Kloepfel, Joseph Mann and Carl Merrill, trumpeters, and Mr. George Longy.

For all its turbulence and modern aspect the tone poem appeared to be an oasis in a desert of melody, if such a figure may be used. It was preceded by Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," and followed by Brahms' violin concerto in D major, with Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist. There was an ovation for him after the first movement, for he accomplished the herculean task of sustaining the audience's interest through the remarkably long movement.

The general effect of the concerto was excellent, Dr. Muck's accompaniment being careful and sympathetic.

Then with a burst of spirit came Dvorak's overture "Carnaval," that sent the audience out to the long lines of automobiles, 'buses and trolley cars and the sidewalk in a mood ready to defy the fog.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SPRING POEM

What might be called an anticipatory Easter programme was presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The seasonable list began with Goldmark's "In the Spring," a work that, when it was written, opened a new field for its composer. It is a veritable tone-poem of trees stirred in the breezes, bird songs and pipes of Pan. Even the customary thunder rolls break the sweet continuity. Dr. Muck gave a convincing reading of the score.

"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), by Charles Martin Loeffler, was next presented. The work follows the plan of Strauss's "Don Juan" and "Don Quixote," in that it attempts to present in a musical way a poem rich in thought and abounding in ideas. Then, too, Mr. Loeffler is utterly modern in his style of composition, another resemblance to Strauss.

Mr. Witek, concert master of the organization, played the solo part in Brahms's Concerto in D major, and Dvorak's "Carnival" closed the concert.

To-morrow afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, the orchestra will give its final event of the season. Works by Sinding, Mraczek, Liszt and Dukas will be played.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 24 191

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, bade farewell to New York for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The principal number on the concert programme was a symphonic burlesque, "Max und Moritz," by Mraczek, a Polish composer, who made all sorts of grotesque fun out of imitations of Richard Strauss that Dr. Muck and his men played with a gravity that was convulsing. Sinding's first symphony and [illegible]

[187]

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

"Katzenjammer Kid" Music Produced by Boston Symphony

The expiring musical season, lik the moribund hero of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," before he is translated to a commonplace diatonic Straussian realm of peace, is having its periods of feverish endeavor, and Saturday and Sunday formed one of them. Four orchestras were heard in the two days and several instrumentalists added to the music-making.

Dr. Carl Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, the People's Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert in the same hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony Orchestra was heard in an assorted programme for the benefit of its pension fund in Aeolian Hall on Sunday evening, and at the same time Victor Herbert and his orchestra were giving a concert in Carnegie Hall. Leopold Godowsky gave his piano recital at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon.

Dr. Muck's programme was rich—or rather, poor—in programme music, the novelty of this sort being Joseph Gustav Mraczek's "Max und Moritz." The two characters mentioned in the title are a kind of German "Katzenjammer Kids," whose exploits were revealed to the Teutonic world by their originator, Wilhelm Busch, in sketch and story.

The "Max and Moritz" music is said to be a parody on the tone poems of Richard Strauss, especially the later ones. The same stupendous array of instruments is employed in the orchestra and the method and style is precisely that of Strauss. If this tone poem of the gentleman of the un-Teutonic and unpronounceable name is a musical joke, it is one of those elaborate and ponderous affairs that are not foreign to the Teutonic sense of humor. But its intent, if burlesque, succeeds only in being imitation, and its humor is nil.

To the writer, "Max und Moritz" seemed to be a laboriously serious attempt at a tone poem that should actually reproduce in music the Katzenjammerish episodes of the two heroes and, in any case, it reduced music to a function that may quite well be the reductio ad absurdam of Richard Strauss. It was undoubtedly clever, as Strauss himself is, and it brought forward some original and interesting combinations in orchestral color. But as music it was a weariness to the flesh and as humor it was as funny as apple pie in Winter a week old.

Dr. Muck resuscitated Christian Sinding's D minor symphony, a sturdy skeleton that is still only a skeleton. There was also the second episode of ..." according to Liszt,

EVENING MA
New York

From POST
Address: New York MAR 24 1913
Date

MUSIC AND DRAM

A Musical Burlesque.

The Boston Symphony programme on urday contained a suggestion of the ' day Comic Supplement" in the "Sympl Burlesque" on the pranks of Max and Moritz, by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a young composer who lives at Brünn. But the "Franks of Max and Moritz" are classics in their way; they are by Wilhelm Busch, who has long been a contributor to the Fliegende Blätter, which is probably the oldest and best illustrated humorous paper in the world. More often than otherwise the series of pictures illustrating a funny incident are wordless, and one does not have to read German to get enjoyment from the Fliegende Blätter.

This "Burleske" consists of a prologue, seven pranks, and an epilogue. The programme of "Prank V" is as follows: "Uncle Fritz is visiting the boys' parents. Max and Moritz go into the woods and collect beetles. Returning, they put them in uncle's bed. In the night watches the beetles begin to be busy. Uncle kills as many of them as he can and goes back to bed." At first sight this seems a trivial subject for a "symphonic poem," even as a burlesque. But the composer has filled the work so full of melody and genuine humor that it is pleasant to listen to, and that is enough. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that it is a reductio ad absurdum of Strauss's bleating sheep—but this is not to be taken seriously, while that was. As a piece of "descriptive music" it is like all music of the kind—one needs to be told what it is about to know its meaning. We can stand this in music, but not in "cubist" painting.

Sinding's Symphony in D minor opened the programme. It has lucid moments, but on the whole is dull and uninteresting. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" was a welcome number, and by far the best music on the programme. The final number was Dukas's Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." All the music was played in the Boston Symphony's best style.

It is a pity that the boys who distribute programmes on the other side of Fifty-seventh Street cannot be given enough copies to go around. They had given out some time before the concert began.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date
Establishe

Under the patronage of Gatti-Casaz Enrico Caruso and others in the Me politan Opera House, the Italian A bassador in Washington, the local c sul and a number of prominent Italia in New York, there has been organiz the Italian Philharmonic Society New York, Inc., the first concert which is to be given in Carnegie Ha on April 13. The object of this society is to present the various symphonic and classical works of both the old and modern Italian school, heretofore unknown in America.

The orchestra of 100 pieces, under the leadership of Cesare Sodero, has been selected from the Philharmonic, New York Symphony and Boston Symphony societies. At the first concert the composers represented will be modern, with one exception—Cherubini.

Frances Alda of the Metropolitan has promised to sing at least one number. Geraldine Farrar and Antonio Scotti have added their names to the society's list of patrons.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM 2d 1913
Address: New York.
Date MAR 21 1913
Established:

Karl Muck was nothing if not eclecti in his programme for the concert of th famous orchestra from Boston in Carnegi Hall last night. Indeed, it must hav taken some courage to group in one pro gramme such diverse composers as th vivid and sometimes banal Goldmark, th illusive Leoffler, the restrained Brahm and the romantic Dvorak.

Of these four, Leoffler, with his "Pag Poem," merited the unusual enthusias showered upon him. The compose acknowledged the tributes from his sea in a prominent box.

In attempting to express in music th spirit of the eighth eclogue of Virgil, with its magical Thessalian atmosphere, Mr. Loeffler's idioms are his own and are as ultra-modern as Debussy's.

Brahms' Concerto for violin, in D major, was played by Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra. His work was marked by great clarity and reserve. If it never rose to really inspired heights it was at least a creditable and thoroughly musicianly presentation of the concerto.

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," might be called almost anything else—and Meyerbeer might have written it. It was played with a beauty of tone that might have been expended in a better composition.

COPYRIGHT by MISHKIN

M^ME BELLA ALTEN

Dvorak's Carnival overture concluded the programme.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date
Esta

UNION SQUARE.

A truly surprising bill of vaudeville attractions will be in store for the patrons of B. F. Keith's Union Square Theatre this week. It is largely a bill of novelties, and otherwise abounds in fun and music. To those who like a thrill, the Tom Davis Trio will be enjoyable in "Motoring in Midair," the last word in the way of a thriller. An important event in vaudeville will be the appearance of the celebrated lyric soprano, Josephine Dunfee, who has recently starred with De Wolfe Hopper in several productions. In the comedy line, Ben Deely and company, assisted by Marie Wynne, offer "The New Bellboy." "Broadway Love" is an interesting playlet, presented by Gladys Alexandria and company. A special feature will be the Empire Comedy Four. Mr. Keith never forgets the children, and he has arranged for the first appearance of Karl Emmy and his Pets. Other important numbers will be the Wilson Brothers, Ralph Smalley, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lena Pantzer, "Queen of the Wire."

884

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 21 1913
Establish

Boston Orchestra Plays Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem"

Anton Witek Soloist in a Brahms Violin Concerto—Interesting Programme for the Last Evening Concert of Its Season.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

Dr. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at Carnegie Hall last night an interesting programme for the last evening concert of the organization's twenty-seventh season in New York. The weather had no effect upon the attendance. There was a crowded audience of music lovers that in appearance rivalled the Opera House.

The principal number was Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." It is his opus 14, composed for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. Mr. Loeffler got his inspiration from the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, some of the lines of which tell of the spell of a sorceress to call her recreant lover home. While it was played here a few years ago by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, it is, practically, a novelty. Although long, the composition is interesting, has points of beauty and is well orchestrated. One effective device is the pronouncement of the call of the sorceress, from time to time, by the three trumpets placed behind the scenes. At the end, when the spell has done its work, they come upon the stage to announce the triumph. Mr.

Heinrich Gebhard played the piano, Georges Longy the English horn and Louis Kloepfel, Joseph Mann and Carl Merrill the trumpets. Their work was most creditable and the orchestra gave of its best quality. Mr. Loeffler was discovered in a box and made to rise and acknowledge the applause.

Anton Witek, the concert master, was the soloist in Brahms's violin concerto in D major, opus 77. He showed expert musicianship and was rewarded with much applause. The other numbers were Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, in which the band upheld its unequalled reputation.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL RECITAL

Godowsky Also Gives Final Performance of Season—Irish Musical Festival a Great Success—Good Programme at the Metropolitan.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

DESPITE the waning season, there was great activity Saturday and yesterday in every available concert room and in the churches as well, where elaborate services were offered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra marked its farewell for the season Saturday afternoon with a curious and amusing "Burleske," by Mraczek, who wrote in symphonic form the pranks of "Max and Moritz," admirable reproductions of the Katzenjammer kids. Carnegie Hall was well filled.

It is "Respectfully dedicated to Richard Strauss," and it makes a capital joke of the idiosyncrasies of the great German composer, with a deftness and a skill in the treatment of the instruments and the orchestration practically equal to that of Strauss in its expression of humor.

Sinding's symphony in D minor was of less interest, and highly pleasing were the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, also after a ballad by Goethe, which were played on the same programme no doubt because of the peculiar combination of instruments made necessary for the orchestra to bring with them for the performance of the symphonic "burleske."

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 2

CHEER BOSTON COMPOSER.

Symphony Orchestra Plays Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

A bit of novelty was forthcoming at last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall upon the conclusion of C. M. Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

Persons seeing the Boston composer in a box made known his presence, and for several minutes Mr. Loeffler was kept busy bowing his acknowledgments to the large audience.

In its present form "A Pagan Poem" is needlessly long, tedious in many places and markedly modern in treatment. One respects the skill shown in the making, but the composition has little spontaneity. The feature as well as the surprise of the evening was the violin playing of Anton Witek. He gave a performance of the Brahms D major concerto so technically fluent and musically admirable that nothing he has heretofore done approaches it.

1884

BROOKLYN EDIT
From HERALD
Address: New York
Date MAR 23 1913

TO-NIGHT at the Academy of Music Mr. John McCormack will give his only Brooklyn recital this season. This will be about the last opportunity to hear Mr. McCormack, as he leaves early next month for Australia, where he is to appear in concert and where he will undoubtedly repeat some of the triumphs he attained when he toured that country a few years ago with the Melba Opera Company. With Mr. McCormack as assisting soloist is Miss Helen Keller, the young Boston violinist, who made her American début as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year.

1884

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

Estab

"Katzenjammer Kid" Music Produced by Boston Symphony

The expiring musical season, lik the moribund hero of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," before he is translated to a commonplace diatonic Straussian realm of peace, is having its periods of feverish endeavor, and Saturday and Sunday formed one of them. Four orchestras were heard in the two days and several instrumentalists added to the music-making.

Dr. Carl Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, the People's Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert in the same hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony Orchestra was heard in an assorted programme for the benefit of its pension fund in Aeolian Hall on Sunday evening, and at the same time Victor Herbert and his orchestra were giving a concert in Carnegie Hall. Leopold Godowsky gave his piano recital at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon.

Dr. Muck's programme was rich—or rather, poor—in programme music, the novelty of this sort being Joseph Gustav Mraczek's "Max und Moritz." The two characters mentioned in the title are a kind of German "Katzenjammer Kids," whose exploits were revealed to the Teutonic world by their originator, Wilhelm Busch, in sketch and story.

The "Max and Moritz" music is said to be a parody on the tone poems of Richard Strauss, especially the later ones. The same stupendous array of instruments is employed in the orchestra and the method and style is precisely that of Strauss. If this tone poem of the gentleman of the un-Teutonic and unpronounceable name is a musical joke, it is one of those elaborate and ponderous affairs that are not foreign to the Teutonic sense of humor. But its intent, if burlesque, succeeds only in being imitation, and its humor is nil.

To the writer, "Max und Moritz" seemed to be a laboriously serious attempt at a tone poem that should actually reproduce in music the Katzenjammerish episodes of the two heroes and, in any case, it reduced music to a function that may quite well be the reductio ad absurdam of Richard Strauss. It was undoubtedly clever, as Strauss himself is, and it brought forward some original and interesting combinations in orchestral color. But as music it was a weariness to the flesh and as humor it was as funny as apple pie in Winter a week old.

Dr. Muck resuscitated Christian Sinding's D minor symphony, a sturdy skeleton that is still only a skeleton. There was also the second episode of Lenau's "Faust" according to Liszt, who is forever playing with either Satan or the angels, and Dukas's "L'apprenti Sorcier—mere literary narrative music.

From POST
Address: New York MAR 24 1913
Date

Estal

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A Musical Burlesque.

The Boston Symphony programme on Saturday contained a suggestion of the "Sunday Comic Supplement" in the "Symphonic Burlesque" on the pranks of Max and Moritz, by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, a young composer who lives at Brünn. But the "Franks of Max and Moritz" are classics in their way; they are by Wilhelm Busch, who has long been a contributor to the Fliegende Blätter, which is probably the oldest and best illustrated humorous paper in the world. More often than otherwise the series of pictures illustrating a funny incident are wordless, and one does not have to read German to get enjoyment from the Fliegende Blätter.

This "Burleske" consists of a prologue, seven pranks, and an epilogue. The programme of "Prank V" is as follows: "Uncle Fritz is visiting the boys' parents. Max and Moritz go into the woods and collect beetles. Returning, they put them in uncle's bed. In the night watches the beetles begin to be busy. Uncle kills as many of them as he can and goes back to bed." At first sight this seems a trivial subject for a "symphonic poem," even as a burlesque. But the composer has filled the work so full of melody and genuine humor that it is pleasant to listen to, and that is enough. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that it is a reductio ad absurdum of Strauss's bleating sheep—but this is not to be taken seriously, while that was. As a piece of "descriptive music" it is like all music of the kind—one needs to be told what it is about to know its meaning. We can stand this in music, but not in "cubist" painting.

Sinding's Symphony in D minor opened the programme. It has lucid moments, but on the whole is dull and uninteresting. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" was a welcome number, and by far the best music on the programme. The final number was Dukas's Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier." All the music was played in the Boston Symphony's best style.

It is a pity that the boys who distribute programmes on the other side of Fifty-seventh Street cannot be given enough copies to go around. They had given out some time before the concert began.

PRESS
New York

blishe 84

Under the patronage of Gatti-Casazza, Enrico Caruso and others in the Metropolitan Opera House, the Italian Ambassador in Washington, the local consul and a number of prominent Italians in New York, there has been organized the Italian Philharmonic Society of New York, Inc., the first concert of which is to be given in Carnegie Hall, on April 13. The object of this society is to present the various symphonic and classical works of both the old and modern Italian school, heretofore unknown in America.

The orchestra of 100 pieces, under the leadership of Cesare Sodero, has been selected from the Philharmonic, New York Symphony and Boston Symphony societies. At the first concert the composers represented will be modern, with one exception—Cherubini.

Frances Alda of the Metropolitan has promised to sing at least one number. Geraldine Farrar and Antonio Scotti have added their names to the society's list of patrons.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

Esta 884

UNION SQUARE.

A truly surprising bill of vaudeville attractions will be in store for the patrons of B. F. Keith's Union Square Theatre this week. It is largely a bill of novelties, and otherwise abounds in fun and music. To those who like a thrill, the Tom Davis Trio will be enjoyable in "Motoring in Midair," the last word in the way of a thriller. An important event in vaudeville will be the appearance of the celebrated lyric soprano, Josephine Dunfee, who has recently starred with De Wolfe Hopper in several productions. In the comedy line, Ben Deely and company, assisted by Marie Wynne, offer "The New Bellboy." "Broadway Love" is an interesting playlet, presented by Gladys Alexandria and company. A special feature will be the Empire Comedy Four. Mr. Keith never forgets the children, and he has arranged for the first appearance of Karl Emmy and his Pets. Other important numbers will be the Wilson Brothers, Ralph Smalley, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lena Pantzer, "Queen of the Wire."

NEW YORK
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 21 1913

Establish

Boston Orchestra Plays Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem"

Anton Witek Soloist in a Brahms Violin Concerto—Interesting Programme for the Last Evening Concert of Its Season.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at Carnegie Hall last night an interesting programme for the last evening concert of the organization's twenty-seventh season in New York. The weather had no effect upon the attendance. There was a crowded audience of music lovers that in appearance rivalled the Opera House.

The principal number was Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." It is his opus 14, composed for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. Mr. Loeffler got his inspiration from the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, some of the lines of which tell of the spell of a sorceress to call her recreant lover home. While it was played here a few years ago by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, it is, practically, a novelty. Although long, the composition is interesting, has points of beauty and is well orchestrated. One effective device is the pronouncement of the call of the sorceress, from time to time, by the three trumpets placed behind the scenes. At the end, when the spell has done its work, they come upon the stage to announce the triumph. Mr.

Heinrich Gebhard played the piano, Georges Longy the English horn and Louis Kloepfel, Joseph Mann and Carl Merrill the trumpets. Their work was most creditable and the orchestra gave of its best quality. Mr. Loeffler was discovered in a box and made to rise and acknowledge the applause.

Anton Witek, the concert master, was the soloist in Brahms's violin concerto in D major, opus 77. He showed expert musicianship and was rewarded with much applause. The other numbers were Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, in which the band upheld its unequalled reputation.

NEW YORK
stablished and Most Complete
Cutting Bureau in the World

NING TELEGRAM 1913
New York.
MAR 21 1913

lished:

Karl Muck was nothing if not eclectic in his programme for the concert of the famous orchestra from Boston in Carnegie Hall last night. Indeed, it must have taken some courage to group in one programme such diverse composers as the vivid and sometimes banal Goldmark, the illusive Leoffler, the restrained Brahms and the romantic Dvorak.

Of these four, Leoffler, with his "Pagan Poem," merited the unusual enthusiasm showered upon him. The composer acknowledged the tributes from his seat in a prominent box.

In attempting to express in music the spirit of the eighth eclogue of Virgil, with its magical Thessalian atmosphere, Mr. Loeffler's idioms are his own and are as ultra-modern as Debussy's.

Brahms' Concerto for violin, in D major, was played by Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra. His work was marked by great clarity and reserve. If it never rose to really inspired heights it was at least a creditable and thoroughly musicianly presentation of the concerto.

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," might be called almost anything else—and Meyerbeer might have written it. It was played with a beauty of tone that might have been expended in a better composition.

COPYRIGHT by MISHKIN

MME BELLA ALTEN

Dvorak's Carnival overture concluded the programme.

BROOKLYN EDIT
From HERALD
Address: New York
Date MAR 23 1913

E 1884

TO-NIGHT at the Academy of Music Mr. John McCormack will give his only Brooklyn recital this season. This will be about the last opportunity to hear Mr. McCormack, as he leaves early next month for Australia, where he is to appear in concert and where he will undoubtedly repeat some of the triumphs he attained when he toured that country a few years ago with the Melba Opera Company. With Mr. McCormack as assisting soloist is Miss Helen Keller, the young Boston violinist, who made her American début as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year.

ON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL RECITAL

o Gives Final Performance of Season—Irish Musical Festival a Great Success—Good Programme at the Metropolitan.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

DESPITE the waning season, there was great activity Saturday and yesterday in every available concert room and in the churches as well, where elaborate services were offered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra marked its farewell for the season Saturday afternoon with a curious and amusing "Burleske," by Mraczek, who wrote in symphonic form the pranks of "Max and Moritz," admirable reproductions of the Katzenjammer kids. Carnegie Hall was well filled.

It is "Respectfully dedicated to Richard Strauss," and it makes a capital joke of the idiosyncrasies of the great German composer, with a deftness and a skill in the treatment of the instruments and the orchestration practically equal to that of Strauss in its expression of humor.

Sinding's symphony in D minor was of less interest, and highly pleasing were the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, also after a ballad by Goethe, which were played on the same programme no doubt because of the peculiar combination of instruments made necessary for the orchestra to bring with them for the performance of the symphonic "burleske."

ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date MAR 2

1884

CHEER BOSTON COMPOSER.

Symphony Orchestra Plays Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

A bit of novelty was forthcoming at last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall upon the conclusion of C. M. Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem."

Persons seeing the Boston composer in a box made known his presence, and for several minutes Mr. Loeffler was kept busy bowing his acknowledgments to the large audience.

In its present form "A Pagan Poem" is needlessly long, tedious in many places and markedly modern in treatment. One respects the skill shown in the making, but the composition has little spontaneity. The feature as well as the surprise of the evening was the violin playing of Anton Witek. He gave a performance of the Brahms D major concerto so technically fluent and musically admirable that nothing he has heretofore done approaches it.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date MAR 2 1 191

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'PAGAN POEM'

Symphony Concert Made Up of Selections of Modern Music of Contrasting Styles.

NEW PIECE WELL RECEIVED

Charles Loeffler, Author of "Pagan Poem," in a Box at the Performance—Anton Witek the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in New York on the last of its five visits, gave its evening concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was made up of modern music altogether, yet of widely contrasting style. It is not so long a way from Goldmark's overture "In Fruhlin," and Duorak's "Carnival," with which the concert began and ended respectively, to Brahms's violin concerto, as it is, to Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," which occupied the place of a symphony upo nthe programme; for that takes the listne rinto what is still, to many, a new and unfamiliar realm of music.

This "Pagan Poem" was laft played here by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck six years ago. It is suggested by a portion of Virgil's eighth Eclogue, a love song and a love incantation of a Thessalonian maiden endeavoring to bring back her truant lover. In its present shape, which it has reached only after several reworkings by the composer, it is scored for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, the trumpets being heard at different distances off the stage and only at the close with the rest of the orchestra.

This statement of the material means employed suggests that the composer has made elaborate experiments in instrumental timbres in the piece, and such is the case—experiments that are noval and singularly successful. The pianoforte part, admirably played by Heinrich Gebhard, is difficult and elaborate, yet is treated as essentially a part of the ensemble, and not as an added solo; and it is one of the few instances in which a composer has been measureably succesful in obtaining a truly characteristic effect with it.

Most noteworthy is the use of the three distant trumpets playing in strange and dissonant harmonies faintly heard. With these has gone a marvellously skillful use of the orchestra, of all its colors and combinations; and there are effects here that have strange and novel power and a sensuous, yet subtle appeal.

The substance of Mr. Loeffler's music is freighted with a high and fertile imagination. He has not attempted to make an exact translation into tones of Virgil's poem. The music has no servile dependence upon the literary programme, nor does it follow the poem page by page. It is, however, potent in its suggestiveness of the mysteries of Virgil's narrative, its weird imagery, and the crying amorousness of the pagan maiden. There is the note of sensonsness in it. There are gloom and despair, and there is frantic, almost savage rejoicing.

Obviously pleasing in its material and substance the music is not. The composer's themes are not all immediately to be grasped, though the refrain, as Mr. Hale calls it in his note, given to the trumpets is of haunting power. There are passages that may well puzzle and baffle even the sympathetic listener.

The composer is not to be absolved from falling at times into the fantastic and the over-strained, and there are passagees whose clouded harmonies and uncertain melodic form verge upon the grotesque. The harmonic structure that Mr. Loeffler has built up takes him into strange and not always comfortable regions of dissonance to which all ears are not inured.

The certainty of touch with which contrapuntal structure is fabricated can hardly be overlooked by the attentive listener, even though they may not be at once fully appreciated. That the composition is the work of a musician of remarkable quality and remarkable gifts is evident now, as it was when the work was first heard here; and the pages that are of its best are of a keen and poignant beauty.

It received an exatraordinarily fine performance; and its difficulties are great. Dr. Muck and the orchestra expended their powers upon it with a complete devotion. Mr. Loeffler occupied a box, and was called upon to bow his acknowledgments repeatedly to warmly enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, played Brahms's violin concerto in a fashion that commanded high respect. If not a supremely eloquent nor a remarkably brilliant performance, it showed a true appreciation of the work and sympathy with it, and an ample command of its exacting technical demands.

Mr. Witek's playing had breadth and authority. And if his tone did not wholly satisfy an exacting ear, there was sufficient reason for it in the atmospheric conditions of heat and moisture, highly unfavorable to stringed instruments, and, indeed, most other musical instruments.

Goldmark's overture, like Dvorak's, is an idiom that to-day sounds almost naive; yet there are charm and grace and brilliancy in it, though it is a little discursive. And there is an unusually rich, fine, and transparent texture in its orchestration.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Mo
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date MA

COMING to town for the l this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night issued an announcement of importance to its New York subscribers, who as usual filled every chair of the 2,500 in Carnegie Hall. Five Thursday concerts and five Saturday matinees will again be given here next winter, in the orchestra's thirty-third year. Opportunity to subscribe is at a premium now. The management gave notice to local patrons that the option on their seats will expire June 1, and all holdings not resumed by that time will be allotted to new applicants on addressing C. A. Ellis at Symphony Hall, Boston. Among the artists assisting at next winter's concerts will be Fritz Kreisler and Paderewski.

Charles Martin Loeffler, sitting in a stage box last evening, applauded the Boston men's performance of his own "Pagan Poem," until it became plain that the audience was directing its attention, not to the players, but to him. Then the composer stood up and bowed. His old associates in the band joined in the ovation. The soloists in Mr. Loeffler's Vergilian eclogue of a love-lorn maiden's incantation were Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, so oddly echoed by Heinrich Schuecker's harp; George Longy, first oboe, now playing the English horn, and three burly trumpeters, Kloepfel, Mann, and Merrill, heard first behind the scenes, and appearing on the stage in a jubilant outburst as the "story" ended in the absent lover's return.

Karl Muck prefaced his programme with Goldmark's waltz-time overture, "In the Spring," and closed the evening's two hours of music with Dvorak's two-step "Carnival." Anton Witek, first violin, had the place of honor after intermission in the concerto of Brahms. To-night in Brooklyn, Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, has his turn as 'cello soloist in a concerto by D'Albert, and to-morrow the local series ends with the performance of the unknown Mraczek's symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz," for the first time in New York.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

Pagan Poem Given by Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Once upon a time—perhaps it was last night, who knows?—a man went to a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cornegie Hall and listened, and what he heard drove him to rumination, and rumination called up in his mind a fable. This fable arose in the dim, dim past, like most fables. Some say it was originally told by Fra Musicus, of Charivari, to a pious brother, in the little monastery of Saint Monocordia, in Tuscany, but this is not certain. In any event, the fable fable ran upon this wise:

A man there was who first saw the light in a little city perched upon a hill overlooking two countries, the people thereof being deadly enemies. What one liked the other hated, and what this hated, that liked. And what the one thought was black the other thought was blue, and vice versa. And when the man was born, his mother accidentally held him up to a casement that looked out upon both countries. And the man grew to see all things blue out of one eye and black out of the other.

The concertgoer had got thus far in his rumination when there was a touch upon his shoulder and the raucous request of "Fare, please." The rumination was smashed and the concertgoer could remember any more of the fable. So he thought of the concert once more. He remembered that he had been regaled with "A Pagan Poem,"—oh, yes, this was at the concert, for the "poem" was a matter of music.

The "poem" was written by Charles Martin Loeffler, now of Medfield, Mass., but we saw the light in Muehlhausen, the same being in Alsace and, as every school boy, Macaulayan and otherwise, knows, Alsace lies uncomfortably between Germany and Richard Strauss and France and Claude Debussy. And since neither is Greek, nor eke Roman, the ruminator was left to the only possible conclusion, that Mr. Loeffler's paganism was of the Medfield, Mass., variety.

N. B.—The "Pagan Poem" called forth three pages of solid printed matter in the programme books on "Waxen Images" and their relation to sercery. That is one of the dissolute, devilish effects of this kind of paganism.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date MAR 2 1 191

Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT HERE

Excellent Programme Given in Carnegie Hall with Dr. Muck as Conductor—Composer Also in One of the Boxes and Forced to Acknowledge Applause.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Muck as conductor, gave its final evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night before a large and appreciative audience.

Dr. Muck provided a programme that seemed to express the spirit of the season. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" sends forth the very essence ture, "In the Spring," is spontaneous and obvious in its atmosphere, while Dvorak's "Carnival" overture has riotry and color.

Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played the violin concerto in D major of Brahms and gave a creditable performance with a substantial, inspiring accompaniment.

Mr. Witek was at his best in the first movement, where he seemed more at one with the intention of the composer.

The work requires more emotional feeling than Mr. Witek brings to it. His interpretation on the whole bears strongly on the side of intellect, and his bowing is not as free as it might be, but it was a scholarly presentation.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," originally written in 1901 as a piece of chamber music, was later elaborated into its present form for orchestra, and it represents one of the most delightful examples of its type of expression.

It seems even more beautiful to-day than it did a few years ago, when the idiom was strange to our ears, and musical taste was divided between those who were struggling to accept the form and those who were struggling against it.

The pianist of last night was Heinrich Gebhard, who made it, as it is intended to be, merely a part of the orchestra and not a solo with orchestral accompaniment.

The composer occupied a box last night, and Dr. Muck insisted upon his accepting the great applause with which it was greeted.

To-night in Brooklyn there will be a soloist, when Mr. Urack, first 'cellist of the organization, will play the D'Albert 'cello concerto and the orchestra will play a MacDowell suite.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: New York
Date MAR 2 1 1913

1884

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is well known that Richard Wagner did not approve of Hector Berlioz, but the reasons for his aversion are not generally known. While admitting his unusual talent, he was convinced that his influence on the musical art was on the whole pernicious, for the reason that his cleverness in devising new tricks of orchestration had made it possible for minor composers to produce effects and secure applause even when they had absolutely nothing to say. Wagner himself was even more ingenious than Berlioz in conceiving new orchestral combinations and creating new color mixtures, but his feats of instrumentation are never indulged in for their own sake, but as a means of enhancing the charm of his teeming musical ideas.

The success of Richard Strauss is a conspicuous illustration of what can be done by following the Berlioz method. He seldom has anything to say that, for its own sake, is worth listening to; but he garbs what he says in such brilliant hues that the public is hoaxed into the belief that it is listening to a new art message. As a costumer, Strauss is great, but his fine clothes are tailored mostly to be put on dummies.

Another follower of Berlioz is Charles Martin Loeffler, whose "A Pagan Poem" was played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not a novelty, having been played here once before by the same musicians and a second time by the New York Symphony Orchestra. On both occasions, as again last night, the audience was so enchanted by the beautiful coloring of the piece and by certain novel effects of orchestration that it overlooked the fact that the composer had nothing to say so far as melody is concerned. The novel tints were secured by the use of a pianoforte on the stage and three trumpets behind the scenes. In his harmonies, Mr. Loeffler is a faithful follower of the leader of the French school of the hour. When this piece was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, an expert musician who had not seen the programme exclaimed after a few minutes: "I did not know Debussy was on the programme."

On that occasion the trumpet strains were more effective than they were last night, when they were too loud and not sufficiently detached from the players on view. In other respects, it is needless to say, Dr. Muck and his players gave a more satisfactory rendering of the "Pagan Poem," which, by the way, would be greatly improved by heroic cuts. The piano part was ably played by Heinrich Gebhardt.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, who played the Brahms concerto with the technical skill to be expected of the concert-master of the Boston Orchestra. A splendid performance of Goldmark's "Spring" overture opened the concert, and a brilliant close was provided by Dvořák's "Carnival" overture.

From
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Miss Maud Sewall, organist and choir director of the Church of the New Jerusalem, concluded Monday a series of lectures on the works composing the program of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These lectures have been given at Studio Hall throughout the season the Monday afternoon preceding each concert by the orchestra. Miss Sewall on each occasion gave also piano illustration from the compositions, and at one of the lectures was assisted by Miss Beulah Chambers, pianist, and Mrs. Duff Lewis, violinist.

Miss Florence McDonald presented a class of pupils in song recital Wednesday evening at Belcourt Seminary. The young singers gave a creditable account of themselves in the following program, in which they were assisted by students of the piano department: Songs, "Like a Rosebud," by La Forge, "Ich Liebe Dich," by Grieg, Miss Nenetta Burton; "Si mes vers avaient des Ailes," by Hahn, Miss Madeline Kyle; "The Lost Shepherd," by Sidney Homer, Miss Madeline Hill; piano solos, "To a Water Lily" and "A Scotch Poem," both by MacDowell, Miss Ethel Eldridge; songs, "Are You Awake, Little Flower," by Sans Souci, "Morning," by Speaks, Miss Florine Hardwick; "Where Blooms the Rose," by Johns, Miss Anice Doughty; "The Pine Tree," by Salter, "Who is Sylvia?" by Schubert, Miss Hattie Birge; piano solos, "A Tin Soldier's Love," and "The Humming Bird," by Edgar Thorne, Miss Rozelle Wilson; songs, "April Rain," by Woodman, and "At Dawn," by Cadman, Miss Vera Thornton; "Violets," by Mildenberg and "To You," by Speaks, Miss Ethel Eldridge; "Ecstasy," by Beach, "The Ivy Leaf," by Mildenberg, Miss Florine Fleming; "Souvenir," by Drdla, Miss Laurine Gay; "Song of April," by Salter, "Fairy Lullaby," by Beach, Miss Ruth Busby; "Love Me If I Live," by Foote, Miss Ada Carrington; "Haymaking," by Needham, Miss Jessie Ross; piano solo, "Nymphs and Fauns," by Logan, Miss Ruth Hubby; songs, "The Temple Bells" and "Kashmiri Song," by Woodforde-Finden, Miss Lillian Allison; "Marchioness, Your Dancing," Lemaire, and "Happy Days," by Streleski, Miss Dorothy Robins.

[189]

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date MAR 21 1913

Es
1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'PAGAN POEM'

Symphony Concert Made Up of Selections of Modern Music of Contrasting Styles.

NEW PIECE WELL RECEIVED

Charles Loeffler, Author of "Pagan Poem," in a Box at the Performance—Anton Witek the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in New York on the last of its five visits, gave its evening concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was made up of modern music altogether, yet of widely contrasting style. It is not so long a way from Goldmark's overture "In Fruhlin," and Duorak's "Carnival," with which the concert began and ended respectively, to Brahms's violin concerto, as it is, to Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," which occupied the place of a symphony upo nthe programme; for that takes the listne rinto what is still, to many, a new and unfamiliar realm of music.

This "Pagan Poem" was laft played here by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck six years ago. It is suggested by a portion of Virgil's eighth Eclogue, a love song and a love incantation of a Thessalonian maiden endeavoring to bring back her truant lover. In its present shape, which it has reached only after several reworkings by the composer, it is scored for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, the trumpets being heard at different distances off the stage and only at the close with the rest of the orchestra.

This statement of the material means employed suggests that the composer has made elaborate experiments in instrumental timbres in the piece, and such is the case—experiments that are noval and singularly successful. The pianoforte part, admirably played by Heinrich Gebhard, is difficult and elaborate, yet is treated as essentially a part of the ensemble, and not as an added solo; and it is one of the few instances in which a composer has been measureably succesful in obtaining a truly characteristic effect with it.

Most noteworthy is the use of the three distant trumpets playing in strange and dissonant harmonies faintly heard. With these has gone a marvellously skillful use of the orchestra, of all its colors and combinations; and there are effects here that have strange and novel power and a sensuous, yet subtle appeal.

The substance of Mr. Loeffler's music is freighted with a high and fertile imagination. He has not attempted to make an exact translation into tones of Virgil's poem. The music has no servile dependence upon the literary programme, nor does it follow the poem page by page. It is, however, potent in its suggestiveness of the mysteries of Virgil's narrative, its weird imagery, and the crying amorousness of the pagan maiden. There is the note of sensonsness in it. There are gloom and despair, and there is frantic, almost savage rejoicing.

Obviously pleasing in its material and substance the music is not. The composer's themes are not all immediately to be grasped, though the refrain, as Mr. Hale calls it in his note, given to the trumpets is of haunting power. There are passages that may well puzzle and baffle even the sympathetic listener.

The composer is not to be absolved from falling at times into the fantastic and the over-strained, and there are passagees whose clouded harmonies and uncertain melodic form verge upon the grotesque. The harmonic structure that Mr. Loeffler has built up takes him into strange and not always comfortable regions of dissonance to which all ears are not inured.

The certainty of touch with which contrapuntal structure is fabricated can hardly be overlooked by the attentive listener, even though they may not be at once fully appreciated. That the composition is the work of a musician of remarkable quality and remarkable gifts is evident now, as it was when the work was first heard here; and the pages that are of its best are of a keen and poignant beauty.

It received an exatraordinarily fine performance; and its difficulties are great. Dr. Muck and the orchestra expended their powers upon it with a complete devotion. Mr. Loeffler occupied a box, and was called upon to bow his acknowledgments repeatedly to warmly enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, played Brahms's violin concerto in a fashion that commanded high respect. If not a supremely eloquent nor a remarkably brilliant performance, it showed a true appreciation of the work and sympathy with it, and an ample command of its exacting technical demands.

Mr. Witek's playing had breadth and authority. And if his tone did not wholly satisfy an exacting ear, there was sufficient reason for it in the atmospheric conditions of heat and moisture, highly unfavorable to stringed instruments, and, indeed, most other musical instruments.

Goldmark's overture, like Dvorak's, is an idiom that to-day sounds almost naive; yet there are charm and grace and brilliancy in it, though it is a little discursive. And there is an unusually rich, fine, and transparent texture in its orchestration.

LE ADDRESS: NEW Y
KE" NEW YORK
he First Established and Most Complete lewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVG. SUN
ss: New York
MAR 21 1
1884

COMING to town for the last time this season, the Boston Symphony chestra last night issued an announce-ent of importance to its New York bscribers, who as usual filled every hair of the 2,500 in Carnegie Hall. Five hursday concerts and five Saturday atinees will again be given here next inter, in the orchestra's thirty-third year. Opportunity to subscribe is at a premium now. The management gave notice to local patrons that the option on their seats will expire June 1, and all holdings not resumed by that time will be allotted to new applicants on addressing C. A. Ellis at Symphony Hall, Boston. Among the artists assisting at next winter's concerts will be Fritz Kreisler and Paderewski.

Charles Martin Loeffler, sitting in a stage box last evening, applauded the Boston men's performance of his own "Pagan Poem," until it became plain that the audience was directing its attention, not to the players, but to him. Then the composer stood up and bowed. His old associates in the band joined in the ovation. The soloists in Mr. Loeffler's Vergilian eclogue of a love-lorn maiden's incantation were Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, so oddly echoed by Heinrich Schuecker's harp; George Longy, first oboe, now playing the English horn, and three burly trumpeters, Kloepfel, Mann, and Merrill, heard first behind the scenes, and appearing on the stage in a jubilant outburst as the "story" ended in the absent lover's return.

Karl Muck prefaced his programme with Goldmark's waltz-time overture, "In the Spring," and closed the evening's two hours of music with Dvorak's two-step "Carnival." Anton Witek, first violin, had the place of honor after intermission in the concerto of Brahms. To-night in Brooklyn, Otto Urack, the assistant conductor, has his turn as 'cello soloist in a concerto by D'Albert, and to-morrow the local series ends with the performance of the unknown Mraczek's symphonic burlesque, "Max and Moritz," for the first time in New York.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

Pagan Poem Given by Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Once upon a time—perhaps it was last night, who knows?—a man went to a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cornegie Hall and listened, and what he heard drove him to rumination, and rumination called up in his mind a fable. This fable arose in the dim, dim past, like most fables. Some say it was originally told by Fra Musicus, of Charivari, to a pious brother, in the little monastery of Saint Monocordia, in Tuscany, but this is not certain. In any event, the fable fable ran upon this wise:

A man there was who first saw the light in a little city perched upon a hill overlooking two countries, the people thereof being deadly enemies. What one liked the other hated, and what this hated, that liked. And what the one thought was black the other thought was blue, and vice versa. And when the man was born, his mother accidentally held him up to a casement that looked out upon both countries. And the man grew [illegible] to see all things blue out of one eye and black out of the other.

The concertgoer had got thus far in his rumination when there was a touch upon his shoulder and the raucous request of "Fare, please." The rumination was smashed and the concertgoer could [illegible] remember any more of the fable. So he thought of the concert once more. He remembered that he had been regaled with "A Pagan Poem,"—oh, yes, this was at the concert, for the "poem" was a matter of music.

The "poem" was written by Charles Martin Loeffler, now of Medfield, Mass., but we saw the light in Muehlhausen, the same being in Alsace and, as every school boy, Macaulayan and otherwise, knows, Alsace lies uncomfortably between Germany and Richard Strauss and France and Claude Debussy. And since neither is Greek, nor eke Roman, the ruminator was left to the only possible conclusion, that Mr. Loeffler's paganism was of the Medfield, Mass., variety.

N. B.—The "Pagan Poem" called forth three pages of solid printed matter in the programme books on "Waxen Images" and their relation to sorcery. That is one of the dissolute, devilish effects of this kind of paganism.

Cutting Bureau in the World
NG MAIL
ew York
MAR 21 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT HERE

Excellent Programme Given in Carnegie Hall with Dr. Muck as Conductor—Composer Also in One of the Boxes and Forced to Acknowledge Applause.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Muck as conductor, gave its final evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night before a large and appreciative audience.

Dr. Muck provided a programme that seemed to express the spirit of the season. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" sends forth the very essence of nature, and the Goldmark overture, "In the Spring," is spontaneous and obvious in its atmosphere, while Dvorak's "Carnival" overture has riotry and color.

Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played the violin concerto in D major of Brahms and gave a creditable performance with a substantial, inspiring accompaniment.

Mr. Witek was at his best in the first movement, where he seemed more at one with the intention of the composer.

The work requires more emotional feeling than Mr. Witek brings to it. His interpretation on the whole bears strongly on the side of intellect, and his bowing is not as free as it might be, but it was a scholarly presentation.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," originally written in 1901 as a piece of chamber music, was later elaborated into its present form for orchestra, and it represents one of the most delightful examples of its type of expression.

It seems even more beautiful to-day than it did a few years ago, when the idiom was strange to our ears, and musical taste was divided between those who were struggling to accept the form and those who were struggling against it.

The pianist of last night was Heinrich Gebhard, who made it, as it is intended to be, merely a part of the orchestra and not a solo with orchestral accompaniment.

The composer occupied a box last night, and Dr. Muck insisted upon his accepting the great applause with which it was greeted.

To-night in Brooklyn there will be a soloist, when Mr. Urack, first 'cellist of the organization, will play the D'Albert 'cello concerto and the orchestra will play a MacDowell suite.

1884

ST
New York
MAR 21 1913

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is well known that Richard Wagner d not approve of Hector Berlioz, but the easons for his aversion are not generally known. While admitting his unusual talent, he was convinced that his influence on the musical art was on the whole pernicious, for the reason that his cleverness in devising new tricks of orchestration had made it possible for minor composers to produce effects and secure applause even when they had absolutely nothing to say. Wagner himself was even more ingenious than Berlioz in conceiving new orchestral combinations and creating new color mixtures, but his feats of instrumentation are never indulged in for their own sake, but as a means of enhancing the charm of his teeming musical ideas.

The success of Richard Strauss is a conspicuous illustration of what can be done by following the Berlioz method. He seldom has anything to say that, for its own sake, is worth listening to; but he garbs what he says in such brilliant hues that the public is hoaxed into the belief that it is listening to a new art message. As a costumer, Strauss is great, but his fine clothes are tailored mostly to be put on dummies.

Another follower of Berlioz is Charles Martin Loeffler, whose "A Pagan Poem" was played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not a novelty, having been played here once before by the same musicians and a second time by the New York Symphony Orchestra. On both occasions, as again last night, the audience was so enchanted by the beautiful coloring of the piece and by certain novel effects of orchestration that it overlooked the fact that the composer had nothing to say so far as melody is concerned. The novel tints were secured by the use of a pianoforte on the stage and three trumpets behind the scenes. In his harmonies, Mr. Loeffler is a faithful follower of the leader of the French school of the hour. When this piece was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, an expert musician who had not seen the programme exclaimed after a few minutes: "I did not know Debussy was on the programme."

On that occasion the trumpet strains were more effective than they were last night, when they were too loud and not sufficiently detached from the players on view. In other respects, it is needless to say, Dr. Muck and his players gave a more satisfactory rendering of the "Pagan Poem," which, by the way, would be greatly improved by heroic cuts. The piano part was ably played by Heinrich Gebhardt.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, who played the Brahms concerto with the technical skill to be expected of the concert-master of the Boston Orchestra. A splendid performance of Goldmark's "Spring" overture opened the concert, and a brilliant close was provided by Dvořák's "Carnival" overture.

1884

From
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Miss Maud Sewall, organist and choir director of the Church of the New Jerusalem, concluded Monday a series of lectures on the works composing the program of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These lectures have been given at Studio Hall throughout the season the Monday afternoon preceding each concert by the orchestra. Miss Sewall on each occasion gave also piano illustration from the compositions, and at one of the lectures was assisted by Miss Beulah Chambers, pianist, and Mrs. Duff Lewis, violinist.

Miss Florence McDonald presented a class of pupils in song recital Wednes day evening at Belcourt Seminary. The young singers gave a creditable account of themselves in the following program, in which they were assisted by students of the piano department: Songs, "Like a Rosebud," by La Forge, "Ich Liebe Dich," by Grieg, Miss Nenetta Burton; "Si mes vers avaient des Ailes," by Hahn, Miss Madeline Kyle; "The Lost Shepherd," by Sidney Homer, Miss Maud-line Hill; piano solos, "To a Water Lily" and "A Scotch Poem," both by MacDowell, Miss Ethel Eldridge; songs, "Are You Awake, Little Flower," by Sans Souci, "Morning," by Speaks, Miss Florine Hardwick; "Where Blooms the Rose," by Johns, Miss Anice Doughty; "The Pine Tree," by Salter, "Who is Sylvia?" by Schubert, Miss Hattie Birge; piano solos, "A Tin Soldier's Love," and "The Humming Bird," by Edgar Thorne, Miss Rozelle Wilson; songs, "April Rain," by Woodman, and "At Dawn," by Cadman, Miss Vera Thornton; "Violets," by Mildenberg, and "To You," by Speaks, Miss Ethel Eldridge; "Ecstasy," by Beach, "The Ivy Leaf," by Mildenberg, Miss Florine Fleming; "Souvenir," by Drdla, Miss Laurine Gay; "Song of April," by Salter, "Fairy Lullaby," by Beach, Miss Ruth Busby; "Love Me If I Live," by Foote, Miss Ada Carrington; "Haymaking," by Needham, Miss Jessie Ross; piano solo, "Nymphs and Fauns," by Logan, Miss Ruth Hubby; songs, "The Temple Bells" and "Kashmiri Song," by Woodforde-Finden, Miss Lillian Allison; "Marchioness, Your Dancing," Lemaire, and "Happy Days," by Streleski, Miss Dorothy Robins.

N
ERE

Dr. Muck Boxes and g," is sponta-its atmosphere.

nival" overture

ncert master of ony Orchestra, certo in D major creditable perstantial, inspir-

his best in the

where he seemed e intention of the es more emotional

Vitek brings to it.
on the whole bears
e of intellect, and s free as it might cholarly presenta-

Loeffler's "Pagan ritten in 1901 as a music, was later present form for presents one of the nples of its type of re beautiful to-day ears ago, when the

to our ears, and divided between ggling to accept the ho were struggling night was Heinrich

it, as it is intended rt of the orchestra orchestral accom-

ccupied a box last k insisted upon his plause with which there will be a ack, first 'cellist ll play the D'Al-

nd the orchestra
suite.

---

ashington, D. C.

organist and rch of the New day a series of posing the pro-en by the Boston

ese lectures have l throughout the ernoon preceding stra. Miss Sewall
o piano illustra-
s, and at one of
by Miss Beulah
rs. Duff Lewis,

ald presented a recital Wednes-Seminary. The editable account lowing program,
sted by students
t: Songs, "Like
rge, "Ich Liebe
Nenetta Burton;
des Ailes," by Kyle; "The Lost
mer, Miss Maud-
"To a Water Poem," both by Eldridge; songs, le Flower," by by Speaks, Miss here Blooms the Anice Doughty;
Salter, "Who is
iss Hattie Birge; Soldier's Love," ird," by Edgar Wilson; songs, dman, and "At iss Vera Thorn-denberg and "To Ethel Eldridge;
"The Ivy Leaf,"
Florine Fleming;
Miss Laurine Gay;
lter, "Fairy Lul-
s Ruth Busby;
by Foote, Miss aking," by Needoss; piano solo,
by Logan, Miss
he Temple Bells"
y Woodforde-Finn; "Marchioness,
re, and "Happy
Miss Dorothy

" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date [illegible]

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Visits Us Again.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, publishing the ideal of execution to sold-out houses, is with us again making its last visit of the season to New York. At Carnegie Hall, yesterday evening, it gave the first of its final pair of concerts here until next autumn. The programme comprised Goldmark's overture "Im Frühling," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Brahms's violin concerto, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. The soloist was Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra.

The feature of the concert was the performance of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This piece exists in several arrangements. The orchestral version, including a piano part (played yesterday by Heinrich Gebhard), was performed here some years ago by the Boston orchestra, when it made a marked impression. The tone poem is based on certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Vergil. Though Mr. Loeffler does not attempt a literal translation into music of Vergil's lines, he follows in a general way the story of the Thessalian girl who through magical spells brings back to her cottage her truant lover. Three trumpets behind the scenes intone from time to time a refrain corresponding to the recurring incantation of the girl, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." For the last jubilant outcry as Daphnis approaches the door the trumpets return to the stage.

Even after the lapse of years this music is still intensely modern, and from that point of view of absorbing interest. But there is also powerful intrinsic appeal. Of singular eloquence is the picture of the amorous, abandoned woman in her desperate straits resorting to sorcery. Of barbaric splendor is her outburst of passionate exultation in the return of her lover at the end. The piece was played superbly and after it the audience gave Mr. Loeffler, who was present, a veritable ovation. He had to rise from his place in a box and bow his thanks repeatedly.

The rest of the concert was less interesting, but that was the fault of the programme rather than of the performance. Brahms's concerto suits well Mr. Witek's manner of playing. To-morrow afternoon Mraczek's symphonic burlesque "Max und Moritz," played for the first time in New York, will be the chief number of the Boston orchestra's concluding concert. Sinding's D minor symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Watz," and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" are also to be played.

The opera at the Metropolitan last night was "Le Donne Curiose," with the usual cast. PITTS SANBORN.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

LAST BOSTON CONCERT.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Interesting Program With Otto Urack as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave the fifth and final concert of its Washington season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience.

The two interesting features of the final appearance of this superb organization were the presentation of Christian Sinding's symphony No. 1, in D minor, and the introduction of Otto Urack, violoncello virtuoso, as the soloist. The symphony by the greatest living Norwegian composer was awaited with great interest, inasmuch [illegible] to afford comparison with the contemporary master of the same clime, the Finnish genius Sibelius, whose first symphony was interpreted by Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra at the December concert. The Sinding composition is a much more sympathetic work than that of Sibelius, and while neither can be said to enrapture an audience as do the masterpieces of the German and Austrian composers of the older school, Sinding speaks in musical language more readily understood than that of the more widely acclaimed Finnish musician. The andante movement was particularly appealing yesterday, due in a large measure to the truly beautiful work of the clarinets, while the pianissimo passages by the strings were haunting in their melodic charm. The delicacy of treatment and the superb quality of tone displayed in the rendition of this composition gave the admirers of the orchestra a delightful memory to be cherished until the return of the organization next November.

Mr. Urack, who has been at the head of the cello desk at three of the symphony's concerts this year, and who directed the orchestra in the absence of Dr. Muck on a fourth occasion, made his debut as a soloist, playing D'Albert's concerto in C major for violoncello, with orchestral accompaniment. He created a most favorable impression by the richness of his tone and the sincerity of his interpretation. He was greeted with marked enthusiasm.

Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" and Dvorak's overture "Carnival" were the other numbers on the program. There [illegible]

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 3 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Sinding's Work Ably Handled, But Not With Instinctive Spirit of Finnish Music.

At the last of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, the most remarkable feature was the performance of the Sinding symphony in D minor, No. 1, opus 21.

The orchestra was under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, and the interpretation was given with the fine intellectuality which is such a marked characteristic of that director's work. Even more broad of scope than the works of Greig, that of the Finnish composer, in many phases, is abstruse, at least so far as being interpreted by artists of other lands is concerned. Although the rendition was masterly, and the tone and shading all that could be desired, it was most interesting to note the inability of the orchestra to so enter into the spirit of the symphony, as to instinctively understand the meaning of the composer. By no means was the performance consistently Finnish, although there were moments of marked enlightenment.

The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," presented a more familiar field and was, therefore, much more intelligible, but was not handled with as great deftness as the composition first given. Dvorak's "Carnival" as a final number, was a satisfaction and will ever be a delightful memory. At the performance of another orchestra not long ago, one of the numbers was given in such a manner that a series of visualized pictures was presented in rapid succession to the mind's eye. The same effect was accomplished yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony, with the closing number.

Otto Urack, cellist, was the soloist, giving a sincere and musicianly interpretation of the D'Albert Concerto in C major, for the violincello. Urack shows excellent control, and gives a firm, rich tone. F. Y.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 3 1913

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a record-breaking audience, among them being members of the most distinguished residents of the National Capital.

The Misses Wilson occupied the President's box, there guests being Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Hobson, Miss Hagner and Miss Helen Woodrow Bones.

The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained in their box Mrs. Meyer, wife of the former Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Mrs. Muck, Capt. Rodgers, and Capt. Boy-Ed, of the German Embassy.

Others who entertained friends in their boxes were Mrs. Marshall Field, Miss Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. I. T. Mann, and Mrs. Listner.

In the audience were the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, the Misses Eustis, the Norwegian Minister and Mme. Bryn, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. Walter Howe, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mr. and Mrs. C. Peyton Russell, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. James Pinchot, Mrs. Charles Boughton Wood, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Fisher, wife of the former Secretary of the Interior; Miss Polly Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. James Marion Johnston, Miss Eleanor Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Parsons, Mrs. H. B. Buckingham, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Robert Craig, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. A. M. Talbot, Mrs. Alexander Magruder, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Victor Kerens, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Katherine Jennings, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Miss Feroline Perkins, Mrs. Champ Clark, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Perry Johnson, Miss Jane Gilmor, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Wilder, Mrs. Hichborn, Mrs. Tom A. Williams, Mrs. Thomas M. Gale, and Mrs. Wallace

---

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 3 1913

Party From White House Will Occupy Presidential Box at Musicale Today.

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Carl Muck is conductor, will attract a large audience this afternoon at the New National Theater. Otto Urack, the 'cellist, will be the soloist of the afternoon.

A party from the White House will occupy the Presidential box.

With the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff will be Mrs. Meyer, wife of the former Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Mrs. Muck, Captain Rodgers, and Captain Boy-Ed.

Miss Mae Williams will entertain a party in her box and Mr. and M[illegible]

6-110 Seventh
CABLE ADDRESS: NEW
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 3 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS MUSICIANS

Under Masterly Leadership of Dr. Muck, Orchestra Scores Big Success.

Yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of its series for this season. Dr. Muck frequently affords his audiences in Washington the opportunity of becoming familiar with recent compositions, and yesterday Sinding's D Minor Symphony, a comparatively new work, opened the programme. It is a work moulded in the true classical structural form, but departing from the serene pure beauty of the classic symphonic type in its highly dramatic content. The entire work abounds in striking rhythmic figures, vigorous shadings, dramatic and unexpected moments, sudden pauses, short, unfinished themes, and frequent and distant modulations. Each movement might be the prelude to a Wagnerian opera, so full is it of suggestive dramatic episodes. It is not pervaded by graceful themes or melodic beauty, but rather by an impetuous life and motion. The crowning difficulty of reading such a work is to give all the themes their relative importance, and in this Dr. Muck succeeded in his usual masterly style—neither making the primary too emphatic nor the subordinate trivial.

The second number of the programme was Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," the programme presenting the verses from Lenau's poem, the inspiration for this work. There are some memorably beautiful themes. Such are the episodes between violins and 'cellos, and between clarinet and horn, the lovely obeo solo; the coloring is of endless variety, and of exceeding loveliness are the melodies.

The orchestral part of the programme closed with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, a work that was given here last week by the Philhormonic Orchestra of New York. It is a composition sure to become a favorite, as much so as the Tannhauser or Tienzi, or the Leonora overtures, or any of the old programme friends, by reason of its delightful rhythmic swing, the breadth and loveliness of its melodies, and an inherent life and vigor indescribable, and the piling up of orchestral effects.

Mr. Otto Urack, the new violoncellist, who came from Europe early this season, was given an opportunity of proving his virtuosity and musicianship in the solo part of the concerto, Opus 20, for violoncello, by D'Albert, a brilliant work full of difficulties that would try the metal of the most doughty technician; a work rich, also, with charming melodies.

Mr. Urack, without any display of mechanical bravado, rose splendidly to the manifold technical difficulties of the composition, and proved himself as well an artist of exceptional taste and profound musicianship. He sung the melodies with a warmth and mellowness of tone that will live in the memory of those who heard him.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 2 2 1913

Those who were delighted with Max Pauer's wonderful rendition of the Mendelssohn Concerto No. 1 on the occasion of his first appearance in this city as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will receive with unusual pleasure T. Arthur Smith's announcement of the program in which the artist will appear at the Columbia Friday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. It is one that combines many well-known compositions with several novelties. Mr. Pauer landed in this country less than two months ago, but since then has established himself as one of the most highly esteemed pianists in the memory of the American public. The following numbers will make up the program Friday:

Organ concerto in D minor (W. F. Bach), transcribed by Zadora; intermezzo, "Slumber Song," Op. 117 (Brahms); Scherzo, Op. 4 (Brahms); Sonata, Op. 27, No. 2, "Moonlight" (Beethoven); Ballade, G minor (Chopin); Berceuse (Chopin); waltz, A flat major, Op. 42 (Chopin); Etude de Concert, F minor (Liszt); Minuetto (Zanella); Reflets dans l'Eau (Debussy); Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12 (Liszt).

24

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 20 1913

Established:

WIERD RENDITION OF ORCHESTRAL ART

Boston Symphony Illuminates Flopping Of Fowls In "Sore Distress."

The symphonic burlesque, "Max und Moritz," by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, the opening number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Lyric last night, was program music with a vengeance.

Those in the audience who, bewildered with the strange cacaphonies of the orchestra, sought illumination from the printed set of "directions," discovered that they were supposed to be listening to fowls flopping about in "sore distress," that ended in their sudden demise; to the weeping of their owner, a widow, as she philosophically determined to fry her pets; to the weird sound of said unfortunate poultry flying up the chimney as Max and Moritz, two impish boys, from the roof, fish them out of the sizzling lard.

As an example, either of the resourcefulness of the modern orchestra or of the astonishing virtuosity of the composer, "Max und Moritz" is enormously interesting. And despite the absurd program it is frequently delightful from an aesthetic standpoint, as there are passages of great beauty that even the coarse harmonic horseplay, the deliberate violation of the laws of rationality, good taste and musical logic cannot spoil.

The next number came as a positive relief to worried ears. It was MacDowell's beautiful Indian Suite No. 2 in E minor. Nothing could furnish better evidence of the magnificent versatility of the Boston Orchestra than a comparison of the manner in which the Mraczek and the MacDowell numbers were played.

The soloist of the evening, Otto Urack, first cellist of the Orchestra, did not make a particularly strong impression. His number, D'Albert's C major concerto, was long, without pauses between the movements, and, it must be confessed, at times tiresome. Mr. Urack's tone in the cantable passages was firm, large and of strong carrying power; but it lost much of its effect in the quick movements, and his bravura work was rather blurred.

The concert was the last of the Boston Symphony's 1912-13 series, and was not quite as largely attended as the preceding ones, doubtless on account of the fact that it took place at the beginning of the most solemn period of the Lenten season.

Announcement of the return of the Orchestra to the Lyric next season is made. The dates will be November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, with Geraldine Farrar, Teresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler and Paderewski as soloists.

NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 20 1913

Established:

LACK OF VARIETY MARRED CONCERT

Too Much Music of the Same Kind in Boston Symphony's Program.

Too much music of the same kin marred the fifth and last concert b the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Karl Muck, conductor, given at the Lyri last night. This was so from both viewpoints of entertainment and education.

Conductor and orchestra were superlative as ever and the music itself was worthy, but wherein lay entertainment in two hours of comparatively similar texts and styles without decie contrasts, and wherein lay any great amount of education for a general audiece of two thousand and more persons in the rendition of such a mass of material? In the capacity of listener, not every musician even can thoroughly enjoy such a program in the primary sense of enjoyment. Complete contrasts of texts, styles, treatment and so forth, are natural demands which must be met if tiresoneness would be avoided.

Mraczek's Symphonic Burleske (after Wilhelm Busch's Max and Moritz) is a marvelous and beautiful work in many respects, and certainly one of the clearest and brightest of big compositions containing modern tendencies. The instrumentation is wonderful. Even with these things to commend it, however, it would gain in effectiveness if shorter.

It can scarcely be argued to its credit as a work of art that is said to be based upon the pranks of two mischievous boys. What possible artistic purpose can be so served? As outlined in the program notes by Philip Hale, the pranks of the boys rival those of the Katzenjammer Kids, of comic newspaper supplement fame, in their wildest moments. Where is the spirit of art in attempted musical delineation of such?

McDowell's Indian Suite, No. 2, in E minor, followed this composition last night and lost much in effectiveness by so doing. D'Albert's Concerto in C for violoncello came next, further creating the impression of length to the concert, in spite of its many excellencies. Dukas' Scherzo, The Sorcerer's Apprentice (after a ballad by Goethe) completed the program. It lost its effect by resembling in general atmosphere the first number on the program.

Altogether the concert was admirable in its component parts, but enough big material for two concerts was presented.

Otto Urack, 'cellist, one of the gifted members of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening. He played the D'Al-

---

Telephone, 929 Chelsea
Intended for Boston Orchestra
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
Cable Address: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 19 1913

Established:

The Three Arts

A Daily Salmagundi Concerning The Stage, The Concert Hall And The Art Galleries At Home And Abroad.

The "Symphonic Burleske after Wilhelm Busch's 'Max and Moritz,'" by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, which is to be the chief feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric this Wednesday evening, promises to be one of the most curious and interesting examples of modern orchestral work that has been presented here in many years.

It is apparently a burlesque of Richard Strauss in his wildest moments, in spite of the fact that it is dedicated "with the utmost respects" to that famous modern composer. It was first published in 1912, although it was first performed at a concert given toward the end of 1911 by the Bruenn Musikverein. Nikisch gave it with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin last January, and last December it was twice played by the Chicago Orchestra.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Estal 884

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra To Play Program Of Novelties At The Lyric.

The program to be presented at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric this evening is composed almost exclusively of novelties.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has selected the symphonic burlesque "Max and Moritz," by Mraczek, a composer who is practically unknown in Baltimore, for the opening number. This work requires 25 minutes' performance without stop, a fact which, the management points out, it will be wise for late-comers to remember, as no one will be admitted to the hall while the piece is in progress.

Otto Urack, first cellist, the venerable Alwin Schroeder's successor, will be the soloist of the evening. He will play Eugene d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major Op. 20.

Preceding this will come MacDowell's characteristic "Indian" suite in E minor, No. 2. The closing piece will be "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a composition in the manner of a scherzo after a ballad by Goethe, by Dukas, a versatile modern musician whose work is typical of the radical influences of the day. His opera, "Ariane et Barbe Bleue," produced by the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company last year, with Geraldine Farrar in a leading role, created wide discussion not only on account of its music but also because of its story, which had

---

Address: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establi 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first number on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Lyric Theater this evening is Mraczek's symphonic burleske Max and Moritz. This work plays 25 minutes without a stop. Therefore, it will be most desirable that the audience be seated promptly at the beginning of the concert, else there will be a long and tiresome wait before they can be admitted to the hall. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the very talented assistant conductor of the orchestra and one of its principal cellists.

[191]

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 20 1913

Established:

WIERD RENDITION OF ORCHESTRAL ART

Boston Symphony Illuminates Flopping Of Fowls In "Sore Distress."

The symphonic burlesque, "Max und Moritz," by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, the opening number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Lyric last night, was program music with a vengeance.

Those in the audience who, bewildered with the strange cacaphonies of the orchestra, sought illumination from the printed set of "directions," discovered that they were supposed to be listening to fowls flopping about in "sore distress," that ended in their sudden demise; to the weeping of their owner, a widow, as she philosophically determined to fry her pets; to the weird sound of said unfortunate poultry flying up the chimney as Max and Moritz, two impish boys, from the roof, fish them out of the sizzling lard.

As an example, either of the resourcefulness of the modern orchestra or of the astonishing virtuosity of the composer, "Max und Moritz" is enormously interesting. And despite the absurd program it is frequently delightful from an aesthetic standpoint, as there are passages of great beauty that even the coarse harmonic horseplay, the deliberate violation of the laws of rationality, good taste and musical logic cannot spoil.

The next number came as a positive relief to worried ears. It was MacDowell's beautiful Indian Suite No. 2 in E minor. Nothing could furnish better evidence of the magnificent versatility of the Boston Orchestra than a comparison of the manner in which the Mraczek and the MacDowell numbers were played.

The soloist of the evening, Otto Urack, first cellist of the Orchestra, did not make a particularly strong impression. His number, D'Albert's C major concerto, was long, without pauses between the movements, and, it must be confessed, at times tiresome. Mr. Urack's tone in the cantable passages was firm, large and of strong carrying power; but it lost much of its effect in the quick movements, and his bravura work was rather blurred.

The concert was the last of the Boston Symphony's 1912-13 series, and was not quite as largely attended as the preceding ones, doubtless on account of the fact that it took place at the beginning of the most solemn period of the Lenten season.

Announcement of the return of the Orchestra to the Lyric next season is made. The dates will be November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, with Geraldine Farrar, Teresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler and Paderewski as soloists.

NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 20 1913

Established:

LACK OF VARIETY MARRED CONCERT

Too Much Music of the Same Kind in Boston Symphony's Program.

Too much music of the same kind marred the fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, given at the Lyric last night. This was so from both viewpoints of entertainment and education.

Conductor and orchestra were superlative as ever and the music itself was worthy, but wherein lay entertainment in two hours of comparatively similar texts and styles without decie contrasts, and wherein lay any great amount of education for a general audiece of two thousand and more persons in the rendition of such a mass of material? In the capacity of listener, not every musician even can thoroughly enjoy such a program in the primary sense of enjoyment. Complete contrasts of texts, styles, treatment and so forth, are natural demands which must be met if tiresoneness would be avoided.

Mraczek's Symphonic Burleske (after Wilhelm Busch's Max and Moritz) is a marvelous and beautiful work in many respects, and certainly one of the clearest and brightest of big compositions containing modern tendencies. The instrumentation is wonderful. Even with these things to commend it, however, it would gain in effectiveness if shorter.

It can scarcely be argued to its credit as a work of art that is said to be based upon the pranks of two mischievous boys. What possible artistic purpose can be so served? As outlined in the program notes by Philip Hale, the pranks of the boys rival those of the Katzenjammer Kids, of comic newspaper supplement fame, in their wildest moments. Where is the spirit of art in attempted musical delineation of such?

McDowell's Indian Suite, No. 2, in E minor, followed this composition last night and lost much in effectiveness by so doing. D'Albert's Concerto in C for violoncello came next, further creating the impression of length to the concert, in spite of its many excellencies. Dukas' Scherzo, The Sorcerer's Apprentice (after a ballad by Goethe) completed the program. It lost its effect by resembling in general atmosphere the first number on the program.

Altogether the concert was admirable in its component parts, but enough big material for two concerts was presented.

Otto Urack, 'cellist, one of the gifted members of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening. He played the D'Albert concerto with great fluency, fine tone and attention to detail.

J. N. H.

24

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Sym

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

The Three Arts

A Daily Salmagundi Concerning The Stage, The Concert Hall And The Art Galleries At Home And Abroad.

The "Symphonic Burleske after Wilhelm Busch's 'Max and Moritz,'" by Joseph Gustav Mraczek, which is to be the chief feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric this Wednesday evening, promises to be one of the most curious and interesting examples of modern orchestral work that has been presented here in many years.

It is apparently a burlesque of Richard Strauss in his wildest moments, in spite of the fact that it is dedicated "with the utmost respects" to that famous modern composer. It was first published in 1912, although it was first performed at a concert given toward the end of 1911 by the Bruenn Musikverein. Nikisch gave it with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin last January, and last December it was twice played by the Chicago Orchestra.

ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Established

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first number on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Lyric Theater this evening is Mraczek's symphonic burleske Max and Moritz. This work plays 25 minutes without a stop. Therefore, it will be most desirable that the audience be seated promptly at the beginning of the concert, else there will be a long and tiresome wait before they can be admitted to the hall. The soloist will be Otto Urack, the very talented assistant conductor of the orchestra and one of its principal cellists.

Baltimore, Md.

Established 1884

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra To Play Program Of Novelties At The Lyric.

The program to be presented at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric this evening is composed almost exclusively of novelties.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has selected the symphonic burlesque "Max and Moritz," by Mraczek, a composer who is practically unknown in Baltimore, for the opening number. This work requires 25 minutes' performance without stop, a fact which, the management points out, it will be wise for late-comers to remember, as no one will be admitted to the hall while the piece is in progress.

Otto Urack, first cellist, the venerable Alwin Schroeder's successor, will be the soloist of the evening. He will play Eugene d'Albert's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in C major Op. 20.

Preceding this will come MacDowell's characteristic "Indian" suite in E minor, No. 2. The closing piece will be "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a composition in the manner of a scherzo after a ballad by Goethe, by Dukas, a versatile modern musician whose work is typical of the radical influences of the day. His opera, "Ariane et Barbe Bleue," produced by the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company last year, with Geraldine Farrar in a leading role, created wide discussion not only on account of its music but also because of its story, which had

From Record

Address Phila.

Date 3 1913

Established:

"MAX AND MORITZ" IN MUSIC PIECE

Futility of Endeavoring to Express Concrete Things in a Purely Suggestive Art Form.

THE "PROGRAM" FOLLY

Recent Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Occasion for New Comment.

At the Academy of Music last Monday night were exhibited the possibilities of program music ad nauseam. It is not possible to speak of such an exhibition with patience; scarcely possible to speak of it with fairness. But if terms of fairness are used the utmost to be said is that anyone familiar with musical notes and notation can write the sort of music there presented. It is not enough to say that "Max and Moritz" by Mraczek is a desecration of art; it ought also to be said that it is a pretense to shield not only utter inanity but also to conceal a lack, yes, an entire absence of musical conception and capacity. In this instance program music was carried to the excess of absurdity. The composer hitched together every variety of sound and noise and then declared that he had written a "Symphonie Burleske." The mere fact that the composer was so self-deceived is sufficiently lamentable, but when a Philadelphia audience will patiently sit through such a performance by such an accomplished organization as the Boston Orchestra what can the judicious hope for and expect? Suppose the composer had not disclosed in advance the ridiculous conceptions embodied in his musical hallucinations, what would the audience have thought and said about such an unmelodic and unbearable combination of sounds? They would have held their sides and roared over such an execrable substitution for music. But the point was that everybody was concerned, not about the music, since there was none, but about the pranks the noise was supposed to describe. The mental exercise was an endeavor to trace some similarity between the sounds and the pranks. If this is art, then the great masters were surely deficient and worthless. If this was music then the immortal Beethoven symphonies belong to the rubbish heap and the world must reconstruct its musical art. If this is music we are no longer obliged to hope and pray for the reappearance of musical geniuses since anybody can put musical signs together regardless of any result except the ability on the part of the curious to discover some similarity between unmelodic sounds and grotesque bits of human experience. If this be worth the while, all musical endeavor has found solution and reached its destiny in the mere mimicry of unimportant things. Finally, if this be music, anyone can gather from the streets and byways a lot of boys with every variety of noise-making instrument and beat the exhibition given in the Academy out of sight, for the reason that the boys would come much nearer mimicking the absurdities of experience and pranks. There was never a calathumpian band that could not excel in noise and entertainment the Boston Orchestra in "Max and Moritz."

What is music? Can it be made to order? Can it be limited to specific ideation? Can every one create it? Is it the expression of high genius or the warblings of mediocrity? Can it be hammered out on a keyboard? Or is music the inspiration of the greatest souls? Is it the voice of God in man and man's symbolic worship of the majesty of Truth? Is it some sublime impulse clothed in harmony? Is it some beautiful outreach of the mind into the Infinite? When one gazes at the wonderful cathedrals in Rome Milan, Florence or Cologne, or any o the immortal structures of antiquity what is it that renders him speechless fills him with awe and a sense of won der? The question may be answere in a hundred ways; yet it cannot b answered in any way! Some myster ous power breathes from these marve ous expressions of thought and em tion. Art is never great unless in som indefinable way it suggests the u searchable mysteries and leads t mind into higher and nobler state Suppose St. Peter's, at Rome, were u dermined with dynamite and riven in millions of pieces and shapes, wou you have art; would you have arc tecture; would you have emotions awe or pleasure when you gazed up the desolation? Or, suppose t original Sistine Madonna be placed by the side of some Futurist splotch, would the latter become art; could it in any sense arouse the thought and emotions that well resistlessly when one gazes at the former majestic creation? Yet, in either case, the destruction of St. Peter's, or the exhibition of the splotch, there is law, and in that sense harmony and form. There is nothing lawless in the universe. Even crime and disease are expressions of law. Nor is there any accident in the domain of things conceivable unless it be program music. If program music is not an accident it ought to be. Its quick demise in the future will at least classify it with those accidental eccentricities which follow every form of art in the course of ...ment.

But the reply is, "we must have pictures, we must have conceptions when we listen to music." The answer is: "To be sure; we not only must have suggestions and conceptions when we hear music, but we always do have them, nor can there be music without them." All music is suggestiveness. It cannot be anything else. But it is a suggestiveness of beauty and majesty and inspiration. Its suggestiveness is found in the finish, sensibilities and capacities of the human mind. The great symphonies of history more or less vaguely suggest a great variety of fleeting and noble thoughts, variant with the capacities of the mind and the sensibilities of the soul. This is due to the great sweep of melody and harmony, the unutterable combination of sounds that drove the genius of great men in worshipful appeal to the sacredness of truth. But the instant there is introduced into these marvelous combinations of melody and harmony the cackle of a hen, the mew of a cat, or the explosion of a pipe filled with gunpowder or other grotesque things, you have not only destroyed music, abolished its appeal, removed its power to uplift, but you have made it the instrument of absurdity and reduced the divine art of music to mimicry, pantomime and insufferable annoyance. The "Max and Moritz" symphonic burlesque was mere sound dynamited. It is impossible to make anything else out of it.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date MAR 5

Esta

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzosoprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past se
She will sing a group of songs
orchestra by Schubert, Wagn
"Traume" and two Beethoven son

Dr. Muck has placed on this gram what is generally regarde
the finest piece of humorous m
that has been written since Eulenspiegel." This is a symph
burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mra entitled "Max and Moritz." Of composer of this piece little known except that he is a violi
who lives in Bruenn, where he teacher in the Bruenn Musikve
and the new conservatory of music

Has Written Opera

His published compositions co prise an opera, "Der Traum," f produced at the Royal Opera, B lin, in the early part of 1912; s eral pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for children. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, gluckenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

The full program of the concert is as follows:

Symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz,"
Mrazek
Overture, "In the Spring"..........Goldmark
Songs with orchestra..............Schubert
"Raste Krieger."
"Jager, ruhe, von der Jagd."
"Ave Maria."
Episode from Lenau's "Faust." Scene in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz)........Liszt
Songs with orchestra:
Wagner, "Traume"
Beethoven, "Freud voll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret"
"L'Apprenti Sorcier: Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) ....Duka
Soloist

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date 3 20 1913

Estab
1884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next Fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips...

---

3 Boston Orchestra

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ~~T[illegible]NE~~ NEWS

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 22 1913

E
1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A singer new to Providence will be the soloist at the fifth and last Boston symphony concert in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, April 1. This is Julia Culp, whose success in New York, Boston and Chicago in the past three months has been a very remarkable feature of the season.

Miss Culp is of Dutch nationality, and has held for several years a very prominent place among singers of Europe, but when she first came to America in January she was practically unknown to the general public.

It is safe to say that no singer in recent years has received such a warm welcome as she. From comparatively small beginnings she is now able to fill Carnegie hall in New York, Symphony hall in Boston, and Orchestra hall in Chicago, at one of her recitals. She is a woman of most attractive personality, the possessor of a rich, beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, and is a past mistress of the art of singing and interpreting.

She will sing three Schubert songs with orchestra, including the "Ave Maria," Wagner's "Traume" and two of Beethoven's songs from "Egmont." The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter," and the program will end with Dukas' merry scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Newspaper Cutting

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establ

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which wound up its local season last Wednesday evening, announces the soloists for next winter's five concerts. It is a distinguished list: Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Ignace Jan Paderewski. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, March 16. Present subscribers may retain the seats they now hold by notifying C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston, before June 1.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 29, 1913.

19TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major............Schubert
Piano concerto.................Schumann
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn

Dr. Muck gave an uncommonly fine reading of Schubert's symphony. The performance was conspicuous for clarity and euphony. It was exquisite in nuances and effects of color. Some, when a program of this nature is arranged, go back to the ancients and as they go revile the ultra-moderns. This is unnecessary. It is possible to enjoy d'Indy and Schubert, Debussy and Schumann. Furthermore, if Schubert and Schumann were now living they would not write as they wrote. It would be impossible for them to do so. Schubert was an improvisator, and, like a clergyman preaching without notes, and improving a public occasion, he was not easily persuaded to stop. It may be said of this symphony that the incessant employment of the wood-wind induces a monotony that fatigues the ear in spite of the melodic wealth.

Schubert in his own time was a modern in his defiance of the traditions concerning the relations of tonalities. What might he not have written if he had had the gift of self-criticism! He did not hear his more elaborate works, and he had little opportunity of thus forming a judgment.

And Schumann in his own day and generation was considered a dangerous fellow, a man of chaotic music, drunken with dissonance. As for Mendelssohn, he would be a prig today. He would still write according to the later Mendelssohnian formulas, and turn his back on the "Hebrides" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. He would still be secretly envious of Schumann, and a foe to Berlioz.

If Schumann had only escaped the influence of Mendelssohn! If he had only had the courage to write as he began, giving the reins to his fancy! Yet we have the piano pieces and the songs, and, having them, let us rejoice. We also have the piano concerto. Mr. Wilks's performance of this romantic work was disting...

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 24. 1913

DR. MUCK'S OPPORTUNITY

Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, at Leipzig. On May 22, 1913, and for some days before and for some days afterward, the centenary of his birth will be celebrated in every European capital of music. In America, on the other hand, celebrations seem likely to be surprisingly few. From the American point of view, Wagner had the misfortune to be born in a month outside the regular musical season. By May 22 all our opera houses will be shut and emptied and their forces scattered to the four corners of Europe. If any of them would commemorate the Wagner centenary, they must defer their "festival performances" until November, a half year after the actual anniversary. The symphony orchestras are in little better case. All of them will have ended their concerts by the first of May, three weeks before the centennial date actually befalls. They will not resume them until the middle of October five months afterward. O, thoughtless, careless Wagner, thus to be born altogether out of season for a country that hears your music gladly and is so keen about anniversaries.

Now, here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra continues its concerts longer than does any other on this side of the Atlantic. The final pair are appointed this year for May 2 and 3, less than three weeks before the centennial day. It has been its custom to make these concerts a climax to the series, or at least something outside its ordinary course. Why, then, should they not be made this spring commemorative concerts for Wagner, with a programme made entirely of his music and with the same festival setting of the stage as at the Liszt centenary concerts eighteen months ago? The foremost orchestra in America ought in some way to join in this universal commemoration.

Moreover, there is no conductor in America so eloquent with Wagner's music as is Dr. Muck. True, he will not take inappropriate excerpts from Wagner's operas out of the theatre and into the concert-room. Yet there are overtures, preludes and purely orchestral fragments enough to furnish forth a programme and more. True, the orchestra and the conductor played many of these at a Pension Fund concert last November; but they have not played them in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Even if they had, why should they not be played again in the new circumstances of the anniversary? If Dr. Muck would so order his final concerts, then our musical year would end unusually and impressively and the Wagner centenary, about which the whole musical world of Europe is busy, would not pass unnoted in at least one American city.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MARCH 29, 1913.

ENGLISH PIANIST IN SYMPHONY DEBUT

Matinee Audience Applauds His Playing in Most Enthusiastic Manner.

Norman Wilks, a young Englishman, whose piano playing is genial and ingratiating as a summer zephyr, is making his first bows here this week at the Symphony concertos. He was happy in his choice of the popular Schumann concerto in A minor, and yesterday the matinee audience applauded him generously. He is only 25 years old, and though his technique is well developed, his imaginative and emotional power is still in a blissful state of juvenility.

The program this week is one of the most melodious of the season. There are tunes galore in the Schubert symphony in C major—enough to make a half dozen modern symphonies or operas, indeed; and the mellifluous flow of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture is a familiar delight. Mr. Chadwick's new symphonic poem "Aphrodite," which was announced for this week's concerts and was postponed on account of illness of the composer, will be given the coming week.

Another interesting feature of the twentieth program will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony, "Anter," which has been played here but once, fifteen years ago. The other numbers will be Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Warnke playing the 'cello solo, and the "Oberon" overture, by Weber.

From Record
Address Phila. Pa ~~BOSTON, MASS.~~
Date MAR 23 1913
Established:

"MAX AND MORITZ" IN MUSIC PIECE

Futility of Endeavoring to Express Concrete Things in a Purely Suggestive Art Form.

THE "PROGRAM" FOLLY

Recent Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Occasion for New Comment.

At the Academy of Music last Monday night were exhibited the possibilities of program music ad nauseam. It is not possible to speak of such an exhibition with patience; scarcely possible to speak of it with fairness. But if terms of fairness are used the utmost to be said is that anyone familiar with musical notes and notation can write the sort of music there presented. It is not enough to say that "Max and Moritz" by Mraczek is a desecration of art; it ought also to be said that it is a pretense to shield not only utter inanity but also to conceal a lack, yes, an entire absence of musical conception and capacity. In this instance program music was carried to the excess of absurdity. The composer hitched together every variety of sound and noise and then declared that he had written a "Symphonie Burleske." The mere fact that the composer was so self-deceived is sufficiently lamentable, but when a Philadelphia audience will patiently sit through such a performance by such an accomplished organization as the Boston Orchestra what can the judicious hope for and expect? Suppose the composer had not disclosed in advance the ridiculous conceptions embodied in his musical hallucinations, what would the audience have thought and said about such an unmelodic and unbearable combination of sounds? They would have held their sides and roared over such an execrable substitution for music. But the point was that everybody was concerned, not about the music, since there was none, but about the pranks the noise was supposed to describe. The mental exercise was an endeavor to trace some similarity between the sounds and the pranks. If this is art, then the great masters were surely deficient and worthless. If this was music then the immortal Beethoven symphonies belong to the rubbish heap and the world must reconstruct its musical art. If this is music we are no longer obliged to hope and pray for the reappearance of musical geniuses since anybody can put musical signs together regardless of any result except the ability on the part of the curious to discover some similarity between unmelodic sounds and grotesque bits of human experience. If this be worth the while, all musical endeavor has found solution and reached its destiny in the mere mimicry of unimportant things. Finally, if this be music, anyone can gather from the streets and byways a lot of boys with every variety of noise-making instrument and beat the exhibition given in the Academy out of sight, for the reason that the boys would come much nearer mimicking the absurdities of experience and pranks. There was never a calathumpian band that could not excel in noise and entertainment the

---

Boston Orchestra in "Max and Moritz."

What is music? Can it be made to order? Can it be limited to specific ideation? Can every one create it? Is it the expression of high genius or the warblings of mediocrity? Can it be hammered out on a keyboard? Or is music the inspiration of the greatest souls? Is it the voice of God in man and man's symbolic worship of the majesty of Truth? Is it some sublime impulse clothed in harmony? Is it some beautiful outreach of the mind into the Infinite? When one gazes at the wonderful cathedrals in Rome, Milan, Florence or Cologne, or any of the immortal structures of antiquity, what is it that renders him speechless, fills him with awe and a sense of wonder? The question may be answered in a hundred ways; yet it cannot be answered in any way! Some mysterious power breathes from these marvelous expressions of thought and emotion. Art is never great unless in some indefinable way it suggests the unsearchable mysteries and leads the mind into higher and nobler states. Suppose St. Peter's, at Rome, were undermined with dynamite and riven into millions of pieces and shapes, would you have art; would you have architecture; would you have emotions of awe or pleasure when you gazed upon the desolation? Or, suppose the original Sistine Madonna be placed by the side of some Futurist splotch, would the latter become art; could it in any sense arouse the thought and emotions that well resistlessly when one gazes at the former majestic creation? Yet, in either case, the destruction of St. Peter's, or the exhibition of the splotch, there is law, and in that sense harmony and form. There is nothing lawless in the universe. Even crime and disease are expressions of law. Nor is there any accident in the domain of things conceivable unless it be program music. If program music is not an accident it ought to be. Its quick demise in the future will at least classify it with those accidental eccentricities which follow every form of art in [illegible] course of [illegible]ment.

But the reply is, "we must have pictures, we must have conceptions when we listen to music." The answer is: "To be sure; we not only must have suggestions and conceptions when we hear music, but we always do have them, nor can there be music without them." All music is suggestiveness. It cannot be anything else. But it is a suggestiveness of beauty and majesty and inspiration. Its suggestiveness is found in the finish, sensibilities and capacities of the human mind. The great symphonies of history more or less vaguely suggest a great variety of fleeting and noble thoughts, variant with the capacities of the mind and the sensibilities of the soul. This is due to the great sweep of melody and harmony, the unutterable combination of sounds that drove the genius of great men in worshipful appeal to the sacredness of truth. But the instant there is introduced into these marvelous combinations of melody and harmony the cackle of a hen, the mew of a cat, or the explosion of a pipe filled with gunpowder or other grotesque things, you have not only destroyed music, abolished its appeal, removed its power to uplift, but you have made it the instrument of absurdity and reduced the divine art of music to mimicry, pantomime and insufferable annoyance. The "Max and Moritz" symphonic burlesque was mere sound dynamited. It is impossible to make anything else out of it.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date MAR 15 191
Esta

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzosoprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past se She will sing a group of songs orchestra by Schubert, Wagn "Traume" and two Beethoven son

Dr. Muck has placed on this gram what is generally regarde the finest piece of humorous m that has been written since Eulenspiegel." This is a symph burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mra entitled "Max and Moritz." Of composer of this piece little known except that he is a violi who lives in Bruenn, where he teacher in the Bruenn Musikve and the new conservatory of music

Has Written Opera

His published compositions co prise an opera, "Der Traum," produced at the Royal Opera, B lin, in the early part of 1912; s eral pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for children. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, gluckenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

The full program of the concert is as follows:

Symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," Mrazek
Overture, "In the Spring" .... Goldmark
Songs with orchestra .... Schubert
"Raste Krieger."
"Jager, ruhe, von der Jagd."
"Ave Maria."
Episode from Lenau's "Faust." Scene in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz) .... Liszt
Songs with orchestra:
Wagner, "Traume"
Beethoven, "Freud voll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret"
"L'Appreni Sorcier: Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) .... Duka
Soloist—Juli[illegible]

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date R 20 1913
Estab 1884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next Fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips [illegible]

Boston Orchestra
TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA
Intended for
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."
HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ~~T[illegible]UNE~~ NEWS
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 22 1913
E 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A singer new to Providence will be the soloist at the fifth and last Boston symphony concert in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, April 1. This is Julia Culp, whose success in New York, Boston and Chicago in the past three months has been a very remarkable feature of the season.

Miss Culp is of Dutch nationality, and has held for several years a very prominent place among singers of Europe, but when she first came to America in January she was practically unknown to the general public.

It is safe to say that no singer in recent years has received such a warm welcome as she. From comparatively small beginnings she is now able to fill Carnegie hall in New York, Symphony hall in Boston, and Orchestra hall in Chicago, at one of her recitals. She is a woman of most attractive personality, the possessor of a rich, beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, and is a past mistress of the art of singing and interpreting.

She will sing three Schubert songs with orchestra, including the "Ave Maria," Wagner's "Traume" and two of Beethoven's songs from "Egmont." The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter," and the program will end with Dukas' merry scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Newspaper Cutting
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 1913
Establ

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which wound up its local season last Wednesday evening, announces the soloists for next winter's five concerts. It is a distinguished list: Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Ignace Jan Paderewski. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, March 16. Present subscribers may retain the seats they now hold by notifying C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston, before June 1.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 29, 1913.

19TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major .... Schubert
Piano concerto .... Schumann
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn

Dr. Muck gave an uncommonly fine reading of Schubert's symphony. The performance was conspicuous for clarity and euphony. It was exquisite in nuances and effects of color. Some, when a program of this nature is arranged, go back to the ancients and as they go revile the ultra-moderns. This is unnecessary. It is possible to enjoy d'Indy and Schubert, Debussy and Schumann. Furthermore, if Schubert and Schumann were now living they would not write as they wrote. It would be impossible for them to do so. Schubert was an improvisator, and, like a clergyman preaching without notes, and improving a public occasion, he was not easily persuaded to stop. It may be said of this symphony that the incessant employment of the wood-wind induces a monotony that fatigues the ear in spite of the melodic wealth.

Schubert in his own time was a modern in his defiance of the traditions concerning the relations of tonalities. What might he not have written if he had had the gift of self-criticism! He did not hear his more elaborate works, and he had little opportunity of thus forming a judgment.

And Schumann in his own day and generation was considered a dangerous fellow, a man of chaotic music, drunken with dissonance. As for Mendelssohn, he would be a prig today. He would still write according to the later Mendelssohnian formulas, and turn his back on the "Hebrides" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. He would still be secretly envious of Schumann, and a foe to Berlioz.

If Schumann had only escaped the influence of Mendelssohn! If he had only had the courage to write as he began, giving the reins to his fancy! Yet we have the piano pieces and the songs, and, having them, let us rejoice. We also have the piano concerto. Mr. Wilks's performance of this romantic work was [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 24, 1913

DR. MUCK'S OPPORTUNITY

Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, at Leipsig. On May 22, 1913, and for some days before and for some days afterward, the centenary of his birth will be celebrated in every European capital of music. In America, on the other hand, celebrations seem likely to be surprisingly few. From the American point of view Wagner had the misfortune to be born in a month outside the regular musical season. By May 22 all our opera houses will be shut and emptied and their forces scattered to the four corners of Europe. If any of them would commemorate the Wagner centenary, they must defer their "festival performances" until November, a half year after the actual anniversary. The symphony orchestras are in little better case. All of them will have ended their concerts by the first of May, three weeks before the centennial date actually befalls. They will not resume them until the middle of October five months afterward. O, thoughtless, careless Wagner, thus to be born altogether out of season for a country that hears your music gladly and is so keen about anniversaries.

Now, here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra continues its concerts longer than does any other on this side of the Atlantic. The final pair are appointed this year for May 2 and 3, less than three weeks before the centennial day. It has been its custom to make these concerts a climax to the series, or at least something outside its ordinary course. Why, then, should they not be made this spring commemorative concerts for Wagner, with a programme made entirely of his music and with the same festival setting of the stage as at the Liszt centenary concerts eighteen months ago? The foremost orchestra in America ought in some way to join in this universal commemoration.

Moreover, there is no conductor in America so eloquent with Wagner's music as is Dr. Muck. True, he will not take inappropriate excerpts from Wagner's operas out of the theatre and into the concert-room. Yet there are overtures, preludes and purely orchestral fragments enough to furnish forth a programme and more. True, the orchestra and the conductor played many of these at a Pension Fund concert last November; but they have not played them in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Even if they had, why should they not be played again in the new circumstances of the anniversary? If Dr. Muck would so order his final concerts, then our musical year would end unusually and impressively and the Wagner centenary, about which the whole musical world of Europe is busy, would not pass unnoted in at least one American city.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MARCH 29, 1913.

ENGLISH PIANIST IN SYMPHONY DEBUT

Matinee Audience Applauds His Playing in Most Enthusiastic Manner.

Norman Wilks, a young Englishman, whose piano playing is genial and ingratiating as a summer zephyr, is making his first bows here this week at the Symphony concertos. He was happy in his choice of the popular Schumann concerto in A minor, and yesterday the matinee audience applauded him generously. He is only 25 years old, and though his technique is well developed, his imaginative and emotional power is still in a blissful state of juvenility.

The program this week is one of the most melodious of the season. There are tunes galore in the Schubert symphony in C major—enough to make a half dozen modern symphonies or operas, indeed; and the mellifluous flow of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture is a familiar delight.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphonic poem "Aphrodite," which was announced for this week's concerts and was postponed on account of illness of the composer, will ge given the coming week.

Another interesting feature of the twentieth program will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony, "Anter," which has been played here but once, fifteen years ago. The other numbers will be Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Warnke playing the 'cello solo, and the "Oberon" overture, by Weber.

From Record
Address Phila, Pa ~~BOSTON, MASS.~~
Date MAR 23 1913
Established:

"MAX AND MORITZ" IN MUSIC PIECE

Futility of Endeavoring to Express Concrete Things in a Purely Suggestive Art Form.

THE "PROGRAM" FOLLY

Recent Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Occasion for New Comment.

At the Academy of Music last Monday night were exhibited the possibilities of program music ad nauseam. It is not possible to speak of such an exhibition with patience; scarcely possible to speak of it with fairness. But if terms of fairness are used the utmost to be said is that anyone familiar with musical notes and notation can write the sort of music there presented. It is not enough to say that "Max and Moritz" by Mraczek is a desecration of art; it ought also to be said that it is a pretense to shield not only utter inanity but also to conceal a lack, yes, an entire absence of musical conception and capacity. In this instance program music was carried to the excess of absurdity. The composer hitched together every variety of sound and noise and then declared that he had written a "Symphonie Burleske." The mere fact that the composer was so self-deceived is sufficiently lamentable, but when a Philadelphia audience will patiently sit through such a performance by such an accomplished organization as the Boston Orchestra what can the judicious hope for and expect? Suppose the composer had not disclosed in advance the ridiculous conceptions embodied in his musical hallucinations, what would the audience have thought and said about such an unmelodic and unbearable combination of sounds? They would have held their sides and roared over such an execrable substitution for music. But the point was that everybody was concerned, not about the music, since there was none, but about the pranks the noise was supposed to describe. The mental exercise was an endeavor to trace some similarity between the sounds and the pranks. If this is art, then the great masters were surely deficient and worthless. If this was music then the immortal Beethoven symphonies belong to the rubbish heap and the world must reconstruct its musical art. If this is music we are no longer obliged to hope and pray for the reappearance of musical geniuses since anybody can put musical signs together regardless of any result except the ability on the part of the curious to discover some similarity between unmelodic sounds and grotesque bits of human experience. If this be worth the while, all musical endeavor has found solution and reached its destiny in the mere mimicry of unimportant things. Finally, if this be music, anyone can gather from the streets and byways a lot of boys with every variety of noise-making instrument and beat the exhibition given in the Academy out of sight, for the reason that the boys would come much nearer mimicking the absurdities of experience and pranks. There was never a calathumpian band that could not excel in noise and entertainment the

---

Boston Orchestra in "Max and Moritz."

What is music? Can it be made to order? Can it be limited to specific ideation? Can every one create it? Is it the expression of high genius or the warblings of mediocrity? Can it be hammered out on a keyboard? Or is music the inspiration of the greatest souls? Is it the voice of God in man and man's symbolic worship of the majesty of Truth? Is it some sublime impulse clothed in harmony? Is it some beautiful outreach of the mind into the Infinite? When one gazes at the wonderful cathedrals in Rome, Milan, Florence or Cologne, or any of the immortal structures of antiquity, what is it that renders him speechless, fills him with awe and a sense of wonder? The question may be answered in a hundred ways; yet it cannot be answered in any way! Some mysterious power breathes from these marvelous expressions of thought and emotion. Art is never great unless in some indefinable way it suggests the unsearchable mysteries and leads the mind into higher and nobler states. Suppose St. Peter's, at Rome, were undermined with dynamite and riven into millions of pieces and shapes, would you have art; would you have architecture; would you have emotions of awe or pleasure when you gazed upon the desolation? Or, suppose the original Sistine Madonna be placed by the side of some Futurist splotch, would the latter become art; could it in any sense arouse the thought and emotions that well resistlessly when one gazes at the former majestic creation? Yet, in either case, the destruction of St. Peter's, or the exhibition of the splotch, there is law, and in that sense harmony and form. There is nothing lawless in the universe. Even crime and disease are expressions of law. Nor is there any accident in the domain of things conceivable unless it be program music. If program music is not an accident it ought to be. Its quick demise in the future will at least classify it with those accidental eccentricities which follow every form of art in the course of [illegible]ment.

But the reply is, "we must have pictures, we must have conceptions when we listen to music." The answer is: "To be sure; we not only must have suggestions and conceptions when we hear music, but we always do have them, nor can there be music without them." All music is suggestiveness. It cannot be anything else. But it is a suggestiveness of beauty and majesty and inspiration. Its suggestiveness is found in the finish, sensibilities and capacities of the human mind. The great symphonies of history more or less vaguely suggest a great variety of fleeting and noble thoughts, variant with the capacities of the mind and the sensibilities of the soul. This is due to the great sweep of melody and harmony, the unutterable combination of sounds that drove the genius of great men in worshipful appeal to the sacredness of truth. But the instant there is introduced into these marvelous combinations of melody and harmony the cackle of a hen, the mew of a cat, or the explosion of a pipe filled with gunpowder or other grotesque things, you have not only destroyed music, abolished its appeal, removed its power to uplift, but you have made it the instrument of absurdity and reduced the divine art of music to mimicry, pantomime and insufferable annoyance. The "Max and Moritz" symphonic burlesque was mere sound dynamited. It is impossible to make anything else out of it.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date MAR 5 1913
Esta

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzosoprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past se
She will sing a group of songs
orchestra by Schubert, Wagn
"Traume" and two Beethoven son

Dr. Muck has placed on this gram what is generally regarde
the finest piece of humorous m
that has been written since
Eulenspiegel." This is a symph
burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mra entitled "Max and Moritz." Of composer of this piece little known except that he is a violi
who lives in Bruenn, where he teacher in the Bruenn Musikve
and the new conservatory of music

Has Written Opera

His published compositions c prise an opera, "Der Traum," produced at the Royal Opera, B
lin, in the early part of 1912;
eral pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for children. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, gluckenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

The full program of the concert is as follows:

Symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," ....Mrazek
Overture, "In the Spring" ....Goldmark
Songs with orchestra ....Schubert
"Raste Krieger."
"Jager, ruhe, von der Jagd."
"Ave Maria."
Episode from Lenau's "Faust." Scene in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz) ....Liszt
Songs with orchestra:
Wagner, "Traume"
Beethoven, "Freud voll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret"
"L'Appreni Sorcier: Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) ....Duka
Soloist—Juli[illegible]

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date 3 20 1913
Estab 1884

Rumor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been some variations regarding just where in Europe he is going next Fall, but all the reports seem to be unanimous concerning his leaving Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. The gossips [illegible]

Boston Orchestra

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ~~T[illegible]NE~~ News
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 22 1913
E 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A singer new to Providence will be the soloist at the fifth and last Boston symphony concert in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, April 1. This is Julia Culp, whose success in New York, Boston and Chicago in the past three months has been a very remarkable feature of the season.

Miss Culp is of Dutch nationality, and has held for several years a very prominent place among singers of Europe, but when she first came to America in January she was practically unknown to the general public.

It is safe to say that no singer in recent years has received such a warm welcome as she. From comparatively small beginnings she is now able to fill Carnegie hall in New York, Symphony hall in Boston, and Orchestra hall in Chicago, at one of her recitals. She is a woman of most attractive personality, the possessor of a rich, beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, and is a past mistress of the art of singing and interpreting.

She will sing three Schubert songs with orchestra, including the "Ave Maria." Wagner's "Traume" and two of Beethoven's songs from "Egmont." The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter," and the program will end with Dukas' merry scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Newspaper Cutting

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Establ

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which wound up its local season last Wednesday evening, announces the soloists for next winter's five concerts. It is a distinguished list: Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Ignace Jan Paderewski. The dates are November 3, December 1. January 5, February 16, March 16. Present subscribers may retain the seats they now hold by notifying C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston, before June 1.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 29, 1913.

19TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major ....Schubert
Piano concerto ....Schumann
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn

Dr. Muck gave an uncommonly fine reading of Schubert's symphony. The performance was conspicuous for clarity and euphony. It was exquisite in nuances and effects of color. Some, when a program of this nature is arranged, go back to the ancients and as they go revile the ultra-moderns. This is unnecessary. It is possible to enjoy d'Indy and Schubert, Debussy and Schumann. Furthermore, if Schubert and Schumann were now living they would not write as they wrote. It would be impossible for them to do so. Schubert was an improvisator, and, like a clergyman preaching without notes, and improving a public occasion, he was not easily persuaded to stop. It may be said of this symphony that the incessant employment of the wood-wind induces a monotony that fatigues the ear in spite of the melodic wealth.

Schubert in his own time was a modern in his defiance of the traditions concerning the relations of tonalities. What might he not have written if he had had the gift of self-criticism! He did not hear his more elaborate works, and he had little opportunity of thus forming a judgment.

And Schumann in his own day and generation was considered a dangerous fellow, a man of chaotic music, drunken with dissonance. As for Mendelssohn, he would be a prig today. He would still write according to the later Mendelssohnian formulas, and turn his back on the "Hebrides" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. He would still be secretly envious of Schumann, and a foe to Berlioz.

If Schumann had only escaped the influence of Mendelssohn! If he had only had the courage to write as he began, giving the reins to his fancy! Yet we have the piano pieces and the songs, and, having them, let us rejoice. We also have the piano concerto. Mr. Wilks's performance of this romantic work was [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 24. 1913

DR. MUCK'S OPPORTUNITY

Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, at Leipzig. On May 22, 1913, and for some days before and for some days afterward, the centenary of his birth will be celebrated in every European capital of music. In America, on the other hand, celebrations seem likely to be surprisingly few. From the American point of view, Wagner had the misfortune to be born in a month outside the regular musical season. By May 22 all our opera houses will be shut and emptied and their forces scattered to the four corners of Europe. If any of them would commemorate the Wagner centenary, they must defer their "festival performances" until November, a half year after the actual anniversary. The symphony orchestras are in little better case. All of them will have ended their concerts by the first of May, three weeks before the centennial date actually befalls. They will not resume them until the middle of October five months afterward. O, thoughtless, careless Wagner, thus to be born altogether out of season for a country that hears your music gladly and is so keen about anniversaries.

Now, here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra continues its concerts longer than does any other on this side of the Atlantic. The final pair are appointed this year for May 2 and 3, less than three weeks before the centennial day. It has been its custom to make these concerts a climax to the series, or at least something outside its ordinary course. Why, then, should they not be made this spring commemorative concerts for Wagner, with a programme made entirely of his music and with the same festival setting of the stage as at the Liszt centenary concerts eighteen months ago? The foremost orchestra in America ought in some way to join in this universal commemoration.

Moreover, there is no conductor in America so eloquent with Wagner's music as is Dr. Muck. True, he will not take inappropriate excerpts from Wagner's operas out of the theatre and into the concert-room. Yet there are overtures, preludes and purely orchestral fragments enough to furnish forth a programme and more. True, the orchestra and the conductor played many of these at a Pension Fund concert last November; but they have not played them in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Even if they had, why should they not be played again in the new circumstances of the anniversary? If Dr. Muck would so order his final concerts, then our musical year would end unusually and impressively and the Wagner centenary, about which the whole musical world of Europe is busy, would not pass unnoted in at least one American city.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MARCH 29, 1913.

ENGLISH PIANIST IN SYMPHONY DEBUT

Matinee Audience Applauds His Playing in Most Enthusiastic Manner.

Norman Wilks, a young Englishman, whose piano playing is genial and ingratiating as a summer zephyr, is making his first bows here this week at the Symphony concertos. He was happy in his choice of the popular Schumann concerto in A minor, and yesterday the matinee audience applauded him generously. He is only 25 years old, and though his technique is well developed, his imaginative and emotional power is still in a blissful state of juvenility.

The program this week is one of the most melodious of the season. There are tunes galore in the Schubert symphony in C major—enough to make a half dozen modern symphonies or operas, indeed; and the mellifluous flow of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture is a familiar delight.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphonic poem "Aphrodite," which was announced for this week's concerts and was postponed on account of illness of the composer, will ge given the coming week.

Another interesting feature of the twentieth program will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony, "Anter," which has been played here but once, fifteen years ago. The other numbers will be Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Warnke playing the 'cello solo, and the "Oberon" overture, by Weber.

From Record

Address Phila, Pa ~~BOSTON, MASS.~~

Date MAR 23 1913

Established:

"MAX AND MORITZ" IN MUSIC PIECE

Futility of Endeavoring to Express Concrete Things in a Purely Suggestive Art Form.

THE "PROGRAM" FOLLY

Recent Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Occasion for New Comment.

At the Academy of Music last Monday night were exhibited the possibilities of program music ad nauseam. It is not possible to speak of such an exhibition with patience; scarcely possible to speak of it with fairness. But if terms of fairness are used the utmost to be said is that anyone familiar with musical notes and notation can write the sort of music there presented. It is not enough to say that "Max and Moritz" by Mraczek is a desecration of art; it ought also to be said that it is a pretense to shield not only utter inanity but also to conceal a lack, yes, an entire absence of musical conception and capacity. In this instance program music was carried to the excess of absurdity. The composer hitched together every variety of sound and noise and then declared that he had written a "Symphonie Burleske." The mere fact that the composer was so self-deceived is sufficiently lamentable, but when a Philadelphia audience will patiently sit through such a performance by such an accomplished organization as the Boston Orchestra what can the judicious hope for and expect? Suppose the composer had not disclosed in advance the ridiculous conceptions embodied in his musical hallucinations, what would the audience have thought and said about such an unmelodic and unbearable combination of sounds? They would have held their sides and roared over such an execrable substitution for music. But the point was that everybody was concerned, not about the music, since there was none, but about the pranks the noise was supposed to describe. The mental exercise was an endeavor to trace some similarity between the sounds and the pranks. If this is art, then the great masters were surely deficient and worthless. If this was music then the immortal Beethoven symphonies belong to the rubbish heap and the world must reconstruct its musical art. If this is music we are no longer obliged to hope and pray for the reappearance of musical geniuses since anybody can put musical signs together regardless of any result except the ability on the part of the curious to discover some similarity between unmelodic sounds and grotesque bits of human experience. If this be worth the while, all musical endeavor has found solution and reached its destiny in the mere mimicry of unimportant things. Finally, if this be music, anyone can gather from the streets and byways a lot of boys with every variety of noise-making instrument and beat the exhibition given in the Academy out of sight, for the reason that the boys would come much nearer mimicking the absurdities of experience and pranks. There was never a calathumpian band that could not excel in noise and entertainment the

---

Boston Orchestra in "Max and Moritz."

What is music? Can it be made to order? Can it be limited to specific ideation? Can every one create it? Is it the expression of high genius or the warblings of mediocrity? Can it be hammered out on a keyboard? Or is music the inspiration of the greatest souls? Is it the voice of God in man and man's symbolic worship of the majesty of Truth? Is it some sublime impulse clothed in harmony? Is it some beautiful outreach of the mind into the Infinite? When one gazes at the wonderful cathedrals in Rome, Milan, Florence or Cologne, or any of the immortal structures of antiquity, what is it that renders him speechless, fills him with awe and a sense of wonder? The question may be answered in a hundred ways; yet it cannot be answered in any way! Some mysterious power breathes from these marvelous expressions of thought and emotion. Art is never great unless in some indefinable way it suggests the unsearchable mysteries and leads the mind into higher and nobler states. Suppose St. Peter's, at Rome, were undermined with dynamite and riven into millions of pieces and shapes, would you have art; would you have architecture; would you have emotions of awe or pleasure when you gazed upon the desolation? Or, suppose the original Sistine Madonna be placed by the side of some Futurist splotch, would the latter become art; could it in any sense arouse the thought and emotions that well resistlessly when one gazes at the former majestic creation? Yet, in either case, the destruction of St. Peter's, or the exhibition of the splotch, there is law, and in that sense harmony and form. There is nothing lawless in the universe. Even crime and disease are expressions of law. Nor is there any accident in the domain of things conceivable unless it be program music. If program music is not an accident it ought to be. Its quick demise in the future will at least classify it with those accidental eccentricities which follow every form of art in [illegible] course of [illegible]ment.

But the reply is, "we must have pictures, we must have conceptions when we listen to music." The answer is: "To be sure; we not only must have suggestions and conceptions when we hear music, but we always do have them, nor can there be music without them." All music is suggestiveness. It cannot be anything else. But it is a suggestiveness of beauty and majesty and inspiration. Its suggestiveness is found in the finish, sensibilities and capacities of the human mind. The great symphonies of history more or less vaguely suggest a great variety of fleeting and noble thoughts, variant with the capacities of the mind and the sensibilities of the soul. This is due to the great sweep of melody and harmony, the unutterable combination of sounds that drove the genius of great men in worshipful appeal to the sacredness of truth. But the instant there is introduced into these marvelous combinations of melody and harmony the cackle of a hen, the mew of a cat, or the explosion of a pipe filled with gunpowder or other grotesque things, you have not only destroyed music, abolished its appeal, removed its power to uplift, but you have made it the instrument of absurdity and reduced the divine art of music to mimicry, pantomime and insufferable annoyance. The "Max and Moritz" symphonic burlesque was mere sound dynamited. It is impossible to make anything else out of it.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date MAR 15 1913

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Julia Culp, the eminent Dutch mezzosoprano, who has created such a profound impression upon the musical public during the past season. She will sing a group of songs with orchestra by Schubert, Wagner's "Traume" and two Beethoven songs.

Dr. Muck has placed on this program what is generally regarded a the finest piece of humorous mu that has been written since Eulenspiegel." This is a symph burlesque by Joseph Gustav Mra entitled "Max and Moritz." Of composer of this piece little known except that he is a violi who lives in Bruenn, where he teacher in the Bruenn Musikver and the new conservatory of music

Has Written Opera

His published compositions comprise an opera, "Der Traum," first produced at the Royal Opera, Berlin, in the early part of 1912; several pieces of chamber music and incidental music to the play "Kismet."

His symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz," to be heard here, is founded on Wilhelm Busch's humorous collection of sketches of the same name written and drawn for children. As the book by Wilhelm Busch contains a prologue, six chapters—they are entitled "pranks" in the volume—and an epilogue, so Mrazek's composition is divided into corresponding sections.

This work may almost be regarded as a parody on Richard Strauss in his wildest moments. It employs an enormous orchestra comprising piccolo, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, sidedrum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, gluckenspiel, castagnettes, harp, celesta, piano and strings.

The full program of the concert is as follows:

Symphonic burleske, "Max and Moritz,"

Overture, "In the Spring" .... Mrazek
Songs with orchestra .... Goldmark
"Raste Krieger." .... Schubert
"Jager, ruhe, von der Jagd."
"Ave Maria."
Episode from Lenau's "Faust." Scene in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz) .... Liszt
Songs with orchestra:
Wagner, "Traume"
Beethoven, "Freud voll und Leidvoll," "Die Trommel geruhret"
"L'Appreni Sorcier: Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) .... Duka
Soloist—Julia Culp.

...in January, ... within ... most urgent ... formances of "Pars... in the new Champs Elysees Opera ... 1914.

ITEM

PHILADELPHIA, PA

[illegible]R 2 0 1913

[illegible]mor and gossip have been busy for several weeks past making plans for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There [illegible] been some variations regarding [illegible] where in Europe he is going next [illegible], but all the reports seem to be [illegible]nimous concerning his leaving Bos[illegible] and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season.

1884

Telephone, 929 Chelsea

Intended for Boston Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

NEW YORK

Cable Address:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

News

From T[illegible]UNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 22 1913

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A singer new to Providence will be the soloist at the fifth and last Boston symphony concert in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, April 1. This is Julia Culp, whose success in New York, Boston and Chicago in the past three months has been a very remarkable feature of the season.

Miss Culp is of Dutch nationality, and has held for several years a very prominent place among singers of Europe, but when she first came to America in January she was practically unknown to the general public.

It is safe to say that no singer in recent years has received such a warm welcome as she. From comparatively small beginnings she is now able to fill Carnegie hall in New York, Symphony hall in Boston, and Orchestra hall in Chicago, at one of her recitals. She is a woman of most attractive personality, the possessor of a rich, beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, and is a past mistress of the art of singing and interpreting.

She will sing three Schubert songs with orchestra, including the "Ave Maria," Wagner's "Traume" and two of Beethoven's songs from "Egmont." The symphony will be Mozart's "Jupiter," and the program will end with Dukas' merry scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

---

wspaper Cutting

UBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

Date [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which wound up its local season last Wednesday evening, announces the soloists for next winter's five concerts. It is a distinguished list: Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Ignace Jan Paderewski. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, March 16. Present subscribers may retain the seats they now hold by notifying C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston, before June 1.

BOSTON HERALD,

MARCH 29, 1913.

19TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major .... Schubert
Piano concerto .... Schumann
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn

Dr. Muck gave an uncommonly fine reading of Schubert's symphony. The performance was conspicuous for clarity and euphony. It was exquisite in nuances and effects of color. Some, when a program of this nature is arranged, go back to the ancients and as they go revile the ultra-moderns. This is unnecessary. It is possible to enjoy d'Indy and Schubert, Debussy and Schumann. Furthermore, if Schubert and Schumann were now living they would not write as they wrote. It would be impossible for them to do so. Schubert was an improvisator, and, like a clergyman preaching without notes, and improving a public occasion, he was not easily persuaded to stop. It may be said of this symphony that the incessant employment of the wood-wind induces a monotony that fatigues the ear in spite of the melodic wealth.

Schubert in his own time was a modern in his defiance of the traditions concerning the relations of tonalities. What might he not have written if he had had the gift of self-criticism! He did not hear his more elaborate works, and he had little opportunity of thus forming a judgment.

And Schumann in his own day and generation was considered a dangerous fellow, a man of chaotic music, drunken with dissonance. As for Mendelssohn, he would be a prig today. He would still write according to the later Mendelssohnian formulas, and turn his back on the "Hebrides" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. He would still be secretly envious of Schumann, and a foe to Berlioz.

If Schumann had only escaped the influence of Mendelssohn! If he had only had the courage to write as he began, giving the reins to his fancy! Yet we have the piano pieces and the songs, and, having them, let us rejoice. We also have the piano concerto. Mr. Wilks's performance of this romantic work was [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 24, 1913

DR. MUCK'S OPPORTUNITY

Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, at Leipzig. On May 22, 1913, and for some days before and for some days afterward, the centenary of his birth will be celebrated in every European capital of music. In America, on the other hand, celebrations seem likely to be surprisingly few. From the American point of view, Wagner had the misfortune to be born in a month outside the regular musical season. By May 22 all our opera houses will be shut and emptied and their forces scattered to the four corners of Europe. If any of them would commemorate the Wagner centenary, they must defer their "festival performances" until November, a half year after the actual anniversary. The symphony orchestras are in little better case. All of them will have ended their concerts by the first of May, three weeks before the centennial date actually befalls. They will not resume them until the middle of October five months afterward. O, thoughtless, careless Wagner, thus to be born altogether out of season for a country that hears your music gladly and is so keen about anniversaries.

Now, here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra continues its concerts longer than does any other on this side of the Atlantic. The final pair are appointed this year for May 2 and 3, less than three weeks before the centennial day. It has been its custom to make these concerts a climax to the series, or at least something outside its ordinary course. Why, then, should they not be made this spring commemorative concerts for Wagner, with a programme made entirely of his music and with the same festival setting of the stage as at the Liszt centenary concerts eighteen months ago? The foremost orchestra in America ought in some way to join in this universal commemoration.

Moreover, there is no conductor in America so eloquent with Wagner's music as is Dr. Muck. True, he will not take inappropriate excerpts from Wagner's operas out of the theatre and into the concert-room. Yet there are overtures, preludes and purely orchestral fragments enough to furnish forth a programme and more. True, the orchestra and the conductor played many of these at a Pension Fund concert last November; but they have not played them in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Even if they had, why should they not be played again in the new circumstances of the anniversary? If Dr. Muck would so order his final concerts, then our musical year would end unusually and impressively and the Wagner centenary, about which the whole musical world of Europe is busy, would not pass unnoted in at least one American city.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 29, 1913.

ENGLISH PIANIST IN SYMPHONY DEBUT

Matinee Audience Applauds His Playing in Most Enthusiastic Manner.

Norman Wilks, a young Englishman, whose piano playing is genial and ingratiating as a summer zephyr, is making his first bows here this week at the Symphony concertos. He was happy in his choice of the popular Schumann concerto in A minor, and yesterday the matinee audience applauded him generously. He is only 25 years old, and though his technique is well developed, his imaginative and emotional power is still in a blissful state of juvenility.

The program this week is one of the most melodious of the season. There are tunes galore in the Schubert symphony in C major—enough to make a half dozen modern symphonies or operas, indeed; and the mellifluous flow of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture is a familiar delight.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphonic poem "Aphrodite," which was announced for this week's concerts and was postponed on account of illness of the composer, will ge given the coming week.

Another interesting feature of the twentieth program will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony, "Anter," which has been played here but once, fifteen years ago. The other numbers will be Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Warnke playing the 'cello solo, and the "Oberon" overture, by Weber.

GLOBE—
MARCH 29, 1913.

SCHUBERT SYMPHONY BEAUTIFULLY PLAYED

Dr Muck Gives a Reading of Great Poetic Beauty.

Soloist Is Norman Wilks, a Young English Pianist.

The 19th Symphony rehearsal, Dr Muck conducted. Norman Wilks pianist, was the soloist. The program: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Schumann, Concerto in A minor, op. 54; Mendelssohn, Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The performance of the symphony was one of surpassing beauty. The pages of Schubert's exquisite thoughts were turned by a reverent and poetic hand. How luminous, how spontaneous, how simple with the simplicity of childlikeness they were; not tortured into derived and incongruous meanings, but heard in all the native lovliness of their sweet exuberance.

Playing such as that of yesterday is of the purest poetry. Violence to the soul of the poet has been done by conductors who never learn the haven of a repose such as that wherein Dr Muck dwells in the public concert. The utter elimination of all remnants of the process whereby such a piece of vertuosity as this was accomplished in rehearsal, is a feature of the playing to excite wonder and admiration.

Flawless and improvisational as the performance was, this virtuosity never stood between the composer and the audience. It was interpretation of the highest order. Sedulous regard to technical detail was concealed under the guise of spontaneity. Euphony of tone, symmetry of structure, impeccable architectural symmetry, fluidity of style and an understanding of the character of each movement appeared as inevitable as the fact that the work itself breathes the essence of romanticism.

How engrossing the simplicity and gracious logic of Schubert's thoughts as they are thus interpreted. A germinal idea flowers into rich profusion. In each restatement it gains in significance and beauty, and the proportion seems the just and fitting one.

The wealth of sustained song in the slow movement called out the skill of the orchestra's master lyricists, and Mr Longy, Mr Grisez and Mr Maquarre vied with each other in the plasticity and deftness of the curve and nuance of their phrases.

The scherzo scintillated with the points of Dr Muck's finely poised accentuation. The humor of it flashed and was reflected from myriad minute mirrors, which studded the first period like drops of dew.

Mr Wilks is an amiable pianist. He does not do violent and disturbing things. His technic is resourceful, his tone congenial and his interpretations show sincerity of purpose, but his style lacks distinction. His Schumann was a weak and unimpressive person and lacked rhythmical backbone.

The overture was played with the same artistry that had marked the symphony. Never has the feathery figure in the violins been more delicately drawn.

BOSTON POST,
, MARCH 29, 191

SUPERB WORK BY SYMPHONY

Masterly Performance of Shubert's C Major

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was a remarkable performance by Dr. Muck and his men of the great C major symphony of Schubert, a performance that gave rise to the greatest enthusiasm. No wonder! There were, perhaps those who thought Dr. Muck's tempo in the slow moment too rapid. They should remember that this is not a slow movement, not an "andante" at all, in the spirit of the word. The pace taken by Dr. Muck was the only possible way in which to do the fullest justice to the musical content of the movement, and prevent its length becoming tiresome.

Most wonderful of all was the rhythmical accentuation, and the simplicity with which the conductor allowed the melodies, as it were, to sing themselves. But this phrase is unjust, for the melodies of this symphony of heavenly and inordinate length were played marvellously by the various virtuosi of the orchestra, especially the wood wind players. No composition could have borne better testimony to the work that Dr. Muck is accomplishing with the band. Every strand of tone lived and glowed, and was in itself a centre of light. There was not a dull individual instrument. Each performer, playing as a master soloist, enhanced a hundred-fold the entire effect. The symphony was given a memorable reading, one which did justice equally to its precious beauty and its Olympic joy.

Norman Wilks played Schumann's piano concert in a fluent and mediocre manner. His fluency is too much for him. His tone is musical, but lacking in individuality and range of tone-color. It is a self-complaisant tone. Mr. Wilks was courteously recalled. Dr. Muck read the opening pages of the Mendelssohn's overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in a somewhat brusque, impatient, over-accentuated manner. Nor did he spare the kettle drums, yet in the many passages where Mendelssohn is an unsurpassed master in invention and instrumentation, the orchestral tone was a feast to the ear.

At the concerts of next week Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony will be played.

ADVERTISER.
MARCH 29, 1

NORMAN WILKS AT THE SYMPHONY

NEW PIANIST MAKES FINE IMPRESSION

This Week's Programme, as Prepared by Dr. Muck, a Conservative and Melodious One.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Symphony in C major, No. 7.
Schumann—Piano Concerto in A minor.
Pianist, Mr. Norman Wilks.
Mendelssohn—"Midsummer Night's Dream" overture.

It was a tune-feast from beginning to end, but not without that intellectuality that comes from good thematic treatment and figure development. The Schubert C major symphony has the "heavenly length" which the old-time critics used to ascribe to this composer, but the modern auditors have neither time nor patience for all of his repetitions, and the blue pencil ought to be trenchantly used on the first two movements of the present symphony. But there are noble beauties in the work that would make one loth to lose it from the repertoire. Grand were the trombones in the coda of the first movement; beautiful the Gypsy melodies of the andante; the Scherzo is full of tricksy playfulness and its Trio is most attractive melody; the finale is triumphant enough and its chief figure of four notes is simple reiteration (much like Beethoven's violin concerto—first movement) is majestic. Therefore the symphony was most cordially received, particularly as it was given a very virile performance. The first long repeat was "cut."—to advantage. Dr. Muck was twice recalled, and the orchestra obliged to rise, and the really great interpretation deserved the enthusiasm.

Dvorak used to maintain that Schubert was at his best in instrumental composition. We agree with this dictum in so far as to find his symphonies very agreeable and effective; but they are songs placed in contrast rather than symphonic themes fully developed. Schubert thought vocally just as Schumann thought piano. But there is dramatic power, romance and melodic beauty in almost every part of the movements of this symphony, even if it be not really symphonic. It was real enjoyment to come back to old-fashioned tunes, light scoring and beautiful simplicity once more. Conductor, musicians and audience all seemed to revel in the limpid measures and the striking contrasts. The great enthusiasm seemed to us to be a very significant straw, showing the direction of public craving in these very tuneless days.

Schumann's piano concerto added to this feast of tunes, for it is beautifully melodic, although it does not lack bold figure treatment either, the transformations of the chief theme of the first movement being one of the best instances of figure treatment that we remember in Schumann's works. Mr. Wilks caught up the many changes of style in this movement with artistic versatility, and the ensemble was much better than in the recent Ysaye concertos. The quick responses of orchestra and piano in the Intermezzo were flawless, and the cello part was glorious here.

Schumann is glorious both when he is in a triumphant mood or when he is infinitely tender. Florestan (as he called the masculine side of his moods) peeped out finely in the finale, and Eusebius (the poetic, feminine side) was given in the interpolated Andante of the first movement and in the gentle intermezzo. The orchestra took up the mysterious, tip-toeing second theme of the finale with excellent finesse, and the return of fragments of the first movement in this finale were clearly brought out. This is music. Music that one can take a soul-bath in and be purified. Although Schumann's nerves were afterwards "jangled and out-of-tune," there is nothing neurotic in this concerto.

But we found the young pianist better in the Florestan than in the Eusebius mood. There was clearness and surety, power and dash, rather than any pensive or introspective vein in the work. Mr. Wilks gave the finale with a brilliancy of climax that aroused great enthusiasm, and many recalls followed.

Decidedly Dr. Muck was making amends for all the dissonance and tonal trouble that we have gone through with recently, by giving a programme filled with refreshing fragrance of clear thought and direct melody and harmony. For Mendelssohn's tone-translation of Shakespeare was as pleasant and as intelligible as all that had gone before. For all that it was brimful of attractive tune, it was full of intellectual figurework, it was in good classical form, and yet it gave a clear set of pictures for the auditor who wants "a story." The chief theme, with its dainty violin figures (which were rather too delicately played) was the fairies. The second theme successfully portrayed the lovers, while Bottom and Quince and the rest of the players stumbled around awkwardly in the closing theme. In the development one could note the braying of Bottom, turned into an ass, upon the bassoon. In the return of the chief theme one could hear the drunken weaver asleep and snoring among the fairies. But the bass tuba cannot give this touch as Mendelssohn wanted it. He wrote it for Ophicleide, an instrument which is obsolete in America today, and which gives just the rumbling tone of a heavy snore.

After all Mendelssohn was the best humorist of them all. There is not a piece of instrumental humor in existence today which is so unstrained, so joyous, so natural, as this overture. And it was the work of a lad of 18 years! At 18 years of age Mendelssohn had achieved more than any other composer (his octette was done a year before), but he did not grow in proportion to the promise of his youth. Possibly at that early age the evil art-influence of wealth and social position had

MUSICAL AMERICA

VOL. XVII. No. 22 NEW YORK EDITED BY John C. Freund APRIL 5, 1913 $2.00 per Year Ten Cents per Copy

DR. MUCK A GIANT AMONG MUSICIANS

New Views of the Celebrated Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Modernism Is His Spirit but He Acknowledges Nothing Really Great in Music since Wagner

Bureau of Musical America,
No. 120 Boylston Street,
Boston, March 31, 1913.

ON the afternoon of October 12, 1906, Dr. Carl Muck sat back of the stage in Symphony Hall a cigarette in his fingers, chatting intermittently with Charles Ellis and other officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They, with faces more concerned than his own, were waiting for the moment which should call the conductor before his first American audience. That moment, to some of the group at least, was a trying one. A Boston Symphony audience is not uncritical, or more easily pleased than a gathering of Europeans. That moment comes to every one of us, whether we drive a pen or hoist a beam, whether our existence is concealed by an apothecary's counter, or whether we dangle amusingly before a row of footlights. The test arrives, and men meet it differently, according to bone and breed. Dr. Muck tossed away his cigarette carelessly, but his face had become a mask. He stepped out quietly, decisively, to meet his audience.

This man was felt at once. Owing to the wide marketing of musical knowledge today, there are dozens of efficient leaders and virtuosi who might, so far as their physiognomies are concerned, be first-rate barbers or stockbrokers. But on Muck's face, with all its calm, there was visible something of what he was about to do. He interpreted familiar compositions, and he did no violence to their traditions. Yet an experienced concert audience found itself absorbed and moved, and in a rather surprising manner each moment of that performance remained in the memory. The music left a definite and enduring mental impression, like the figure of the conductor. His back said more than other men's faces. His bâton, even in that initial concert, had comparatively little to do. There are conductors, too many of them, who still find it necessary to flourish a hand or a stick in the air to secure results of a more or less obvious nature. There is one man, at least, who can generally dispense with these means—chiefly because of his eyes. Since the day of that first concert I have often seen Dr. Muck lay down his bâton and watch his men perform his exact bidding. The man thinks and the men play. This, at least, is decently modern! Wireless telegraphy should be the coarsest of our methods. Dr. Muck is a modern conductor; he is also a modern man.

"All Nerve and Brain and Sinew"

His appearance is now familiar to most of us who frequent concert halls. He is one of the finest products of contemporaneous civilization, and in the face there are flashes of the shrewdness and cynicism for which this civilization is perhaps responsible. But this is indeed an admirable product, trained, in the good old phrase, "like a greyhound," all nerve and brain and sinew. It is hard to imagine any one with less extra flesh, in his physical or his mental makeup. The bearing is the man, with his splendid poise, his concentration of energy, pride of intellect. Let us be grateful; he is always distinguished! He bears on his face long scars from wounds received in duels during his student days in Germany. Of these duels he fought thirty-three. Three of them were fought with pistols, three with the sabre, more deadly than the weapon customarily employed by the German students; and at times there is a twinge in one of Dr. Muck's knees, on account of a bullet that once lodged there. It is easy to realize that he faced these ordeals as quietly or more so than he faced his Symphony audience. I asked him if his first fight made him nervous and he sneered. "I didn't show it!" He shows nothing.

He will go far among his friends—some say too far, in pursuit of a paradox. One discovered eventually that he is exceptionally sensitive; but he is a born leader of men. He understands this art thoroughly. With his players he is geniality itself, up to a certain point. They are not a group easy to control. Some are afflicted with an overweaning consciousness of the fact that they are members of one of the three finest orchestras in the world. Others rank so highly among players of their especial instrument that they are likely to be exceedingly captious with the man appointed to command them. Those familiar with orchestral conditions know something of the thousand-and-one tricks that skilful and experienced orchestra players can play on an unwary leader. But these things are rarely attempted with Muck. He is incredibly alert. He sees and hears everything. He has a deliberate and disconcerting eye, and on occasion a formidable manner. The men like and fear him, which is good for them and good for the public. They know that he cannot be deceived, and they know that good work will immediately be recognized. I know of soloists as well as orchestral players who have "wilted," as the natives put it, under his stare; and I have seen him with an audience applauding frantically at his back stand oblivious and flash a beatific smile upon a certain instrumentalist who had given a memorable performance of a solo passage. The conductor's approval is something to labor for. It is not lightly given. When it is given need I say that it communicates additional power to the lips or the bow-arm of the gratified artist?

Score Reading His Diversion

Most of Dr. Muck's time, outside of the rehearsals, is spent in the library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is phenomenally quick, they say, at score reading, and although he relinquished the career of a pianist many years ago he is an uncommonly gifted player. He is rarely adept in reducing an orchestral score, at sight, for the piano. He and Mrs. Muck have, since

[Continued on page 6]

DR. CARL MUCK —Photo by Garo.

The Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Whose Greatness Lies in "The Vital Force and the Astonishing Objectivity of His Readings"

MUSIC IN MID-WEST CRIPPLED BY FLOODS

Concert Business at Standstill and Many Bookings Lost in Devastated Section—Ysaye and Elman Have Thrilling Experiences—Benefit Concerts to Aid Sufferers

ALTHOUGH music lovers unite with all other Americans in deploring the recent flood disasters throughout the Middle West, floods and music seem to be such unrelated elements that these persons may not realize at first thought how directly the catastrophe may be expected to influence musical conditions in that section of the country.

Not only has the terrific loss of life left a depression which will cause a disinclination for immediate musical entertainment, but the material losses of each community are apt to result in a giving up of luxuries, of which music is one of the first to be dispensed with in times of financial distress.

With the losses to the piano industry in Ohio amounting to $1,[illegible]0,000, one forms an idea of the general process of recouping which must be followed in various lines. In Zanesville, for instance, the Munson Music Company sustained a loss of $40,00[illegible] through the collapse of its building. Such drains upon the resources of heads of families will mean a tightening of the purse strings of the women, who practically support the musical industries.

One of the significant losses of the piano houses is found in the cases where a patron has bought a piano on part payment and the dealer loses his equity in the instrument by the devastation of the floods. The buyer is now without a piano and his daughter is compelled to give up her music lessons, whereupon her teacher loses one of his pupils—all due to the results of the floods.

As the present musical season is practically at a close, the disaster will have little effect on the bookings of artists, except in some of the most flood-swept cities, where concert-going is out of the question. Charles [illegible] Wagner, for instance, has received no notification of any such contingency as a cancellation of Alice Nielsen's booking for a concert in Columbus, O., under the auspices of the Woman's Music Club. This is a subscription course, however, and the tickets have been sold for a long time. Columbus also has a Spring Festival planned and this is far enough in the future not to be influenced by present conditions.

"I do not anticipate that the flood will have any lasting effect on the concert business," declared A. F. Adams, of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, on Tuesday afternoon. "Dayton's musical interests will no doubt be the hardest hit. We Americans are very excitable and we are apt to be cast down in the depths by such a catastrophe, but it doesn't take long for us to forget. Thus the Middle West may fancy that it will have little to do with music for a while, but there will be a recovery in due time. They are somewhat used to these floods out there—Cincinnati often has a flood that submerges some of its houses and factories, but it goes on doing business just the same. You must remember that most of those who have lost their dwellings in these floods are those who would be patronizing a moving picture show and not the best concerts. And don't

[Continued on page 2]

Marc A. Blumenberg Dead

[By Cable to MUSICAL AMERICA]

PARIS, March 27.—Marc A. Blumenberg, editor-in-chief of the Musical Courier, died here to-day of heart trouble, from which he had been suffering since last September.

BLOUNT.

Continued on next page

[194]

MUSICAL AMERICA

VOL. XVII. No. 22 NEW YORK EDITED BY John C. Freund APRIL 5, 1913 $2.00 per Year Ten Cents per Copy

DR. MUCK A GIANT AMONG MUSICIANS

New Views of the Celebrated Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Modernism Is His Spirit but He Acknowledges Nothing Really Great in Music since Wagner

Bureau of Musical America,
No. 120 Boylston Street,
Boston, March 31, 1913.

ON the afternoon of October 12, 1906, Dr. Carl Muck sat back of the stage in Symphony Hall a cigarette in his fingers, chatting intermittently with Charles Ellis and other officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They, with faces more concerned than his own, were waiting for the moment which should call the conductor before his first American audience. That moment, to some of the group at least, was a trying one. A Boston Symphony audience is not uncritical, or more easily pleased than a gathering of Europeans. That moment comes to every one of us, whether we drive a pen or hoist a beam, whether our existence is concealed by an apothecary's counter, or whether we dangle amusingly before a row of footlights. The test arrives, and men meet it differently, according to bone and breed. Dr. Muck tossed away his cigarette carelessly, but his face had become a mask. He stepped out quietly, decisively, to meet his audience.

This man was felt at once. Owing to the wide marketing of musical knowledge today, there are dozens of efficient leaders and virtuosi who might, so far as their physiognomies are concerned, be first-rate barbers or stockbrokers. But on Muck's face, with all its calm, there was visible something of what he was about to do. He interpreted familiar compositions, and he did no violence to their traditions. Yet an experienced concert audience found itself absorbed and moved, and in a rather surprising manner each moment of that performance remained in the memory. The music left a definite and enduring mental impression, like the figure of the conductor. His back said more than other men's faces. His bâton, even in that initial concert, had comparatively little to do. There are conductors, too many of them, who still find it necessary to flourish a hand or a stick in the air to secure results of a more or less obvious nature. There is one man, at least, who can generally dispense with these means—chiefly because of his eyes. Since the day of that first concert I have often seen Dr. Muck lay down his bâton and watch his men perform his exact bidding. The man thinks and the men play. This, at least, is decently modern! Wireless telegraphy should be the coarsest of our methods. Dr. Muck is a modern conductor; he is also a modern man.

"All Nerve and Brain and Sinew"

His appearance is now familiar to most of us who frequent concert halls. He is one of the finest products of contemporaneous civilization, and in the face there are flashes of the shrewdness and cynicism for which this civilization is perhaps responsible. But this is indeed an admirable product, trained, in the good old phrase, "like a greyhound," all nerve and brain and sinew. It is hard to imagine any one with less extra flesh, in his physical or his mental makeup. The bearing is the man, with his splendid poise, his concentration of energy, pride of intellect. Let us be grateful; he is always distinguished! He bears on his face long scars from wounds received in duels during his student days in Germany. Of these duels he fought thirty-three. Three of them were fought with pistols, three with the sabre, more deadly than the weapon customarily employed by the German students; and at times there is a twinge in one of Dr. Muck's knees, on account of a bullet that once lodged there. It is easy to realize that he faced these ordeals as quietly or more so than he faced his Symphony audience. I asked him if his first fight made him nervous and he sneered. "I didn't show it!" He shows nothing.

DR. CARL MUCK —Photo by Garo.

The Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Whose Greatness Lies in "The Vital Force and the Astonishing Objectivity of His Readings"

He will go far among his friends—some say too far, in pursuit of a paradox. One discovered eventually that he is exceptionally sensitive; but he is a born leader of men. He understands this art thoroughly. With his players he is geniality itself, up to a certain point. They are not a group easy to control. Some are afflicted with an overweaning consciousness of the fact that they are members of one of the three finest orchestras in the world. Others rank so highly among players of their especial instrument that they are likely to be exceedingly captious with the man appointed to command them. Those familiar with orchestral conditions know something of the thousand-and-one tricks that skilful and experienced orchestra players can play on an unwary leader. But these things are rarely attempted with Muck. He is incredibly alert. He sees and hears everything. He has a deliberate and disconcerting eye, and on occasion a formidable manner. The men like and fear him, which is good for them and good for the public. They know that he cannot be deceived, and they know that good work will immediately be recognized. I know of soloists as well as orchestral players who have "wilted," as the natives put it, under his stare; and I have seen him with an audience applauding frantically at his back stand oblivious and flash a beatific smile upon a certain instrumentalist who had given a memorable performance of a solo passage. The conductor's approval is something to labor for. It is not lightly given. When it is given need I say that it communicates additional power to the lips or the bow-arm of the gratified artist?

Score Reading His Diversion

Most of Dr. Muck's time, outside of the rehearsals, is spent in the library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is phenomenally quick, they say, at score reading, and although he relinquished the career of a pianist many years ago he is an uncommonly gifted player. He is rarely adept in reducing an orchestral score, at sight, for the piano. He and Mrs. Muck have, since

[Continued on page 6]

MUSIC IN MID-WEST CRIPPLED BY FLOODS

Concert Business at Standstill and Many Bookings Lost in Devastated Section—Ysaye and Elman Have Thrilling Experiences—Benefit Concerts to Aid Sufferers

ALTHOUGH music lovers unite with all other Americans in deploring the recent flood disasters throughout the Middle West, floods and music seem to be such unrelated elements that these persons may not realize at first thought how directly the catastrophe may be expected to influence musical conditions in that section of the country.

Not only has the terrific loss of life left a depression which will cause a disinclination for immediate musical entertainment, but the material losses of each community are apt to result in a giving up of luxuries, of which music is one of the first to be dispensed with in times of financial distress.

With the losses to the piano industry in Ohio amounting to $1,000,000, one forms an idea of the general process of recouping which must be followed in various lines. In Zanesville, for instance, the Munson Music Company sustained a loss of $40,000 through the collapse of its building. Such drains upon the resources of heads of families will mean a tightening of the purse strings of the women, who practically support the musical industries.

One of the significant losses of the piano houses is found in the cases where a patron has bought a piano on part payment and the dealer loses his equity in the instrument by the devastation of the floods. The buyer is now without a piano and his daughter is compelled to give up her music lessons, whereupon her teacher loses one of his pupils—all due to the results of the flood.

As the present musical season is practically at a close, the disaster will have little effect on the bookings of artists, except in some of the most flood-swept cities, where concert-going is out of the question. Charles L. Wagner, for instance, has received no notification of any such contingency as a cancellation of Alice Nielsen's booking for a concert in Columbus. O., under the auspices of the Woman's Music Club. This is a subscription course, however, and the tickets have been sold for a long time. Columbus also has a Spring Festival planned and this is far enough in the future not to be influenced by present conditions.

"I do not anticipate that the flood will have any lasting effect on the concert business," declared A. F. Adams, of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, on Tuesday afternoon. "Dayton musical interests will no doubt be the hardest hit. We Americans are very excitable and we are apt to be cast down in the depths by such a catastrophe, but it doesn't take long for us to forget. Thus the Middle West may fancy that it will have little to do with music for a while, but there will be a recovery in due time. They are somewhat used to these floods out there—Cincinnati often has a flood that submerges some of its houses and factories, but it goes on doing business just the same. You must remember that most of those who have lost their dwellings in these floods are those who would be patronizing a moving picture show and not the best concerts. And don't

[Continued on page 2]

Marc A. Blumenberg Dead

[By Cable to MUSICAL AMERICA.]

PARIS, March 27.—Marc A. Blumenberg, editor-in-chief of the Musical Courier, died here to-day of heart trouble, from which he had been suffering since last September.

BLOUNT.

Continued on next page.

DR. MUCK A GIANT AMONG MUSICIANS

[Continued from page 1]

their first arrival in Boston, been socially popular, but neither of them is greatly attracted by this phase of the life of the city, and Mrs. Muck, hardly less than her husband, finds many serious affairs to engage her during the day. Dr. Muck lives with his scores. I have said that he is a brilliant pianist. One day in his study, just after a performance of the Tschaikowsky B Flat Minor Concerto, he said, "I played that myself!" Then he played a movement, and with what power and élan! He has not composed because he does not approve of mediocre musical composition. This is his explanation, not mine.

The essence of Dr. Muck's greatness as a conductor lies, I think, in two things—in the vital force and the astonishing objectivity of his readings. He has his own ideas about programs, ideas with which the majority do not agree. He believes in the unified program—a program of modern, or classic, or romantic music, as the case may be. So far as his own tastes are concerned they are as hard to estimate as his personal qualities. What those qualities really are his most intimate friends may know. Probably, however, they make more mistakes in their estimates than any others, for this is as a rule the particular province of intimate friends. However, Dr. Muck's musical preferences, as so far indicated, are so definite and so strong that in a lesser man they would be called prejudices. He recognizes almost no music as music of permanent value, since Wagner. Most of Strauss is to him ephemeral and chiefly remarkable for orchestral color and virtuosity, although he concedes his admiration for isolated pages here and there. Of the modern Frenchmen, Debussy is to him the one whose art is, or was, sincere and original. He has recognized the early first symphony of Sibelius as a masterwork, but he disapproves of the freer and more extended form of the second symphony, which is without doubt a greater composition. Next Winter he will probably take up the fourth symphony of Sibelius, the most individual and impressionistic score which that master has yet produced—the extreme, in fact, of northern impressionism—and give a superb performance of the work. If you meet him afterward and offer congratulations he will probably tell you with a Mephistophelean, all-denying grin, that he doesn't like it. Then you will gasp, as all of us have gasped and questioned the sincerity of the man when he has anathematized Strauss and given a wonderful performance of the "Domestica" or the "Tod und Verklärung"; when he tells you that "La Mer" of Debussy is remarkable for its color effects but for little else, and in the meantime the orchestra has made you believe in a piece of music you never believed in before.

Dr. Muck has in his possession two pictures of Gustav Mahler, one of them his death mask, which the conductor has described with gusto as wearing a decidedly ironical expression. He has told me that he admires Mahler most in his minor compositions, more especially some of the songs. "He is great in small things, small in great things." But this will not interfere with the performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which will be given in Boston one week after this article appears in MUSICAL AMERICA. And so on.

Dr. Muck, the man, may puzzle and disturb us; his sincerity toward the music he interprets and the audiences before whom he appears is wonderful. It is to him a sacred mission to say all that can be said for the creative artist to the attentive listener. Dr. Muck is now in his fifty-fourth year, at the very maturity of his powers, and a magnificent maturity it is. He is the clearest musical thinker, and he has the sanest grip of himself and his subject matter, the healthiest musical pulse of any conductor who has appeared in Boston in the last fifteen years and perhaps much longer. That is at the bottom of his success, and also his remarkable knowledge of orchestral instruments, and his sense of timbres, most exceptional for one who began his studies as a pianist and not as a performer on an orchestral instrument. Not even Mr. Gericke, who made the Boston Symphony what it is, had a finer aural vision. Dr. Muck's orchestra is an aggregation of living, singing units of tone. Each instrument glows by itself, like separate stars in a sky, like the living atoms in matter, which, according to science, never touch one another. The orchestra is all glowing tone, because every part of it is a living organism communicating its light and its warmth to other members of the body, and all of these members enhance each other's strength and beauty.

And so closely can this master interpreter identify himself with the thought of the composer that you listen, with him, as though you were composing the piece yourself. Every great outline and each finished detail appear successively and inevitably, so that it is afterward impossible to conceive of the composition without both mass and detail appearing in the memory in their exact and inexorable relations. The completeness of the conductor's intellect and the sureness of his musical sense are hardly less marvelous than the perfect dimensions of a masterwork, from which you could not subtract a measure or a rest without impairing the proportions of the whole. Whatever the work Dr. Muck is called upon to perform it will be presented in the most vivid manner possible, as though it were the darling child of the conductor's own brain. Nor must it be inferred that his appreciation is a purely mental process. He does think, probably, before he feels, and that is part of the office of a great artist. But having thought, and comprehended, his own emotional nature and his very nervous musical organism vibrate an immediate kindling response. For Dr. Muck's objectivity is anything but aloof, pedantic, dispassionate. It is the response of a rich nature to suggestions from without and a more rounded musical character it is difficult to conceive.

I have spoken of Dr. Muck as a modern man. He would have been an artist, a personality, a pronounced success whatever his walk in life. His art, remarkable as it is, is less a special tendency, inborn and unconquerable, than it is a field of expression, deliberately chosen by a big nature to minister to its own needs. It is on account of a strong and rich fabric in himself that Dr. Muck is the conductor that he is. This ground depth and his prodigious nervous activity must be, in large part at least, the explanation of the range and the significance of his accomplishments. He is more than superficially acquainted with other arts than the one he practises. He knows letters, philosophy, history, languages, men. And for the future of the race, as well as the virtue of the individual metal, it is well that the art should appear, in the last analysis, as auxiliary to the man.

OLIN DOWNES.

New Symphony by Chadwick Produced

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

A new Symphony by a Boston composer was the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday. It was George W. hadwick's "Aphrodite," a symphonic antasie.

he title and thought were suggested to Chadwick by a beautiful head of phrodite in the Boston Art Museum, hich was brought from a seaside shrine on an Aegean island.

is not program music, but it is deriptive in an impressionistic sort of ry. It paints vague pictures of what he Aphrodite saw during the centuries he looked out and over the Aegean Sea.

Mr. Chadwick admires the style of the rench modernists. There is much in his orchestration that suggests Debussy and more Charpentier. He is a melodist himelf and has combined light, trivial and ocsionally really beautiful themes with inkle tankle, formless orchestration of he type affected by the Debussy school. is march movement was fresh and invigrating, his love music sugary as a comic pera love song. On the whole a fine omposition, much more worth producing han several of the German novelties of he season.

imsky Korsakoff's rich and dazzling ymphony, "Antar," contrasted beautifully ith Chadwick's sea piece. Of the grand and magnificance of this symphony re is today no question.

olkman's Serenade No. 3 in D minor roved to be a graceful, dainty and pleasant piece, which displayed the command his violoncello possessed by Heinrich arnke.

The orchestra played superbly.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News

Address Providence, R. I.

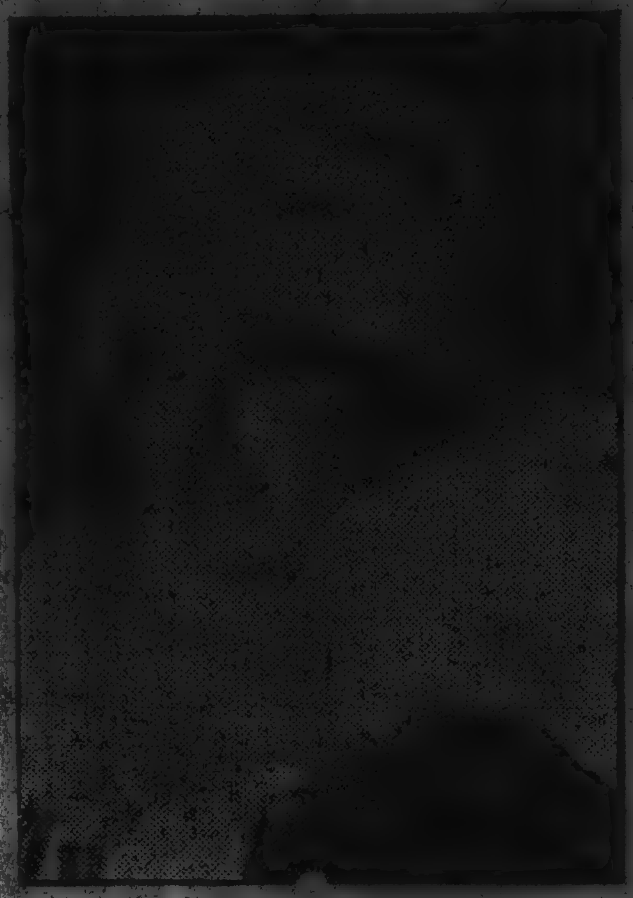
Date MAR 29 1913

, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra will bid farewell for the season to its patrons in Providence next Tuesday evening when it gives its fifth and last concert in Infantry hall. The season has had all the success expected, in fact, so greatly has the patronage grown here that next year in response to many requests the orchestra is to give six concerts instead of five. The return of Dr. Muck has been appreciated here as elsewhere, and while illness prevented him twice from coming to Providence, the orchestra was in excellent hands under the leadership of the assistant conductor, Mr. Otto Urack.

Special efforts have been made to have this last concert more than usually attractive. It will serve to introduce to Providence a singer who this year is making her first tour of America and has been received with a warmth of appreciation that is little less than sensational. This is Julia Culp the mezzo-soprano who for the last few years has been one of the great favorites in England and on the Continent. Miss Culp is a native of Holland. A woman of more than ordinarily attractive personality,



JULIA CULP.
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

possessor of an exceedingly rich and beautiful voice of true mezzo tone, she is likewise an artist of very high qualities.

While most of her studying was done in Germany she seems to have escaped the vocal vices characteristic of most German singers. She uses a pure Italian method and sings with a skill that reminds one of Sembrich in her prime.

Miss Culp will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group comprises three Schubert songs, two from "The Lady of the Lake" and the third the ever beautiful, "Ave Maria." Her second group will comprise Wagner's exquisite study from the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," "Traume" and two of the songs which Beethoven wrote for Schiller's "Egmont."

Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestral numbers Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Songs with orchestra—Schubert, (a) Raste Krieger, (b) Jager, ruhe von der Jagd, (c) Ave Maria; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl"; Songs with orchestra—

86

Telephone, 929 Chelsea

Intended for Boston Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

K 106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 30 1913

Established.

MUSIC NOTES

With Julia Culp, the famous Dutch singer, as soloist and with a varied programme Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their last local appearance of the season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The success of the present season has been such that next year it is proposed to give six concerts instead of five. The disappointment over the failure of Dr. Muck to appear at two concerts when he was ill in Boston, has discovered in the assistant conductor, Mr. Otto Urack, a capable substitute for the distinguished kapellmeister.

There will be three orchestral numbers on Tuesday evening's programme. The first will be the ever-beautiful symphony of Mozart, which for over 100 years has been called "Jupiter." The symphony was one of a set of three written about 1784, which mark the highest point of Mozart's accomplishments in absolute music. It is significant that these symphonies are played as much to-day as they were in the early part of the last century, and of the three the "Jupiter" is generally acknowledged to be the greatest.

The second number will be the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, in which Dr. Muck has won particular fame as conductor. The final work on the programme will be the humorous scherzo of the French composer, Paul Dukas, called "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Miss Culp will sing three songs of Schubert, two of them settings of poems from Scott's "Lady of the Lake," and the third the "Ave Maria." Her second group of songs will comprise Wagner's "Traume" and two of the Clarchen songs from Beethoven's music to Schiller's "Egmont." All these songs will be with orchestral accompaniment. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in C-major, "Jupiter," Mozart; songs with orchestra, "Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jadg," "Ave Maria," Schubert; "A Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; songs with orchestra, "Traume," Wagner; "Freudvoll and Leidvoll," "Die Trommel Geruhret," Beethoven; "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas.

[illegible] that'll
[illegible] for me and Doc. Why,
[illegible] Doc starts that going, [illegible] ready to dance the [illegible]
[illegible]

[195]

DR. MUCK A GIANT AMONG MUSICIANS

[Continued from page 1]

their first arrival in Boston, been socially popular, but neither of them is greatly attracted by this phase of the life of the city, and Mrs. Muck, hardly less than her husband, finds many serious affairs to engage her during the day. Dr. Muck lives with his scores. I have said that he is a brilliant pianist. One day in his study, just after a performance of the Tschaikowsky B Flat Minor Concerto, he said, "I played that myself!" Then he played a movement, and with what power and élan! He has not composed because he does not approve of mediocre musical composition. This is his explanation, not mine.

The essence of Dr. Muck's greatness as a conductor lies, I think, in two things—in the vital force and the astonishing objectivity of his readings. He has his own ideas about programs, ideas with which the majority do not agree. He believes in the unified program—a program of modern, or classic, or romantic music, as the case may be. So far as his own tastes are concerned they are as hard to estimate as his personal qualities. What those qualities really are his most intimate friends may know. Probably, however, they make more mistakes in their estimates than any others, for this is as a rule the particular province of intimate friends. However, Dr. Muck's musical preferences, as so far indicated, are so definite and so strong that in a lesser man they would be called prejudices. He recognizes almost no music as music of permanent value, since Wagner. Most of Strauss is to him ephemeral and chiefly remarkable for orchestral color and virtuosity, although he concedes his admiration for isolated pages here and there. Of the modern Frenchmen, Debussy is to him the one whose art is, or was, sincere and original. He has recognized the early first symphony of Sibelius as a masterwork, but he disapproves of the freer and more extended form of the second symphony, which is without doubt a greater composition. Next Winter he will probably take up the fourth symphony of Sibelius, the most individual and impressionistic score which that master has yet produced—the extreme, in fact, of northern impressionism—and give a superb performance of the work. If you meet him afterward and offer congratulations he will probably tell you with a Mephistophelean, all-denying grin, that he doesn't like it. Then you will gasp, as all of us have gasped and questioned the sincerity of the man when he has anathematized Strauss and given a wonderful performance of the "Domestica" or the "Tod und Verklärung"; when he tells you that "La Mer" of Debussy is remarkable for its color effects but for little else, and in the meantime the orchestra has made you believe in a piece of music you never believed in before.

Dr. Muck has in his possession two pictures of Gustav Mahler, one of them his death mask, which the conductor has described with gusto as wearing a decidedly ironical expression. He has told me that he admires Mahler most in his minor compositions, more especially some of the songs. "He is great in small things, small in great things." But this will not interfere with the performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which will be given in Boston one week after this article appears in MUSICAL AMERICA. And so on.

Dr. Muck, the man, may puzzle and disturb us; his sincerity toward the music he interprets and the audiences before whom he appears is wonderful. It is to him a sacred mission to say all that can be said for the creative artist, to the attentive listener. Dr. Muck is now in his fifty-fourth year, at the very maturity of his powers, and a magnificent maturity it is. He is the clearest musical thinker, and he has the sanest grip of himself and his subject matter, the healthiest musical pulse of any conductor who has appeared in Boston in the last fifteen years and perhaps much longer. That is at the bottom of his success, and also his remarkable knowledge of orchestral instruments, and his sense of timbres, most exceptional for one who began his studies as a pianist and not as a performer on an orchestral instrument. Not even Mr. Gericke, who made the Boston Symphony what it is, had a finer aural vision. Dr. Muck's orchestra is an aggregation of living, singing units of tone. Each instrument glows by itself, like separate stars in a sky, like the living atoms in matter, which, according to science, never touch one another. The orchestra is all glowing tone, because every part of it is a living organism communicating its light and its warmth to other members of the body, and all of these members enhance each other's strength and beauty.

And so closely can this master interpreter identify himself with the thought of the composer that you listen, with him, as though you were composing the piece yourself. Every great outline and each finished detail appear successively and inevitably, so that it is afterward impossible to conceive of the composition without both mass and detail appearing in the memory in their exact and inexorable relations. The completeness of the conductor's intellect and the sureness of his musical sense are hardly less marvelous than the perfect dimensions of a masterwork, from which you could not subtract a measure or a rest without impairing the proportions of the whole. Whatever the work Dr. Muck is called upon to perform it will be presented in the most vivid manner possible, as though it were the darling child of the conductor's own brain. Nor must it be inferred that his appreciation is a purely mental process. He does think, probably, before he feels, and that is part of the office of a great artist. But having thought, and comprehended, his own emotional nature and his very nervous musical organism vibrate an immediate kindling response. For Dr. Muck's objectivity is anything but aloof, pedantic, dispassionate. It is the response of a rich nature to suggestions from without and a more rounded musical character it is difficult to conceive.

I have spoken of Dr. Muck as a modern man. He would have been an artist, a personality, a pronounced success whatever his walk in life. His art, remarkable as it is, is less a special tendency, inborn and unconquerable, than it is a field of expression, deliberately chosen by a big nature to minister to its own needs. It is on account of a strong and rich fabric in himself that Dr. Muck is the conductor that he is. This ground depth and his prodigious nervous activity must be, in large part at least, the explanation of the range and the significance of his accomplishments. He is more than superficially acquainted with other arts than the one he practises. He knows letters, philosophy, history, languages, men. And for the future of the race, as well as the virtue of the individual metal, it is well that the art should appear, in the last analysis, as auxiliary to the man.

OLIN DOWNES

New Symphony by Chadwick Produced

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

A new Symphony by a Boston composer was the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday. It was George W. Chadwick's "Aphrodite," a symphonic fantasie.

The title and thought were suggested to Mr. Chadwick by a beautiful head of Aphrodite in the Boston Art Museum, which was brought from a seaside shrine upon an Aegean island.

It is not program music, but it is descriptive in an impressionistic sort of way. It paints vague pictures of what the Aphrodite saw during the centuries she looked out and over the Aegean Sea.

Mr. Chadwick admires the style of the French modernists. There is much in his orchestration that suggests Debussy and more Charpentier. He is a melodist himself and has combined light, trivial and occasionally really beautiful themes with tinkle tankle, formless orchestration of the type affected by the Debussy school. His march movement was fresh and invigorating, his love music sugary as a comic opera love song. On the whole a fine composition, much more worth producing than several of the German novelties of the season.

Rimsky Korsakoff's rich and dazzling symphony, "Antar," contrasted beautifully with Chadwick's sea piece. Of the grandeur and magnificance of this symphony there is today no question.

Volkman's Serenade No. 3 in D minor proved to be a graceful, dainty and pleasant piece, which displayed the command of his violoncello possessed by Heinrich Warnke.

The orchestra played superbly.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date

k, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra will bid farewell for the season to its patrons in Providence next Tuesday evening when it gives its fifth and last concert in Infantry hall. The season has had all the success expected, in fact, so greatly has the patronage grown here that next year in response to many requests the orchestra is to give six concerts instead of five. The return of Dr. Muck has been appreciated here as elsewhere, and while illness prevented him twice from coming to Providence, the orchestra was in excellent hands under the leadership of the assistant conductor, Mr. Otto Urack.

Special efforts have been made to have this last concert more than usually attractive. It will serve to introduce to Providence a singer who this year is making her first tour of America and has been received with a warmth of appreciation that is little less than sensational. This is Julia Culp the mezzo-soprano who for the last few years has been one of the great favorites in England and on the Continent. Miss Culp is a native of Holland. A woman of more than ordinarily attractive personality, possessor of an exceedingly rich and beautiful voice of true mezzo tone, she is likewise an artist of very high qualities.

JULIA CULP,
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

While most of her studying was done in Germany she seems to have escaped the vocal vices characteristic of most German singers. She uses a pure Italian method and sings with a skill that reminds one of Sembrich in her prime.

Miss Culp will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group comprises three Schubert songs, two from "The Lady of the Lake" and the third the ever beautiful, "Ave Maria." Her second group will comprise Wagner's exquisite study from the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," "Traume" and two of the songs which Beethoven wrote for Schiller's "Egmont."

Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestral numbers Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Songs with orchestra—Schubert, (a) Raste Krieger, (b) Jager, ruhe von der Jagd, (c) Ave Maria; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl"; Songs with orchestra—Wagner, "Traume"; Beethoven, Freud-

---

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Established.

MUSIC NOTES

With Julia Culp, the famous Dutch singer, as soloist and with a varied programme Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their last local appearance of the season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The success of the present season has been such that next year it is proposed to give six concerts instead of five. The disappointment over the failure of Dr. Muck to appear at two concerts when he was ill in Boston, has discovered in the assistant conductor, Mr. Otto Urack, a capable substitute for the distinguished kapellmeister.

There will be three orchestral numbers on Tuesday evening's programme. The first will be the ever-beautiful symphony of Mozart, which for over 100 years has been called "Jupiter." The symphony was one of a set of three written about 1784, which mark the highest point of Mozart's accomplishments in absolute music. It is significant that these symphonies are played as much to-day as they were in the early part of the last century, and of the three the "Jupiter" is generally acknowledged to be the greatest.

The second number will be the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, in which Dr. Muck has won particular fame as conductor. The final work on the programme will be the humorous scherzo of the French composer, Paul Dukas, called "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Miss Culp will sing three songs of Schubert, two of them settings of poems from Scott's "Lady of the Lake," and the third the "Ave Maria." Her second group of songs will comprise Wagner's "Traume" and two of the Clarchen songs from Beethoven's music to Schiller's "Egmont." All these songs will be with orchestral accompaniment. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in C-major, "Jupiter," Mozart; songs with orchestra, "Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jadg," "Ave Maria," Schubert; "A Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; songs with orchestra, "Traume," Wagner; "Freudvoll and Leidvoll," "Die Trommel Geruhret," Beethoven; "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas.

---

overture, that'll for me and Doc. Why,
Doc starts that going, I'll be ready to dance the salatrello. I'll be so happy. But I must get home. It's getting late. Put it down in the book, Ollie, I'm a little shy tonight."

"All right

NEW BEDFORD STANDARD. FEBRUARY 23,

THE PIANO PLAYER AT THE SYMPHONY

With the Liveliest Anticipations of Pleasure He Discourses the Trials that Have Beset Him and Dr. Muck in Common with Other Great Musicians in Climbing the Ladder of Fame.

"Say, Professor," said Ollie, the lunch-man, as the Piano Player hung up his overcoat, "are you going to the Symphony concert next Tuesday night?"

The Piano Player turned around.

"Am I going? Will a duck swim? Of course, I'm going. I've got my ticket tucked away in my inside pocket, pinned with a safety pin. I'll be there with bells on, even if I have to whip my way through a crowd of wild cats. That's going to be the big night for your Uncle Henry."

"Have you engaged a substitute?" anxiously inquired Ollie.

"Sure I have," retorted the Piano Player. "And what's more, I paid him two dollars over the Union price. There's the receipt for the money."

"What did the boss say?" queried Ollie.

"Oh, he let out an awful yell," said the Piano Player, "but he quieted down after I told him that he could take his bum show-shop and push it into the Bay for all I cared. I've been sitting down there in that pit spieling a lot of doggerel that masquerades under the name of 'popular music' for so long that I've got to get out and get into a different atmosphere."

"But why should you want to go to a Symphony concert?" persisted Ollie.

"Why?" said the Piano Player. "Because I want to see my old friend Doc once more."

"Oh, you know one of the musicians," said Ollie.

"No, I don't know any of the musicians," retorted the Piano Player, "but I do know the main gazabo, and I'm proud to call him my friend.

"You don't mean Dr. Muck, do you," said Ollie, aghast!

"Sure I do," said the Piano Player. "Doc and I are old pals. We met years ago. We are both good old scouts. We have seen the world, and know it from beginning to end. I only hope I don't miss seeing him when the show is over. Even if I do, I'll have one grand, good time."

"How?" asked Ollie.

"Why, because I'll have the pleasure of seeing Doc put the Boston Symphony orchestra over the jumps. He's the boy that can do it, all right, all right!"

"Well, what on earth have you in common with a great man like Dr. Muck, one of the greatest musicians in the world today?" said Ollie. "You must be getting nutty."

"No, I'm not nutty," retorted the Piano Player. "I've been on the wagon for a week, and you know it! I repeat that the Doc and I are friends. We have everything in common. He was born in Germany. I was born in an obscure town in Kentucky. In our youthful days, separated by thousands of miles, Doc and I felt something stirring within us, an emotion we could not analyze nor tell from whence it came. Somehow or other, we began to form a love for all that was beautiful and good in music. Probably that instinct came from our mothers. I like to believe it, for it is from the mothers, the 'Ewig Weibliche," as Doc and I like to call it, that nearly everything that is good and noble comes. We were fired by an ambition to become musicians, not only musicians, but artists. In order to obtain the goal of our desires, we had to surmount all sorts of difficulties. We had to grasp and assimilate everything that Scarlatti, Palestrina, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Liszt, Wagner, Schubert, Schumann, and many others, had to offer us. We had to study with conservatory teachers, and kick our heels in the corridors outside the studios waiting for our teachers to call us in and grant us the inestimable privilege of paying them a high price for lessons which we could teach ourselves just as well, if not better, and we had to work hard to earn the money for the lessons. But we got away with it. In spite of our teachers, sometimes with their help, we learned music. In our struggle for recognition, we met with all kinds of rebuffs. We met them and smiled. We remembered how Haydn had to write 'The Symphony of the Candles' in order to hold his job. We remembered how Mozart was kicked out of the place of the Archbishop at Salzburg. We remembered the trials that beset our great master, Beethoven, all through his life. We remembered how Wagner burst his way through all sorts of difficulties, put in his path by Hadslick and a whole lot of other bum critics, to his final triumph at Beyreuth. We remembered how Dvorak fiddled for a bare existence in a beer hall in Prague until Brahms picked him up and recommended him to the 'Cultusministerium" of Vienna for a pension of $250 a year. We remembered how Brahms amounted to nothing until Schumann made his memorable announcement in the Neue Zeitschrift, 'Hats off, gentlemen, a genius!' Inspired by the great examples of our predecessors, Doc and I started out to carve a future for ourselves. In time he rose to the exalted position of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In time I rose to the exalted position of a piano player in a moving picture theatre in New Bedford. I'll tell you, we both had to work hard to get where we are now."

"Oh, can that stuff," said Ollie. "You've got to get down to brass tacks with me."

"All right," responded the Piano Player. "As Nanki-Pooh said in "The Mikado," "Come gather round me, and I'll tell you." You see, Doc and I were hampered by wasting a lot of time in the grand opera game. We drifted around from one town to another, getting jobs as kapellmeister in various places, sometimes 'trouping' with an opera company. Finally he got the job of conductor at the Royal Opera house in Berlin. I got the job of conductor at the Royal Opera House in Calgary. It's an awful hard job. If you want to see the choicest assortment of lunkheads you can find anywhere, just get in with an opera company, and you'll meet 'em. Every blamed one in the company, from the prima donna down to the humblest chorus boy, is imbued with the idea that the whole musical world revolves around them. They are all that ever was, is now, or ever shall be, and nobody else has got a look-in, to hear them tell it. Half of 'em couldn't count four bars of 4-4 time straight to save their souls. Every stage rehearsal is a catfight among the principals, each telling the other what to do, when they don't know what to do themselves. They are all trying to grab the center of the stage. You have to teach these mutts their parts, and try to get them to sing with some little approach to the idea that the composer intended when he wrote the opera. If you try to cue them in on the right beat, they'll holler like a stuck pig about the license of the artist when the only license they ought to have is one to run a sausage store. Then Doc and I had to train a lot of cheap musicians in the orchestra. Most of them know how to hold their instruments, and that's about all. However, they aren't so hard to get along with. You can swear at them and the chorus to your heart's content. They get everything that is rampanting around in your system after you've had a session with the principals. If the majority of these people had any brains, our work would have been brighter. But they haven't. They're hopeless. Well, while the Doc and I have been wrestling with this tough game, the symphonic world has gotten just a little ahead of us. There's Nickish, Pauer, Fiedler, Gericke, Damrosch, Weingartner, Kunwald, Stock, Stojowski, Safanoff, Rothwell, Oberhoffer, Hadley, and a host of others that are doing big things, and here's this young man Urack just coming up. But Doc and I are still on the job. When they finally bury us, three or four men will have to sit on our graves to keep us from bursting through and singing the last line of Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadieren'.'

"Hold on, Professor," interrupted Ollie. "How do these other fellows that you speak about stack up, in your estimation?"

The Piano Player held up a warning finger.

"That's a delicate question," he replied. "Doc and I, being real professionals, never pass judgment upon our colleagues. So please never ask me again."

"Beg your pardon, Professor," said Ollie. "Spiel away. I don't know what you're talking about, but it listens good to me. If our friend the Organist were here, he would know all about it. By the way, where is he? I haven't seen him for three or four days."

"Oh, he's home studying up program notes for the concert, so he'll know what it's about when he hears it. If I can keep hold of him for three or four years, I'll make a good musician out of him, or kill him, one or the other."

"Don't you read up on the pieces they play before you go to a concert," inquired Ollie.

"No, Doc and I don't need to. Neither Krebiehl, Hale, Apthorp, Goopp, Borowski, Henderson or anybody else that ever wrote program notes have got anything on us. We've go 'em all skinned a block. When I go to a symphony concert, I go to listen, not to dig my nose through about 20 pages of a program book to arrive at the startling information that Mozart was wont to change his stockings twice a week, and his shirt only once, or that good old Papa Haydn always took a bath and put on his 'Sunday-go-to-meetins' before he sat down to dash off a symphony. No, sir, nobody can tell me and Doc anything about the 'Jupiter' symphony, or the Haydn Thirteenth, or the 'Siegfried Idyl,' or the Berliez 'Roman Carnial' that we haven't known since we were knee high to a duck. I am going in the hopes of finding that Doc has dug some new ideas out of these old things, or to find that he has trained the boys in the orchestra up to a conception that somewhere near approximates our own. Why, I can just see Doc now taking the boys through that Mozart symphony. Take a tip from me, when he comes to the minuet, he'll just start the boys on their way, lay down his stick and stand there, with his back to the audience and his hands folded behind him and let the boys work it out for themselves. Oh, he's a wise old gink, is Doc. There's no use working your heads off when you've got a good bunch of players. Give them the idea at rehearsal, and if they don't work it out for you at the performance, tie a can to 'em. Besides, Doc don't take any stock in this star system of conducting. Why, I've seen orchestra con- 's make more fuss over the first bars of Beethoven's Fifth Sym- y than they ought to make over whole of 'Eim Heldenlehen,' or me or Doc would make over the mphal scene in 'Aida,' where 've got 250 people and a band on e stage, besides the orchestra, look after. There's Stransky, for stance—but that's unprofessional. I houldn't have said it. As for the aydn symphony, there'll be nothing it. Why, it'll be just as easy for oc as rolling off a log.

Doc loves Wagner. So do I. ou see, when Doc was just getting nis grip on conducting Wagner, I was delivering high-brow lectures on him in the junk towns in Kentucky, and I was getting away with my end of it just as well as he was with his. That's what makes the bond of sympathy between us. We were both propagating the gospel of good music, each in our own way, both earnestly, with a profound belief in our subject, and in ourselves, and who shall say which of us did the most good. I'll tell you, it's a great thing to be an artist, whether you're at the head of a great orchestra, or pounding the piano in a picture show. And when Doc starts in on t'he 'Siegfried Idyl," he and I will just have in our minds a picture of that beautiful scene on the steps of the villa at Triebschen on the day before Christmas, 1871, when Wagner serenaded his wife Cosima on her birthday with this beautiful tribute to the first fruits of their union, the boy Sigfried. How I'd like to be awakened some morning by that serenade outside my window, with the great master leading, and good old Hans Richter playing trumpet. That would be all the Heaven I'd ever want. The best I get now in the way of a morning serenade is when some Italian colleague of mine pushes his orchestra, composed of one hand organ, under my window, and calls me from my dreams with the stirring strains of that wonderful composition, 'When that midnight choo-choo leaves for Alabam." And yet they wonder why piano players drink! As for "Carnival Romaine" be just

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY. APRIL 5.

NEW FANTASIE AT SYMPHONY

Chadwick's "Aphrodite" Played for the First Time in Boston.

AUDIENCE SHOWS DELIGHT

Extraordinarily Brilliant Rendering of Overture to Weber's "Oberon."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite,"...Chadwick
Serenade No. 3, D minor.............Volkmann
Symphony No 2, "Antar,"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "Oberon"......................Weber

Mr. Chadwick's Fantasie, completed in the summer of 1911, was produced at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Ct., on June 4, 1912. The Theodore Thomas orchestra played it in Chicago last December. The first performance in Boston was yesterday.

The idea of the Fantasie was suggested by the bust of Aphrodite in the Boston Public Library and Mr. Chadwick had in mind a little poem from the Greek Anthology. As the statue of Aphrodite was often placed on or near the seashore, Mr. Chadwick has endeavored to suggest in music "the poetic and tragic scenes that may have passed before the sightless eyes of such a goddess." He has not indicated the nature of the scenes thus portrayed by giving each a title. There is a short introduction, an apostrophe to the goddess; the scenes are connected by a motive developed throughout in various ways; and at the end there is a return to the introductory musical thought.

Thus there is something left to the imagination of the hearer who can listen to the music without disturbing thoughts of comparison between sounds and printed text. He is not obliged to determine whether the music of this or that scene justifies its title. This is true program music; it is also panorama music, with the panorama imagined by the spectator, who is for the time only a hearer. He is left to determine whether this scene is a storm or a naval battle; he may fancy the sight of many-oared galleys sweeping by majestically; lovers interchanging vows or children dancing upon the beach. The panorama of sky and sea and shore is rich and varied according to the imaginative faculty of the hearer, which is enlarged and quickened by the music.

Five years ago in London an "illuminated" symphony, poem by Herbert Trench and music by Joseph Holbrooke, was performed. The poem, Holbrooke was performed. The poem, "Apollo and the Seaman," was recited, while "pictorial expressions" were thrown on a screen by an electric light and the music was played. Is it too fanciful to think of a performance of Mr. Chadwick's Fantasie in a darkened hall and the bust of Aphrodite serenely beautiful upon a screen? The most fastidious composer may yet welcome the opportunity of writing program music for motion pictures.

Even in the most rigidly absolute music a program, a story, may lurk. There are at least two fugues in Bach's "Well Tempered Clavichord" that might be entitled "Prayer," "Divine Consolation." Though this Fantasie may clearly picture certain scenes to Mr. Chadwick, they that have only a faint clew may enjoy the music as absolute. They may say, here is a storm, here is a battle, this is love music and this is a dance. They are not so intent on visualization that they forget the music itself.

And without consideration of its fitness to this or that scene imagined by the composer, this music gave genuine pleasure to the audience yesterday, as was shown by the spontaneous, hearty and prolonged applause that greeted the composer and compelled him to acknowledge again and again the warmth of the reception.

The Fantasie is broadly planned. It calls for a full modern orchestra with celesta and tam-tam; there is recognition of modern harmonic systems and modern orchestral devices and arrangements of color. There is nothing, however, that is affected or insincere. There is straightforward melodic thought, now warm and appealing, now inspiriting, and the technical skill of the composer is used to nourish thought, not to conceal the lack of it. There is largeness in the plan. There is a firm grasp of the details.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," now 45 years old, had been played here only once, and that was in March, 1898. We were then sadly disappointed, for we had read the glowing praise of Liszt, Buelow and others. Mr. Siloti, an enchanting pianist and a delightful companion, was in Boston that spring and he comforted us by saying: "'Antar' is historically interesting. It is not music, and should not be taken from the shelf." And Siloti was a Russian, and not conservative. Hearing "Antar" yesterday, we were again disappointed. Only in the fourth movement is there a sustained poetic flight. There is exotic melody, exotic coloring in the first movement. The second is barbaric enough in mood, yet on the whole ineffective. The third is conspicuous rather than the march motive. These three movements now seem crude in expression, crude and experimental. The composer was evidently a student of Berlioz and Liszt, but he had not the facility to make the most of poetic and striking ideas that came to him. The monotony of melodic repetition and the rhythmic monotony that appeal to orientals here fret the nerves and dull the ears of the occidental. Nor in "Antar" is there the infinite variety in melodic repetition and the gorgeous instrumentation that characterize "Scheherazade," a later work. When "Antar" was written the composer was still in the naval service of Russia. He had not studied seriously; Balakireff had not then drilled him until the pupil outstripped the master in technic.. Viewed as a beginner's orchestral rhapsody, "Antar" is a surprising work, and, as Mr. Siloti said, it has a historical interest.

Volkmann's Serenade was beautifully played by Mr. Warnke and the orchestra of strings and Dr. Muck gave an extraordinarily brilliant reading of the "Oberon" overture. This and "Der Freischuetz" and "Euryanthe" are to the concert conductor what "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" are to the operatic director perplexed over his repertoire for the week.

The orchestral pieces of the concerts next week will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the overtures to "The Magic Flute" and "Egmont" and Liszt's "Battle of the Huns." Mme. Julia Culp will sing songs by Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner with orchestra.

BOSTON GLOBE—

APRIL 5, 1913.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Rimsky's "Antar" Revived After 15 Years.

Symphonic Fantasia "Aphrodite" Played First Time Here.

The 20th Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Chadwick...Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite"
First time in Boston.
Volkmann..........Serenade for Strings, op
Mr Warnke, solo 'cello.
Rimsky-Korsakoff ...."Antar"
Weber ....Overture to "Oberon"

Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote his "Antar" when he was 24. It then was called the "second symphony," and was afterward renamed an "Oriental suite." The work bears witness to the early influence of Mily Balakireff. The leader of the Russian Nationalists in music advised the young man to soar aloft upon his genius and not to impair his wings by learning the craftsmanship of their use. The music of Balakireff himself, curiously enough, is not any more distinguished for elegance or clarity of expression than for the force or splendor of its ideas. The tyranny of technic is neither feared by a great artist nor evaded, but mastered.

Later Rimsky realized the need of strenuous theoretical study and began a course of counterpoint and fugue. He took his exercises to Tschaikowsky to correct, who praised his intelligence and zeal, and wrote to an editor in St Petersburg that in his opinion Balikireff had damaged Rimsky's youthful preparation in music.

That Rimsky gained in power of invention as well as in faculty and grace of expression is revealed on every page of his "Scheherazade," which followed "Antar" by 20 years. There his imagination has a fluency and ardor, and his sense of color a richness worthy of "The Arabian Nights" which inspired him. But "Antar" has little indication of his maturer style.

The story of Semnkowsky, upon which "Antar" is based, is a fantastic one, with its gifts from the fairy queen of the three joys of man—vengeance, power and love. Plausibly it should have engrossed Rimsky, for he was an idealist, who was fond of legend and fairy tale, particularly that of the Orient, who had traveled the seas and visited foreign lands as a young officer of the Russian Navy, who lived in a world of fable while Tschaikowsky wrote out of a heart tortured by the morbid and tragic reality of life. But had Rimsky composed the piece 20 years later it might have been more worthy of the performance yesterday, the first here since Mr Paur played it for the first time in Boston 15 years ago.

The third movement, in which Antar enjoys the gift of power, opens with a theme of upspringing, triumphal exultation in the woodwinds, supported by virile brass, the whole breathing forth an opulent and barbaric splendor. The sheer aspiration and impulse of youth has struck the right note. There is poetic significance in the flowing melody which follows and true Oriental color and atmosphere. It would be well if some older heads would pause here and learn something about the use of the bass drum for emotional purposes. But elsewhere the music disappoints.

There is promise of a colorist to come with a skillful brush both in estimate and sweeping strokes, but there are few convincing ideas that are carried away and remembered. The themes have little character, that of the fairy, first heard in the viola, none at all; and there is tedious repetition, without development, particularly of the theme in 6—8 in the first movement.

Aphrodite, as drawn by Mr Chadwick, is a variable person. It is not strange that she appears to have known the waters of the New England coast, or that she does not always preserve her classic profile. Had there been a "program" representing her as joining a suffragette band and descending with banners upon Congress, or upon Parliament, none could say it was badly done. Nor was her step jaded by the journey for at its end she is equal to what appears a dance of wholly a modern flavor.

There are long breathed and songful passages which have poetic qualities. There is an expressive passage for sol violin with counterpoint in the horn. The opening phrases given out in th strings and English horn suggest tra quility, but the numerous sections

---

MONITOR.

APRIL 5, 1913.

Insistent applause at the close of the playing of George W. Chadwick's tone poem, "Aphrodite," at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, made the composer stand up in his place in the middle of the hall and bow his acknowledgements. The work was presented under the best possible circumstances; for in the first place it was carried over from the plans of the week before and therefore its contents were under the conductor's consideration for an unusually long time, and in the next place it was most favorably placed on the program, being the first piece played. Moreover it was brought out on a day when there was no formal soloist and when there was no great repertory masterwork to compete with it for the interest of the house. Such extraordinary courtesy is not often extended to American composers offering new works to the symphony public and it is cause for gratitude all around.

Mr. Chadwick's "Aphrodite" was destined to ingratiate itself with the Boston public from the fact of the local associations of its subject. The matinee audience, the first to hear the piece, could not but be friendly to the idea of a tone poem written on a subject full of Boston sentiment. Mr. Chadwick's idea of bringing two of the most treasured institutions of the city, the art museum and Symphony hall, into sentimental companionship by writing an orchestral story of the precious marble fragment from Cnidos in the Museum of Fine Arts, was a happy inspiration and one that could have occurred only to an artist profoundly sympathetic with the community's hopes and purposes.

The large thing the music did was to reveal to the community a characteristic side of its aspiration. The more immediate thing was to describe scenery. According to the purport of the program note this scenery was situate somewhere in the Greek archipelago—somewhere among the islands which saw the ship of Jason drive in quest of the fleece, which harbored Odysseus and his sailors on their lazy cruise home from the wars, which helped pay the bills of Pericles in his architectural adornment of Athens. But, according to the evidence of the music itself, the scenery was nowhere in the Aegean sea, but somewhere in the Gulf of Maine. It was the New England view of the sea that the orchestration, now boisterous under the afternoon southwest, now calm under the evening shift to the northwest, disclosed in allegro and andante.

And Mr. Chadwick's New England Aphrodite, looking out from her position on the cliff, beholds not only the Gloucester twentieth century fisherman sail by, sees not only the crews of clipper ships putting their ropes in order, sees not only the tacking and sounding operations of Devon explorers, but she sees Indian canoes paddle into the cove and swing over the surf high upon the beach. The latest American ideas in music are having their influence on the conservative Boston composer, though they come to him, perhaps, by way of the Italian Puccini. American the music is in every bar—academically American, no doubt, yet of the vacation period, not of the lecture room period of the school year. We are out of doors all the time we are listening to the tone poem "Aphrodite."

Admirable work was done by the strings of the orchestra in Volkmann's third serenade. Much more entertaining and human the 'cello is as a solo voice in a style of composition such as Volkmann wrote in this piece than it is in any concerto for 'cello, with full orchestra accompanying. Mr. Warnke as incidental soloist gave entrancing color and joyous phrase to his melodies. The whole interpretation was done in the most appropriate manner imaginable. Conductor, soloist and string chorus all entered into the feeling of the idealized serenade and gave a moment of variety in the symphony calendar that was delightful.

A piece of Russian music, designated by its composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, as a symphony, but for all practical purposes a tone poem in four episodes, was performed. With its oriental subject it was an excellent companion number with the Chadwick piece. Antar of the Russian work and Aphrodite of the American work were hero and heroine of the same drama.

A cunningly devised program of music all on the fantasy order closed with the "Oberon" overture of Weber, a work which is too often used as a time-filler in orchestral programs. Nearly the entire matinee house appreciated the felicity of the choice of this little sketch by the greatest of the musical romanticists and stayed to the end to hear it.

The program of the concert was as follows: Chadwick, symphonic fantasie, "Aphrodite"; Volkmann, serenade No. 3,

---

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 5, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF VARIEGATED SENSATIONS

Mr. Chadwick's New Tone-Poem and Its Uneven Quality—Music That Was Eloquent and Music That Was Only Efficient and Appropriate—The Sensuous Rhetoric of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar"—And the Overture to "Oberon" with a Marvellous Chord

IF Mr. Chadwick's new tone-poem that stood first on the programme of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon had only continued as it began then would it have all seemed imaginative and eloquent music, deserving the hearty applause that it received and that called the composer twice or thrice to his feet. "Aphrodite" is the title of the tone-poem, and a bust of the goddess in our Museum of Fine Arts upon which Mr. Chadwick's eyes had often lingered stirred him to the composition of it, and even, as it seemed, to the writing of "programmatic" poetry. The bust, if recollection rightly recalls it, is grave and contemplative, rather of Aphrodite high goddess than of Aphrodite goad and mistress of sensual passion. Out of such suggestion Mr. Chadwick has seemingly conceived his music. It is not written of Aphrodite, fanning the flames and sharpening the pains of desire in the hearts of men. It is, rather, written of Aphrodite before whose eyes pass the diverse train of her worshippers, and upon whom in noisy rout or in quiet ecstacy, for weal or for woe, she exercises her godhead. And ever they worship her. As she is a perpetual and dominating presence, so does her melody, distinct and penetrating, sensuous yet contemplative, pervade the music from the first singing of it by the English horn over the rich underbody of the 'cellos. As the manifold exercise of her powers and the manifold troop of her worshippers pass before her eyes, so does the tone-poem fall into sundry clearly marked and differentiated divisions. As it begins in grave and swelling apostrophe to the goddess, so also, as in perpetual adoration, it ends.

If only, then, all the intervening music had been like this impressive beginning and that equally impressive close. The apostrophe sounds like music heard out of the shadows of a great pillared temple. A throbbing underbeat seems to propel it. Mysterious harmonies clothe it. There are telling instrumental strokes in it—the timbres that suggest an old worship in an old and sensual land not untinged with the neighboring Orient. In harmonic richness the apostrophe swells to stately climax. Yet here and there in it is a certain sharpness of tone. For do not the pangs of Aphrodite sting? And so, again at the end of the tone-poem, the music of the apostrophe, returns with a deeper intensity and as sober richness. The pageant of her power has passed before her and the more is she high goddess still. The beginning of this pageant—tumultuous, sharply rhythmed, whistling, perturbed and sometimes dissonant music as of the strife and woes of men under Aphrodite's torments, or upon the sea out of which she was born—is but the practised Mr. Chadwick at the business of efficient music-making. The succeeding passages as of amorous vision and ecstasy prompted by a gentler Aphrodite are more imaginative. They begin with a suggestion of the mysterious creeping of amorous longing into human hearts. They rise in the ardor of tremulous desire. They expand in warm climax. The musical fabric is beautifully luminous. Imagination orders the play of harmony and timbres. It is music of sensuous ecstasy. A few measures of tinkling, titillating transition follow and then seemingly a rout of Aphrodite's worshippers pass before her eyes, celebrating her rites, keeping her festival. The music waxes in such festal suggestion; the rites heat the worshippers; there is excitement, tumult, almost frenzy. But again, in spite of a measure of imagination with harmonies and timbres, progressions and dissonances, the outcome is no more than well-made and appropriate music. Then the final apostrophe brings back Mr. Chadwick, writing the rich, eloquent and impressive music with which he began. The rest, in varying degrees, and outside the passage of amorous ecstasy seems no more than practised and efficient music-making.

From Greek goddesses and their American priest in tones, the concert passed—after the amiable intermezzo of one of Volkmann's serenades for strings—to Arab heroes and the Russian celebrant of their legends, their passions and their fate. They say that when this "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff was a new piece, known better by readings of the score than by actual hearings of the music, Bostonians both mistrusted and marvelled. Could music really do such things, and if it did them was it still really music? The ears of 1913, in Boston or in any other musical capital will hear with less wonder and with no misgivings at all. Symphonic suites linked by a recurring and individualizing melody, like the motif of Antar or the song of the fairy that gave him vengeance, power and love, are a familiar musical mechanism nowadays. Our generation has heard enough of the music of the nationalistic Russians to know that their procedure is the transformation of melodies by new harmonic dress, new rhythmic propulsions, new instrumental colorings and new juxtapositions, rather than by the developing and interweaving devices of polyphony. We are quite unalarmed by their repetitions, if only they are harmonically and instrumentally kaleidoscopic enough. Moreover, we have heard this particular Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and his "Spanish Caprice" so familiarly and so thrillingly that we sit expectant for the magic of his harmonic and instrumental coloring.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY. APRIL 5.

NEW FANTASIE AT SYMPHONY

Chadwick's "Aphrodite" Played for the First Time in Boston.

AUDIENCE SHOWS DELIGHT

Extraordinarily Brilliant Rendering of Overture to Weber's "Oberon."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite,"...Chadwick
Serenade No. 3, D minor..............Volkmann
Symphony No 2, "Antar,"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "Oberon"......................Weber

Mr. Chadwick's Fantasie, completed in the summer of 1911, was produced at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Ct., on June 4, 1912. The Theodore Thomas orchestra played it in Chicago last December. The first performance in Boston was yesterday.

The idea of the Fantasie was suggested by the bust of Aphrodite in the Boston Public Library and Mr. Chadwick had in mind a little poem from the Greek Anthology. As the statue of Aphrodite was often placed on or near the seashore, Mr. Chadwick has endeavored to suggest in music "the poetic and tragic scenes that may have passed before the sightless eyes of such a goddess." He has not indicated the nature of the scenes thus portrayed by giving each a title. There is a short introduction, an apostrophe to the goddess; the scenes are connected by a motive developed throughout in various ways; and at the end there is a return to the introductory musical thought.

Thus there is something left to the imagination of the hearer who can listen to the music without disturbing thoughts of comparison between sounds and printed text. He is not obliged to determine whether the music of this or that scene justifies its title. This is true program music; it is also panorama music, with the panorama imagined by the spectator, who is for the time only a hearer. He is left to determine whether this scene is a storm or a naval battle; he may fancy the sight of many-oared galleys sweeping by majestically; lovers interchanging vows or children dancing upon the beach. The panorama of sky and sea and shore is rich and varied according to the imaginative faculty of the hearer, which is enlarged and quickened by the music.

Five years ago in London an "illuminated" symphony, poem by Herbert Trench and music by Joseph Holbrooke, was performed. The poem, Holbrooke was performed. The poem, "Apollo and the Seaman," was recited, while "pictorial expressions" were thrown on a screen by an electric light and the music was played. Is it too fanciful to think of a performance of Mr. Chadwick's Fantasie in a darkened hall and the bust of Aphrodite serenely beautiful upon a screen? The most fastidious composer may yet welcome the opportunity of writing program music for motion pictures.

Even in the most rigidly absolute music a program, a story, may lurk. There are at least two fugues in Bach's "Well Tempered Clavichord" that might be entitled "Prayer," "Divine Consolation." Though this Fantasie may clearly picture certain scenes to Mr. Chadwick, they that have only a faint clew may enjoy the music as absolute. They may say, here is a storm, here is a battle, this is love music and this is a dance. They are not so intent on visualization that they forget the music itself.

And without consideration of its fitness to this or that scene imagined by the composer, this music gave genuine pleasure to the audience yesterday, as was shown by the spontaneous, hearty and prolonged applause that greeted the composer and compelled him to acknowledge again and again the warmth of the reception.

The Fantasie is broadly planned. It calls for a full modern orchestra with celesta and tam-tam; there is recognition of modern harmonic systems and modern orchestral devices and arrangements of color. There is nothing, however, that is affected or insincere. There is straightforward melodic thought, now warm and appealing, now inspiriting, and the technical skill of the composer is used to nourish thought, not to conceal the lack of it. There is largeness in the plan. There is a firm grasp of the details.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," now 45 years old, had been played here only once, and that was in March, 1898. We were then sadly disappointed, for we had read the glowing praise of Liszt, Buelow and others. Mr. Siloti, an enchanting pianist and a delightful companion, was in Boston that spring and he comforted us by saying: "'Antar' is historically interesting. It is not music, and should not be taken from the shelf." And Siloti was a Russian, and not conservative. Hearing "Antar" yesterday, we were again disappointed. Only in the fourth movement is there a sustained poetic flight. There is exotic melody, exotic coloring in the first movement. The second is barbaric enough in mood, yet on the whole ineffective. The third is conspicuous [illegible] second [illegible] rather than the march motive. These three movements now seem crude in expression, crude and experimental. The composer was evidently a student of Berlioz and Liszt, but he had not the facility to make the most of poetic and striking ideas that came to him. The monotony of melodic repetition and the rhythmic monotony that appeal to orientals here fret the nerves and dull the ears of the occidental. Nor in "Antar" is there the infinite variety in melodic repetition and the gorgeous instrumentation that characterize "Scheherazade," a later work. When "Antar" was written the composer was still in the naval service of Russia. He had not studied seriously; Balakireff had not then drilled him until the pupil outstripped the master in technic.. Viewed as a beginner's orchestral rhapsody, "Antar" is a surprising work, and, as Mr. Siloti said, it has a historical interest.

Volkmann's Serenade was beautifully played by Mr. Warnke and the orchestra of strings and Dr. Muck gave an extraordinarily brilliant reading of the "Oberon" overture. This and "Der Freischuetz" and "Euryanthe" are to the concert conductor what "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" are to the operatic director perplexed over his repertoire for the week.

The orchestral pieces of the concerts next week will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the overtures to "The Magic Flute" and "Egmont" and Liszt's "Battle of the Huns." Mme. Julia Culp will sing songs by Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner with orchestra.

BOSTON GLOBE-

APRIL 5, 1913.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Rimsky's "Antar" Revived After 15 Years.

Symphonic Fantasia "Aphrodite" Played First Time Here.

The 20th Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Chadwick...Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite"
First time in Boston.
Volkmann..........Serenade for Strings, op
Mr Warnke, solo 'cello.
Rimsky-Korsakoff ...."Antar"
Weber ....Overture to "Oberon"

Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote his "Antar" when he was 24. It then was called the "second symphony," and was afterward renamed an "Oriental suite." The work bears witness to the early influence of Mily Balakireff. The leader of the Russian Nationalists in music advised the young man to soar aloft upon his genius and not to impair his wings by learning the craftsmanship of their use. The music of Balakireff himself, curiously enough, is not any more distinguished for elegance or clarity of expression than for the force or splendor of its ideas. The tyranny of technic is neither feared by a great artist nor evaded, but mastered.

Later Rimsky realized the need of strenuous theoretical study and began a course of counterpoint and fugue. He took his exercises to Tschaikowsky to correct, who praised his intelligence and zeal, and wrote to an editor in St Petersburg that in his opinion Balikireff had damaged Rimsky's youthful preparation in music.

That Rimsky gained in power of invention as well as in faculty and grace of expression is revealed on every page of his "Scheherazade," which followed "Antar" by 20 years. There his imagination has a fluency and ardor, and his sense of color a richness worthy of "The Arabian Nights" which inspired him, But "Antar" has little indication of his maturer style.

The story of Sennkowsky, upon which "Antar" is based, is a fantastic one, with its gifts from the fairy queen of the three joys of man—vengeance, power and love. Plausibly it should have engrossed Rimsky, for he was an idealist, who was fond of legend and fairy tale, particularly that of the Orient, who had traveled the seas and visited foreign lands as a young officer of the Russian Navy, who lived in a world of fable while Tschaikowsky wrote out of a heart tortured by the morbid and tragic reality of life. But had Rimsky composed the piece 20 years later it might have been more worthy of the performance yesterday, the first here since Mr Paur played it for the first time in Boston 15 years ago.

The third movement, in which Antar enjoys the gift of power, opens with a theme of upspringing, triumphal exultation in the woodwinds, supported by virile brass, the whole breathing forth an opulent and barbaric splendor. The sheer aspiration and impulse of youth has struck the right note. There is poetic significance in the flowing melody which follows and true Oriental color and atmosphere. It would be well if some older heads would pause here and learn something about the use of the bass drum for emotional purposes. But elsewhere the music disappoints.

There is promise of a colorist to come with a skillful brush both in estimate and sweeping strokes, but there are few convincing ideas that are carried away and remembered. The themes have little character, that of the fairy, first heard in the viola, none at all; and there is tedious repetition, without development, particularly of the theme in 6—8 in the first movement.

Aphrodite, as drawn by Mr Chadwick, is a variable person. It is not strange that she appears to have known the waters of the New England coast, or that she does not always preserve her classic profile. Had there been a "program" representing her as joining a suffragette band and descending with banners upon Congress, or upon Parliament, none could say it was badly done. Nor was her step jaded by the journey, for at its end she is equal to what appears a dance of wholly a modern flavor.

There are long breathed and songful passages which have poetic qualities. There is an expressive passage for solo violin with counterpoint in the horn. The opening phrases given out in the strings and English horn suggest tra[illegible] quality, but the numerous sections [illegible]

MONITOR.

APRIL 5, 1913

Insistent applause at the close of the playing of George W. Chadwick's tone poem, "Aphrodite," at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, made the composer stand up in his place in the middle of the hall and bow his acknowledgements. The work was presented under the best possible circumstances; for in the first place it was carried over from the plans of the week before and therefore its contents were under the conductor's consideration for an unusually long time, and in the next place it was most favorably placed on the program, being the first piece played. Moreover it was brought out on a day when there was no formal soloist and when there was no great repertory masterwork to compete with it for the interest of the house. Such extraordinary courtesy is not often extended to American composers offering new works to the symphony public and it is cause for gratitude all around.

Mr. Chadwick's "Aphrodite" was destined to ingratiate itself with the Boston public from the fact of the local associations of its subject. The matinee audience, the first to hear the piece, could not but be friendly to the idea of a tone poem written on a subject full of Boston sentiment. Mr. Chadwick's idea of bringing two of the most treasured institutions of the city, the art museum and Symphony hall, into sentimental companionship by writing an orchestral story of the precious marble fragment from Cnidos in the Museum of Fine Arts, was a happy inspiration and one that could have occurred only to an artist profoundly sympathetic with the community's hopes and purposes.

The large thing the music did was to reveal to the community a characteristic side of its aspiration. The more immediate thing was to describe scenery. According to the purport of the program note this scenery was situate somewhere in the Greek archipelago—somewhere among the islands which saw the ship of Jason drive in quest of the fleece, which harbored Odysseus and his sailors on their lazy cruise home from the wars, which helped pay the bills of Pericles in his architectural adornment of Athens. But, according to the evidence of the music itself, the scenery was nowhere in the Aegean sea, but somewhere in the Gulf of Maine. It was the New England view of the sea that the orchestration, now boisterous under the afternoon southwest, now calm under the evening shift to the northwest, disclosed in allegro and andante.

And Mr. Chadwick's New England Aphrodite, looking out from her position on the cliff, beholds not only the Gloucester twentieth century fisherman sail by, sees not only the crews of clipper ships putting their ropes in order, sees not only the tacking and sounding operations of Devon explorers, but she sees Indian canoes paddle into the cove and swing over the surf high upon the beach. The latest American ideas in music are having their influence on the conservative Boston composer, though they come to him, perhaps, by way of the Italian Puccini. American the music is in every bar—academically American, no doubt, yet of the vacation period, not of the lecture room period of the school year. We are out of doors all the time we are listening to the tone poem "Aphrodite."

Admirable work was done by the strings of the orchestra in Volkmann's third serenade. Much more entertaining and human the 'cello is as a solo voice in a style of composition such as Volkmann wrote in this piece than it is in any concerto for 'cello, with full orchestra accompanying. Mr. Warnke as incidental soloist gave entrancing color and joyous phrase to his melodies. The whole interpretation was done in the most appropriate manner imaginable. Conductor, soloist and string chorus all entered into the feeling of the idealized serenade and gave a moment of variety in the symphony calendar that was delightful.

A piece of Russian music, designated by its composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, as a symphony, but for all practical purposes a tone poem in four episodes, was performed. With its oriental subject it was an excellent companion number with the Chadwick piece. Antar of the Russian work and Aphrodite of the American work were hero and heroine of the same drama.

A cunningly devised program of music all on the fantasy order closed with the "Oberon" overture of Weber, a work which is too often used as a time-filler in orchestral programs. Nearly the entire matinee house appreciated the felicity of the choice of this little sketch by the greatest of the musical romanticists and stayed to the end to hear it.

The program of the concert was as follows: Chadwick, symphonic fantasie, "Aphrodite"; Volkmann, serenade No. 3,

---

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 5, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF VARIEGATED SENSATIONS

Mr. Chadwick's New Tone-Poem and Its Uneven Quality—Music That Was Eloquent and Music That Was Only Efficient and Appropriate—The Sensuous Rhetoric of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar"—And the Overture to "Oberon" with a Marvellous Chord

If Mr. Chadwick's new tone-poem that stood first on the programme of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon had only continued as it began then would it have all seemed imaginative and eloquent music, deserving the hearty applause that it received and that called the composer twice or thrice to his feet. "Aphrodite" is the title of the tone-poem, and a bust of the goddess in our Museum of Fine Arts upon which Mr. Chadwick's eyes had often lingered stirred him to the composition of it, and even, as it seemed, to the writing of "programmatic" poetry. The bust, if recollection rightly recalls it, is grave and contemplative, rather of Aphrodite high goddess than of Aphrodite goad and mistress of sensual passion. Out of such suggestion Mr. Chadwick has seemingly conceived his music. It is not written of Aphrodite, fanning the flames and sharpening the pains of desire in the hearts of men. It is, rather, written of Aphrodite before whose eyes pass the diverse train of her worshippers, and upon whom in noisy rout or in quiet ecstacy, for weal or for woe, she exercises her godhead. And ever they worship her. As she is a perpetual and dominating presence, so does her melody, distinct and penetrating, sensuous yet contemplative, pervade the music from the first singing of it by the English horn over the rich underbody of the 'cellos. As the manifold exercise of her powers and the manifold troop of her worshippers pass before her eyes, so does the tone-poem fall into sundry clearly marked and differentiated divisions. As it begins in grave and swelling apostrophe to the goddess, so also, as in perpetual adoration, it ends.

If only, then, all the intervening music had been like this impressive beginning and that equally impressive close. The apostrophe sounds like music heard out of the shadows of a great pillared temple. A throbbing underbeat seems to propel it. Mysterious harmonies clothe it. There are telling instrumental strokes in it—the timbres that suggest an old worship in an old and sensual land not untinged with the neighboring Orient. In harmonic richness the apostrophe swells to stately climax. Yet here and there in it is a certain sharpness of tone. For do not the pangs of Aphrodite sting? And so, again at the end of the tone-poem, the music of the apostrophe, returns with a deeper intensity and as sober richness. The pageant of her power has passed before her and the more is she high goddess still. The beginning of this pageant—tumultuous, sharply rhythmed, whistling, perturbed and sometimes dissonant music as of the strife and woes of men under Aphrodite's torments, or upon the sea out of which she was born—is but the practised Mr. Chadwick at the business of efficient music-making. The succeeding passages as of amorous vision and ecstasy prompted by a gentler Aphrodite are more imaginative. They begin with a suggestion of the mysterious creeping of amorous longing into human hearts. They rise in the ardor of tremulous desire. They expand in warm climax. The musical fabric is beautifully luminous. Imagination orders the play of harmony and timbres. It is music of sensuous ecstasy. A few measures of tinkling, titillating transition follow and then seemingly a rout of Aphrodite's worshippers pass before her eyes, celebrating her rites, keeping her festival. The music waxes in such festal suggestion; the rites heat the worshippers; there is excitement, tumult, almost frenzy. But again, in spite of a measure of imagination with harmonies and timbres, progressions and dissonances, the outcome is no more than well-made and appropriate music. Then the final apostrophe brings back Mr. Chadwick, writing the rich, eloquent and impressive music with which he began. The rest, in varying degrees, and outside the passage of amorous ecstasy seems no more than practised and efficient music-making.

From Greek goddesses and their American priest in tones, the concert passed—after the amiable intermezzo of one of Volkmann's serenades for strings—to Arab heroes and the Russian celebrant of their legends, their passions and their fate. They say that when this "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff was a new piece, known better by readings of the score than by actual hearings of the music, Bostonians both mistrusted and marvelled. Could music really do such things, and if it did them was it still really music? The ears of 1913, in Boston or in any other musical capital will hear with less wonder and with no misgivings at all. Symphonic suites linked by a recurring and individualizing melody, like the motif of Antar or the song of the fairy that gave him vengeance, power and love, are a familiar musical mechanism nowadays. Our generation has heard enough of the music of the nationalistic Russians to know that their procedure is the transformation of melodies by new harmonic dress, new rhythmic propulsions, new instrumental colorings and new juxtapositions, rather than by the developing and interweaving devices of polyphony. We are quite unalarmed by their repetitions, if only they are harmonically and instrumentally kaleidoscopic enough. Moreover, we have heard this particular Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and his "Spanish Caprice" so familiarly and so thrillingly that we sit expectant for the magic of his harmonic and instrumental coloring.

"Antar," when it is played with such virtuosity and imagination as Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought to it, yields these sensations plentifully. Antar himself may or may not be vividly characterized in tones. The second movement may suggest the joy of vengeance or any other pursuit in savage force and elation to sombre satiety. The third movement may suggest a sumptuous Oriental pageant more than the fierce joy of power. The fourth movement suffices for music of forebodding throbbing made music of wistful amorous longing. No one need think once or twice of the programmatic quality of the music of "Antar" or try to fit it to the alternately minute and curt schedule of the fly-leaf. No one need linger much longer over its descriptive and its characterizing virtue. It may or may not suggest the desert, the fleeing gazelle, the smitten bird, the longing glance of Antar out of the fairy's arms toward the abodes of men and many another particularized detail. The purely sensuous satisfactions of the music are enough in themselves. The hollow intervals, the sombre coloring, the expansive monotony of the beginning stir ear and imagination. The melody of the fairy—if it is really so—fascinates ear and fancy in the bright suavities of the flute. The rhetorical richness and glow of the succeeding music are like a strong and stimulating draft upon the tongue, exciting every sensory nerve. The fierce and reiterated progressions of the second movement are like a savage and pursuing vengeance and how Russian or rather quasi-Oriental is the mood of satiety in the music of the end. So no doubt old Ivan looked upon the massacre and the sackings of Kazan and was content.

The unmistakable power of the third movement is the power to achieve such exciting play of timbres and such gorgeous instrumental coloring. To hear such deep-voiced pluckings of the strings, such aerial throbbings of the harp, such lusciously expanding cantilena is to receive the tonal sensations that Keats experienced in the flow of champagne over his peppered tongue. Moreover, Rimsky-Korsakoff has his peppered, too, in his brilliant din. With the finale yet again, instrumental coloring and harmonic and rhythmic magic become the servants of clear imaginative design as well as the bearers of purely sensuous excitement. Passion speaks in the song of the 'cello against the ardent harp. The music of the fairy returns in the new beauty of wistful longing. The drum beats of dread, dark harmonies of foreboding foretell the turning of Antar's thoughts to the abodes of men. There is suspense in the music. The fairy's voice becomes yet more magical. Antar dies upon a kiss, upon the luxurious bed of Rimsky-Korsakoff's harmonies and instrumentation. And it is as though, in the final diminuendo the old legend and the fairy magic died upon the empty air. Throughout this finale Rimsky-Korsakoff seems to achieve both his delineative and his musical end. Elsewhere the vitality of the music is its glowing profusion of harmonic and instrumental rhetoric and the sensuous thrill of it all.

Yet the finest thrill of all the concert was to come in the hackneyed old overture to "Oberon." Even the elderly ladies refused in numbers to linger and listen to it; while some of the younger were so sure that the end had come at the chord leading into the "main body" of the overture that then and there they began to adjust their hats. The "slow introduction" as the analysts say, ran its course in beautiful phrasing by conductor and men alike; in exquisite quality of soft and lustrous tone; in the justest of disclosing pace and ordered background. It was indeed music of romantic and mysterious loveliness. Then suddenly came the great crashing chord that separates the overture proper from this introduction. And it was the chord of which conductors and may be their men have seen an unfulfilled vision. This time the vision was accomplished. It was the perfect chord—the chord of the whole orchestra became as one man, full, exact, intense and thrilling, an emotion itself. Even in the fiery rushes and the jubilant glow of the rest of the overture, it still blazed across memory. All the pretty strokes of Volkmann's serenade — and orchestra and conductor were adept in them—seemed as play beside this marvel. H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD.

APRIL 6. 1913.

"Until a few years ago the public rehearsals were not criticised. The critics attended the Saturday night concerts and their articles were published on Sunday, Monday morning, Monday afternoon, according to the character of the newspaper, whether it had a Sunday edition or was an evening journal. Everyone was then satisfied. How is it now? A pianist, violinist, singer, appears on Friday afternoon, or a new orchestral work is played. The soloist may not be wholly in the vein, for there are many artists who play or sing better at night than in the afternoon, which is to them a dead time, as it is to many who are accustomed to early morning and late night work. Suppose the violinist occasionally slobbers or his intonation is false, the singer shrieks, the pianist is dull. The critic must do his duty and the audience of Saturday night is prepared in advance. If the critics condemn a new orchestral work or find fault with the performance on Friday, again the Saturday night audience is prejudiced. If the critics praise, the audience is predisposed to applaud. I know that there are some who hear with their own ears and do not rely on the opinion of any critic; but there are many who, while they know that critics are mortal, and therefore often prejudiced; nevertheless are influenced by the Saturday reviews. I insist that the practice of publishing criticisms on Saturday in advance of the concert that night, is unfair to the conductor, the orchestra, the audience of Saturday, and often cruel to the soloist. Suppose that Mme. Portamento, the soprano, or Mr. Boanerges, the pianist, is not well disposed on Friday—and is unanimously roasted on Saturday. With what heart does either one come before the public on Saturday night?"

There is truth also sense in these remarks. Until a few years ago, it was understood by the management and the editors that no critical reviews should be published until after the Saturday concert. Only on special occasions, as the first appearance of a conductor, was this rule broken. The editor of an evening newspaper concluded that the review of a Saturday concert published on Monday afternoon was belated. The Sunday and Monday morning newspapers were ahead of his. He therefore insisted that the Friday concert should be reviewed for the Saturday issue of his newspaper. For some time he was alone in this, but one by one the editors of the other journals instructed their critics to review the public rehearsal instead of the concert, and the management not only consented but finally approved.

The musician might have added that the present system is also unfair to the critics; for the Saturday night performances are as a rule more brilliant. Not only has there been a public performance, but the orchestra as well as the soloist is at night in finer fettle.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 5, 1913.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE APPLAUDS COMPOSER

First Performance Here of George W. Chadwick's Fantasie "Aphrodite."

By E. F. Harkins.

Salvos of applause lasting several minutes drew George Whitfield Chadwick to his feet again and again at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday after the first performance here of his symphonic fantasie, "Aphrodite," and the composer's response ended in a complimentary sweep of his hand to show his debt to the beautiful playing of the orchestra.

The head of Aphrodite given to the Art Museum here by Francis Bartlett was the acknowledged inspiration for the fantasie, which had its original performance last June at the meeting of the Litchfield County Choral Union in Norfolk, Conn. The head was found in the Island of Cnidos, and it is presumed that it belonged to a statue such as the Greeks of old were wont to erect along the seashore to the goddess of love and of sailors. The tone-poem is an "attempt to suggest in music the poetic and tragic scenes which may have passed before the sightless eyes of such a goddess." There are passages poetic and piquant, after the manner of the modern French school, which is a rather new departure for Mr. Chadwick, and there is a section vividly suggesting a storm at sea and the famous passage from "Elijah"—"The stormy billows are high; their fury is mighty."

But there are other sections, of which there are ten in all, that leave much to the hearer's imagination. This is especially true of the two marked "Alla marcia," which may have something to do with a parade of naval reserves. At any rate, one of these is of a very popular nature, and no doubt it was noted by the two members of the orchestra who will conduct the "Pop" concerts next month.

"Aphrodite" is a light and agreeable composition, all in all, and, though the inspiration did not run deep, it evoked much that will please the average concert-goer. That certainly was the effect it had on the audiences yesterday and the applause was hearty and genuine, as if for pleasure largely free from the conundrums so commonly found in the music of the day.

Similarly ingratiating was Volkmann's third "Serenade," for string orchestra, with its suave, moonlight melodies, fit to accompany the sweet and sentimental discourse between Lorenzo and Jessica in Portia's garden, but most welcome of all on account of its opportunities for the display of the unrivaled tone that makes the Boston orchestra the finest in the world. It is worth while attending the concert tonight merely to hear this charming dialogue between the violins and the 'cellos. The popularity of this number, too, was unmistakable, and Dr. Muck, after bowing himself, took Mr. Warnke, who played the 'cello solos, by the hand and brought him forth from the modest background.

The Volkmann piece is on the Symphony program for the first time since 1904. But Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Antar" symphony, which completes the program, was last heard here in 1898. Paur introduced it then, though Nikisch, his predecessor, had conducted the first German production, at Magdeburg, in 1881. The composer paid a high compliment to Nikisch and also mentioned that the third and fourth movements were the most favorably received. It was the same yesterday. They have the splendor and the sensuousness of the Orient that only the Russian composers seem able to portray with unfailing power.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

APRIL 5, 1913

"APHRODITE" A BRILLIANT WORK

GEORGE CHADWICK'S LATEST COMPOSITION

One of the Most Ambitious Efforts of a Really Great American Composer.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick. Symphonic Poem. "Aphrodite."
Volkmann. Serenade for Strings. D minor.
  Solo Cello, Mr. Warnke.
Rimski-Korakoff. Symphony No. 2. "Antar."
Weber. "Oberon" overture.

Again a purely orchestral concert, an occasion which we rank best, for our noble orchestra has no need of a "star" soloist to make its programmes attractive. And in this concert we had the first Boston performance of a very important work by George W. Chadwick. His "Aphrodite" is one of his largest scores. But everything that Mr. Chadwick composes is of importance in the history of American music. He is the foremost figure in native composition today and we hold him to be the greatest composer that our country has yet produced. He has more learning than Parker, more geniality than MacDowell, and he is far more versatile than anyone in the American list. If one will recall the sweep from "Tabasco" to "Melpomene," from the song, "Allah," to the "Vagrom Ballad," each successful in its particular field, the wide scope of this versatility will be recognized at once. It is time that the leading rank of Mr. Chadwick should be more fully recognized.

"Aphrodite" is a symphonic poem in modern vein and is one of the most ambitious of the composer's scores. It is so different from his usual vein that it may not be at once understood. It calls for a very full orchestra, which is used with complete mastery. The expressively mournful instruments, the viola and the English horn, are made prominent in a striking manner; the celesta, with its bell-like tones, is used in harmonic effects (against muted strings) in a manner that is almost a new tone-color; bells are introduced; even trills upon the bass drum (a device which is rare in music in spite of its use by Verdi and Berlioz) are given.

The form itself is a new departure, for it is a series of short, connected, tone-pictures, applying the idea of the suite, very successfully, to the symphonic poem. These pictures all circle around the central idea of the beautiful goddess, who has a guiding motive which appears clearly at the beginning, and, after ingenious changes, comes back clearly at the end. Beginning upon the viola solo it finally is magnified by the strings in a striking conclusion.

The work had its inception in a beautiful bust of Aphrodite, in the Boston art museum, just as Boecklin's paintings inspired great music in Huber and Weingartner, a relationship of the two arts that ought to be more fully recognized. The successive scenes of the work vary from the innocent prattle of childhood to the shocks of storm and tempest.

The portrayal, in the early part of the score, of moonlight on the waves, in which the celesta plays so striking a part, is very beautiful, and throughout the entire work Mr. Chadwick's enviable gift of melody prevents him from pursuing the thorny paths of ugliness in which many modern composers are wearing themselves out,—and their audiences too. There is never an intemperate use of discords.

Other points which the auditor should notice and appreciate are the mystery of the beginning, with its suspense pictured upon the kettledrums, the beautiful love duet, a bit of exquisite antiphonal writing, the fierce storm (a howling northeaster that New Englanders will appreciate), the homage of the temple, the processional and dance-rhythms, and the calm beauty of the return of the first thoughts at the end, as if the goddess lived eternal through storm, the calm of temples, the brief triumphs of man.

Mr. Chadwick has never descended to musical puzzle-writing and evidently has the old-fashioned idea that even a great display of modern tone-coloring ought to be made beautiful. If we compare this work with the recently-heard score of Lendvai (both works being examples of modern scoring), we can perceive points of decided superiority in the home-made production.

It was especially appropriate to give this work at the beginning of this month, for the Greeks held April sacred to this beautiful but rather inconstant goddess. If one judged of the work as a single movement it would seem of unusual length, but, if the auditor follows the scheme of several contrasted pictures linked together, one will perceive that there is brevity rather than prolixity here, although one might demand yet more of unity.

The picture caught up the Greek spirit very well, not by any use of Greek musical modes, but by loftiness of treatment, by an avoidance of extreme passion, by not making Aphrodite a Parisian goddess. In spite of the intricacy of portions of the work and of its lofty character, going beyond mere popularity, the number was greeted with prolonged applause. Five times was Mr. Chadwick obliged to rise from his seat in the audience and bow his acknowledgments.

"Antar," when it is played with such virtuosity and imagination as Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought to it, yields these sensations plentifully. Antar himself may or may not be vividly characterized in tones. The second movement may suggest the joy of vengeance or any other pursuit in savage force and elation to sombre satiety. The third movement may suggest a sumptuous Oriental pageant more than the fierce joy of power. The fourth movement suffices for music of forebodding throbbing made music of wistful amorous longing. No one need think once or twice of the programmatic quality of the music of "Antar" or try to fit it to the alternately minute and curt schedule of the fly-leaf. No one need linger much longer over its descriptive and its characterizing virtue. It may or may not suggest the desert, the fleeing gazelle, the smitten bird, the longing glance of Antar out of the fairy's arms toward the abodes of men and many another particularized detail. The purely sensuous satisfactions of the music are enough in themselves. The hollow intervals, the sombre coloring, the expansive monotony of the beginning stir ear and imagination. The melody of the fairy—if it is really so—fascinates ear and fancy in the bright suavities of the flute. The rhetorical richness and glow of the succeeding music are like a strong and stimulating draft upon the tongue, exciting every sensory nerve. The fierce and reiterated progressions of the second movement are like a savage and pursuing vengeance and how Russian or rather quasi-Oriental is the mood of satiety in the music of the end. So no doubt old Ivan looked upon the massacre and the sackings of Kazan and was content.

The unmistakable power of the third movement is the power to achieve such exciting play of timbres and such gorgeous instrumental coloring. To hear such deep-voiced pluckings of the strings, such aerial throbbings of the harp, such lusciously expanding cantilena is to receive the tonal sensations that Keats experienced in the flow of champagne over his peppered tongue. Moreover, Rimsky-Korsakoff has his peppered, too, in his brilliant din[illegible] With the finale yet again, instrumental coloring and harmonic and rhythmic magic become the servants of clear imaginative design as well as the bearers of purely sensuous excitement. Passion speaks in the song of the 'cello against the ardent harp. The music of the fairy returns in the new beauty of wistful longing. The drum beats of dread, dark harmonies of foreboding foretell the turning of Antar's thoughts to the abodes of men. There is suspense in the music. The fairy's voice becomes yet more magical. Antar dies upon a kiss, upon the luxurious bed of Rimsky-Korsakoff's harmonies and instrumentation. And it is as though, in the final diminuendo the old legend and the fairy magic died upon the empty air. Throughout this finale Rimsky-Korsakoff seems to achieve both his delineative and his musical end. Elsewhere the vitality of the music is its glowing profusion of harmonic and instrumental rhetoric and the sensuous thrill of it all.

Yet the finest thrill of all the concert was to come in the hackneyed old overture to "Oberon." Even the elderly ladies refused in numbers to linger and listen to it; while some of the younger were so sure that the end had come at the chord leading into the "main body" of the overture that then and there they began to adjust their hats. The "slow introduction" as the analysts say, ran its course in beautiful phrasing by conductor and men alike; in exquisite quality of soft and lustrous tone; in the justest of disclosing pace and ordered background. It was indeed music of romantic and mysterious loveliness. Then suddenly came the great crashing chord that separates the overture proper from this introduction. And it was the chord of which conductors and may be their men have seen an unfulfilled vision. This time the vision was accomplished. It was the perfect chord—the chord of the whole orchestra became as one man, full, exact, intense and thrilling, an emotion itself. Even in the fiery rushes and the jubilant glow of the rest of the overture, it still blazed across memory. All the pretty strokes of Volkmann's serenade — and orchestra and conductor were adept in them—seemed as play beside this marvel. H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD.

APRIL 6. 1913.

"Until a few years ago the public rehearsals were not criticised. The critics attended the Saturday night concerts and their articles were published on Sunday, Monday morning, Monday afternoon, according to the character of the newspaper, whether it had a Sunday edition or was an evening journal. Everyone was then satisfied. How is it now? A pianist, violinist, singer, appears on Friday afternoon, or a new orchestral work is played. The soloist may not be wholly in the vein, for there are many artists who play or sing better at night than in the afternoon, which is to them a dead time, as it is to many who are accustomed to early morning and late night work. Suppose the violinist occasionally slobbers or his intonation is false, the singer shrieks, the pianist is dull. The critic must do his duty and the audience of Saturday night is prepared in advance. If the critics condemn a new orchestral work or find fault with the performance on Friday, again the Saturday night audience is prejudiced. If the critics praise, the audience is predisposed to applaud. I know that there are some who hear with their own ears and do not rely on the opinion of any critic; but there are many who, while they know that critics are mortal, and therefore often prejudiced; nevertheless are influenced by the Saturday reviews. I insist that the practice of publishing criticisms on Saturday in advance of the concert that night, is unfair to the conductor, the orchestra, the audience of Saturday, and often cruel to the soloist. Suppose that Mme. Portamento, the soprano, or Mr. Boanerges, the pianist, is not well disposed on Friday—and is unanimously roasted on Saturday. With what heart does either one come before the public on Saturday night?"

There is truth also sense in these remarks. Until a few years ago, it was understood by the management and the editors that no critical reviews should be published until after the Saturday concert. Only on special occasions, as the first appearance of a conductor, was this rule broken. The editor of an evening newspaper concluded that the review of a Saturday concert published on Monday afternoon was belated. The Sunday and Monday morning newspapers were ahead of his. He therefore insisted that the Friday concert should be reviewed for the Saturday issue o his newspaper. For some time he wa alone in this, but one by one the editors of the other journals instructed th critics to review the public rehearsa instead of the concert, and the management not only consented but finally approved.

The musician might have added that the present system is also unfair to the critics; for the Saturday night performances are as a rule more brilliant Not only has there been a public performance, but the orchestra as well as the soloist is at night in finer fettle.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 5, 1913.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE APPLAUDS COMPOSER

First Performance Here of George W. Chadwick's Fantasie "Aphrodite."

By E. F. Harkins.

Salvos of applause lasting several minutes drew George Whitfield Chadwick to his feet again and again at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday after the first performance here of his symphonic fantasie, "Aphrodite," and the composer's response ended in a complimentary sweep of his hand to show his debt to the beautiful playing of the orchestra.

The head of Aphrodite given to the Art Museum here by Francis Bartlett was the acknowledged inspiration for the fantasie, which had its original performance last June at the meeting of the Litchfield County Choral Union in Norfolk, Conn. The head was found in the Island of Cnidos, and it is presumed that it belonged to a statue such as the Greeks of old were wont to erect along the seashore to the goddess of love and of sailors. The tone-poem is an "attempt to suggest in music the poetic and tragic scenes which may have passed before the sightless eyes of such a goddess." There are passages poetic and piquant, after the manner of the modern French school, which is a rather new departure for Mr. Chadwick, and there is a section vividly suggesting a storm at sea and the famous passage from "Elijah"—"The stormy billows are high; their fury is mighty."

But there are other sections, of which there are ten in all, that leave much to the hearer's imagination. This is especially true of the two marked "Alla marcia," which may have something to do with a parade of naval reserves. At any rate, one of these is of a very popular nature, and no doubt it was noted by the two members of the orchestra who will conduct the "Pop" concerts next month.

"Aphrodite" is a light and agreeable composition, all in all, and, though the inspiration did not run deep, it evoked much that will please the average concert-goer. That certainly was the effect it had on the audiences yesterday and the applause was hearty and genuine, as if for pleasure largely free from the conundrums so commonly found in the music of the day.

Similarly ingratiating was Volkmann's third "Serenade," for string orchestra, with its suave, moonlight melodies, fit to accompany the sweet and sentimental discourse between Lorenzo and Jessica in Portia's garden, but most welcome of all on account of its opportunities for the display of the unrivaled tone that makes the Boston orchestra the finest in the world. It is worth while attending the concert tonight merely to hear this charming dialogue between the violins and the 'cellos. The popularity of this number, too, was unmistakable, and Dr. Muck, after bowing himself, took Mr. Warnke, who played the 'cello solos, by the hand and brought him forth from the modest background.

The Volkmann piece is on the Symphony program for the first time since 1904. But Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Antar" symphony, which completes the program, was last heard here in 1898. Paur introduced it then, though Nikisch, his predecessor, had conducted the first German production, at Magdeburg, in 1881. The composer paid a high compliment to Nikisch and also mentioned that the third and fourth movements were the most favorably received. It was the same yesterday. They have the splendor and the sensuousness of the Orient that only the Russian composers seem able to portray with unfailing power.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

APRIL 5, 1913

"APHRODITE" A BRILLIANT WORK

GEORGE CHADWICK'S LATEST COMPOSITION

One of the Most Ambitious Efforts of a Really Great American Composer.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick. Symphonic Poem. "Aphrodite."
Volkmann. Serenade for Strings. D minor.
Solo Cello, Mr. Warnke.
Rimski-Korakoff. Symphony No. 2. "Antar."
Weber. "Oberon" overture.

Again a purely orchestral concert, an occasion which we rank best, for our noble orchestra has no need of a "star" soloist to make its programmes attractive. And in this concert we had the first Boston performance of a very important work by George W. Chadwick. His "Aphrodite" is one of his largest scores. But everything that Mr. Chadwick composes is of importance in the history of American music. He is the foremost figure in native composition today and we hold him to be the greatest composer that our country has yet produced. He has more learning than Parker, more geniality than MacDowell, and he is far more versatile than anyone in the American list. If one will recall the sweep from "Tabasco" to "Melpomene," from the song, "Allah," to the "Vagrom Ballad," each successful in its particular field, the wide scope of this versatility will be recognized at once. It is time that the leading rank of Mr. Chadwick should be more fully recognized.

"Aphrodite" is a symphonic poem in modern vein and is one of the most ambitious of the composer's scores. It is so different from his usual vein that it may not be at once understood. It calls for a very full orchestra, which is used with complete mastery. The expressively mournful instruments, the viola and the English horn, are made prominent in a striking manner; the celesta, with its bell-like tones, is used in harmonic effects (against muted strings) in a manner that is almost a new tone-color; bells are introduced; even trills upon the bass drum (a device which is rare in music in spite of its use by Verdi and Berlioz) are given.

The form itself is a new departure, for it is a series of short, connected, tone-pictures, applying the idea of the suite, very successfully, to the symphonic poem. These pictures all circle around the central idea of the beautiful goddess, who has a guiding motive which appears clearly at the beginning, and, after ingenious changes, comes back clearly at the end. Beginning upon the viola solo it finally is magnified by the strings in a striking conclusion.

The work had its inception in a beautiful bust of Aphrodite, in the Boston art museum, just as Boecklin's paintings inspired great music in Huber and Weingartner, a relationship of the two arts that ought to be more fully recognized. The successive scenes of the work vary from the innocent prattle of childhood to the shocks of storm and tempest.

The portrayal, in the early part of the score, of moonlight on the waves, in which the celesta plays so striking a part, is very beautiful, and throughout the entire work Mr. Chadwick's enviable gift of melody prevents him from pursuing the thorny paths of ugliness in which many modern composers are wearing themselves out,—and their audiences too. There is never an intemperate use of discords.

Other points which the auditor should notice and appreciate are the mystery of the beginning, with its suspense pictured upon the kettledrums, the beautiful love-duet, a bit of exquisite antiphonal writing, the fierce storm (a howling northeaster that New Englanders will appreciate), the homage of the temple, the processional and dance-rhythms, and the calm beauty of the return of the first thoughts at the end, as if the goddess lived eternal through storm, the calm of temples, the brief triumphs of man.

Mr. Chadwick has never descended to musical puzzle-writing and evidently has the old-fashioned idea that even a great display of modern tone-coloring ought to be made beautiful. If we compare this work with the recently-heard score of Lendvai (both works being examples of modern scoring), we can perceive points of decided superiority in the home-made production.

It was especially appropriate to give this work at the beginning of this month, for the Greeks held April sacred to this beautiful but rather inconstant goddess. If one judged of the work as a single movement it would seem of unusual length, but, if the auditor follows the scheme of several contrasted pictures linked together, one will perceive that there is brevity rather than prolixity here, although one might demand yet more of unity.

The picture caught up the Greek spirit very well, not by any use of Greek musical modes, but by loftiness of treatment, by an avoidance of extreme passion, by not making Aphrodite a Parisian goddess. In spite of the intricacy of portions of the work and of its lofty character, going beyond mere popularity, the number was greeted with prolonged applause. Five times was Mr. Chadwick obliged to rise from his seat in the audience and bow his acknowledgments.

The voyage upon Mr. Chadwick's moonlit sea led to the "Antar"-tic regions. Rimski-Korsakoff's "Antar" took us among mythological characters of quite another order from the charming Aphrodite. The work is miscalled a "symphony," for it is rather a suite, a succession of tone-pictures. It is almost a generation ago that Boston heard this work, and at that time people thought it neither "symphony" nor music. We have grown since then. We are now able to accept its dissonances without turning a hair, and to take its strange progressions as a matter of course. But we did not admire it then and we do not admire it now. Schoenberg is now training European audiences to accept three different keys at the same time as musical Art, and some day we will have a genius who will use all the 12 keys simultaneously, and then one of two things will happen; either we will invent new keys or we will go back to the old idea of keeping to some definite tonality.

Act 1, or possibly one might say "Round 1," showed us the mighty hunter, Antar, amidst the ruins of Palmyra. Among these ruins there were trombones, bassoons and clarinettes, and there was also a charming flute that was chased around by base contra-basses and violoncellos. This was the fairy Ghul-Nazar, and she succeeded in eluding her pursuers through the intervention of Antar.

This flute melody was very well played and was intrinsically beautiful, and it had the advantage of being really Oriental, which many of the Eastern pictures of the great composers are not.

As Antar has saved the fairy, she rewards him by falling in love with him and also by giving him three "fruitions of life," which now follow in the remaining sections of the piece. The second round is therefore "revenge." Antar takes his revenge chiefly out of the teachers of harmony. A kettle-drummer, a cymbalist, a depraved and shrieking piccolo, and a gongist, unite in suggesting that part of the revenge is obtained by dynamite. Whoever the enemy may have been it is quite certain that he was knocked out in this round.

The next movement is "power," and it is evident that the Russian idea of power is military. But here there was a charming contrast by the introduction of an Eastern dance, which intimated that the ballet also has some power in Russia.

Then came "Love," and an English Horn wooed a flute. They were rather gloomy about it, but nevertheless the yearning passages made a good contrast to the dissonances that had gone before. In spite of the freedom of treatment and of form we found "Antar" interesting, if not very beautiful. Even savagery, if not affected, has a charm of its own.

The finale is the best movement. The combination of the fairy theme and an Oriental dance is made with consummate skill and is both interesting and musical. The Antar theme is also impressively used in this movement. The whole work has a new flavor and the modern concertgoer craves new flavors—and pungent ones. Therefore, even if the power of a Wagnerian "Liebestod" is not reached, he watches Antar being kissed to death with keen interest. The real Oriental flavor of the work should be noticed, since there is very much pseudo-Orientalism in the music, even of such great masters as Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, etc.

There were more fairies (was Dr. Muck giving a special mythological concert?) in the "Oberon" overture, and Oberon's magic horn was sounded to good effect in summoning them. Weber's music always has more horns than a dilemma and its sharp contrasts and theatrical flavor cause it to wear well even with veteran auditors, and we must remember that there is a young generation growing up to whom these works are new, and who must be given opportunities to hear them.

The most conservative number of the programme was the Volkmann Serenade, which was crystal clear and beautifully symmetrical. In this the string orchestra again proved its right to be considered the best in the world. Good balance of tone, clear phrasing, perfection of ensemble were there, and added to these was the obbligato work of the violoncello, nobly played by Heinrich Warnke, who was applauded vociferously, and bowed his acknowledgments.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 5, 1913

PERFORMWORK BY CHADWICK

Symphony Plays "Aphrodite" for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

George W. Chadwick's symphonic fantasia, "Aphrodite," was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphony No. 2, "Antar," was revived at these concerts after a lapse of 15 years. The other pieces were Volkmann's Serenade No. 3, in D minor, wherein Mr. Warnke took the solo 'cello part, and the overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Chadwick's imagination was aroused by the sight of the head of Aphrodite, which is now in the Boston Art Museum, and which was given the museum by Francis Bartlett, whose possession it had become after its discovery on the island of Cnidos, in the Grecian archipelago.

Mr. Chadwick's instrumentation is rich, brilliant, sensuous. It is thus, for a good half of the work, the appropriate dress of the musical thought. The pages comprising the introduction and the three divisions which follow, stand among the most vital music which Mr. Chadwick has produced of late years; music which speaks of the supreme loveliness of the goddess whom all men adore, of battle, conquest, glorification. Mr. Chadwick is here a modern contemplating, not an abstract classic ideal, but a primal wonder that has stirred men to dreams and battles since the world was young. The themes are suggestive. They are fortunately treated. Would that the work ended here!

There appears a new theme, in the manner of a dance. And this is incongruous and inappropriate to what has preceded. It offers neither contrast or continuity of thought. It is unconvincing, as is the major part of the music which follows.

"Symphonic tableaux," these sections might be called, but they are symphonic, principally on account of the orchestral manner. They are organic in themselves, but they do not hang together or grow out of each other. There is excessive striving in the composition. There are trumpet calls as to battle, with a rythm of the bass drum, which are all too like the trumpet calls and the drums that usher in the battle scene in Strauss' "Heldenleben." The dissonance of this passage is dissonance for dissonance's sake. For such there is no room, in all the vast temple of art. There is a reiterated progression that reminds one pleasantly of the music of Debussy. There is a sonorous apotheosis.

It should be said, that after the close of the performance, yesterday afternoon the composer was called to his feet fully half a dozen times by the applause which persisted for several minutes.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" is a remarkable piece.

Eastern philosophy, eastern music; back of it the immensity of the desert and the sun which for thousands of years has tormented the dry sands and the burning blood of mankind. This music should quickly be heard again. With certain shortcomings, it has a marvellous aroma.

All of the Oriental music of Rimsky-Korsakoff lacks structure and continuity of development. But perhaps this is an essential quality of such composition. Certainly no one imbued with the spirit of Oriental monody would like to see these sad and wonderful songs bound and handcuffed with German counterpoint.

There was moderate applause for the piece by the composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. There was also cordial applause for Mr. Warnke's playing of the 'cello solo in the Serenade of Volkmann.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 5, 1913

SYMPHONY MAN'S WIFE MAY RETURN

Mimart Expects Reconciliation and Withdrawal of Divorce

PAUL MIMART,
Clarinetist of Symphony Orchestra, whose wife may drop suit for divorce.

A reconciliation between Paul Mimart, clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Mrs. Emma C. Mimart, who filed suit for a divorce, may soon be affected, and the suit withdrawn before a hearing in court, according to the statement of the husband last night.

Since Mrs. Mimart left her home on Babcock street, Brookline, more than a week ago, negotiations have been pending, it is understood, between husband and wife, indirectly, and it is looked to be a matter of a very short time when the present marital misunderstanding of the two may be concluded.

NEGOTIATIONS UNDER WAY

"I look for a settlement of this misunderstanding in a very short time," said Mr. Mimart, last night to a Post reporter. "While I do not know exactly where my wife is at the present time, I have been given every assurance to expect that she will return soon to her former home. I do not expect that the case will be tried in court, for the matter will be settled before then; in fact, negotiations were already under way for a settlement before the publication of the case in the papers.

"The publicity has broken me up terribly. There is not much to it, and the matter may be settled now very shortly."

While Mrs. Mimart left no address when she left her home, nor since communicated with her former neighbors, friends believe that she is at present in New York city, with relatives on Madison avenue.

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

13

Intended for ....

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

I n STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
APR. 1913
Da

Esta 1884

REPORT ON BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dates For Next Year Announced at Meeting of Women's Auxiliary Board.

The annual meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board of Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day in the art room, Academy of Music, at 11:15 o'clock. In the absence of Mrs. Camden C. Dike, the president, Mrs. George Notman, presided.

Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, the secretary, reported on the concerts of the season just past. She said the attendance has been larger than in any other year in the history of the concerts. Not a single seat remained unsold for any of the concerts and at three of them many paid admission to the available standing room. The recepits were $12,727.57, or equal to the capacity of the opera house. Only about 5 per cent. of those who had subscribed the previous year failed to renew their subscription, and a good many of the applicants for season tickets were unable to purchase them except they took seats in the upper boxes.

The report spoke of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the highest terms, mentioning especially the confidence which the orchestra feels in him as one reason for the great success of the concerts. His present contract is for five years, of which one has come to an end. Concerts next season will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20.

Attention was particularly called to the last date, and to the fact that, next season, Good Friday will fall upon April 12, or three weeks after the last concert. It was unavoidable this year that the concert should fall upon Good Friday. The soloists so far engaged for next season are two pianists and a violinist, Paderewski, Kreisler and Mme. Teresa Carreno.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date ....

E 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Appearance of the Season by the Boston Orchestra.

After an interval of nearly two months the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again last night in Infantry Hall to give the final concert in the present season's series. Conductor Muck, after a long absence, was present to wield the leader's baton, and both he and his players received a hearty welcome. A programme of an entertaining variety was offered, in which the superb singing of Miss Julia Culp, soprano, formed one of the most attractive features. There was a large and cordially disposed audience, as indeed has been the case at every concert given by the orchestra this season. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony in C-major, "Jupiter" .... Mozart
  I. Allegro vivace.
  II. Andante cantabile.
  III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
  IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Songs with orchestra .... Schubert
  "Raste, Krieger."
  "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
"A Siegfried Idyl" .... Wagner
Songs with orchestra:
"Traume" .... Wagner
"Freudvoll und Leidvoll" .... Beethoven
"Die Trommel geruhret" .... Beethoven
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"), Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe) .... Dukas

Mozart wrote a number of symphonies, of which practically only three, including the one played last night, have survived until the present day. The reason for their neglect may be found in the fact that modern taste prefers the richer—or at least the heavier—orchestration of the modern school. Yet the results which this gifted child of the muses managed to achieve with his thin orchestra are no less remarkable than they certainly are beautiful and inspiring. In this so-called "Jupiter" symphony Mozart [illegible] but one flute, two oboes, two [illegible], two horns, two trumpets and [illegible], in addition to the strings, yet there is no suggestion of poverty anywhere in the score. Of how many modern symphonies can as much be truly said? The playing of the "Jupiter" was performed with loving care and delicacy.

The "Siegfried Idyl," a familiar and always popular number, received an equally worthy rendition. In strong contrast to these pieces came, at the close of the programme, the orchestral scherzo by the French composer, Paul Dukas, entitled "The Sorcerer's Ap-

The voyage upon Mr. Chadwick's moonlit sea led to the "Antar"-tic regions. Rimski-Korsakoff's "Antar" took us among mythological characters of quite another order from the charming Aphrodite. The work is miscalled a "symphony," for it is rather a suite, a succession of tone-pictures. It is almost a generation ago that Boston heard this work, and at that time people thought it neither "symphony" nor music. We have grown since then. We are now able to accept its dissonances without turning a hair, and to take its strange progressions as a matter of course. But we did not admire it then and we do not admire it now. Schoenberg is now training European audiences to accept three different keys at the same time as musical Art, and some day we will have a genius who will use all the 12 keys simultaneously, and then one of two things will happen; either we will invent new keys or we will go back to the old idea of keeping to some definite tonality.

Act 1, or possibly one might say "Round 1," showed us the mighty hunter, Antar, amidst the ruins of Palmyra. Among these ruins there were trombones, bassoons and clarinettes, and there was also a charming flute that was chased around by base contra-basses and violoncellos. This was the fairy Ghul-Nazar, and she succeeded in eluding her pursuers through the intervention of Antar.

This flute melody was very well played and was intrinsically beautiful, and it had the advantage of being really Oriental, which many of the Eastern pictures of the great composers are not.

As Antar has saved the fairy, she rewards him by falling in love with him and also by giving him three "fruitions of life," which now follow in the remaining sections of the piece. The second round is therefore "revenge." Antar takes his revenge chiefly out of the teachers of harmony. A kettle-drummer, a cymbalist, a depraved and shrieking piccolo, and a gongist, unite in suggesting that part of the revenge is obtained by dynamite. Whoever the enemy may have been it is quite certain that he was knocked out in this round.

The next movement is "power," and it is evident that the Russian idea of power is military. But here there was a charming contrast by the introduction of an Eastern dance, which intimated that the ballet also has some power in Russia.

Then came "Love," and an English Horn wooed a flute. They were rather gloomy about it, but nevertheless the yearning passages made a good contrast to the dissonances that had gone before. In spite of the freedom of treatment and of form we found "Antar" interesting, if not very beautiful. Even savagery, if not affected, has a charm of its own.

The finale is the best movement. The combination of the fairy theme and an Oriental dance is made with consummate skill and is both interesting and musical. The Antar theme is also impressively used in this movement. The whole work has a new flavor and the modern concert-goer craves new flavors—and pungent ones. Therefore, even if the power of a Wagnerian "Liebestod" is not reached, he watches Antar being kissed to death with keen interest. The real Oriental flavor of the work should be noticed, since there is very much pseudo-Orientalism in the music, even of such great masters as Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, etc.

There were more fairies (was Dr. Muck giving a special mythological concert?) in the "Oberon" overture, and Oberon's magic horn was sounded to good effect in summoning them. Weber's music always has more horns than a dilemma and its sharp contrasts and theatrical flavor cause it to wear well even with veteran auditors, and we must remember that there is a young generation growing up to whom these works are new, and who must be given opportunities to hear them.

The most conservative number of the programme was the Volkmann Serenade, which was crystal clear and beautifully symmetrical. In this the string orchestra again proved its right to be considered the best in the world. Good balance of tone, clear phrasing, perfection of ensemble were there, and added to these was the obbligato work of the violoncello, nobly played by Heinrich Warnke, who was applauded vociferously, and bowed his acknowledgments.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 5, 1913

PERFORMWORK BY CHADWICK

Symphony Plays "Aphrodite" for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

George W. Chadwick's symphonic fantasia, "Aphrodite," was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphony No. 2, "Antar," was revived at these concerts after a lapse of 15 years. The other pieces were Volkmann's Serenade No. 3, in D minor, wherein Mr. Warnke took the solo 'cello part, and the overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Chadwick's imagination was aroused by the sight of the head of Aphrodite, which is now in the Boston Art Museum, and which was given the museum by Francis Bartlett, whose possession it had become after its discovery on the island of Cnidos, in the Grecian archipelago.

Mr. Chadwick's instrumentation is rich, brilliant, sensuous. It is thus, for a good half of the work, the appropriate dress of the musical thought. The pages comprising the introduction and the three divisions which follow, stand among the most vital music which Mr. Chadwick has produced of late years; music which speaks of the supreme loveliness of the goddess whom all men adore, of battle, conquest, glorification. Mr. Chadwick is here a modern contemplating, not an abstract classic ideal, but a primal wonder that has stirred men to dreams and battles since the world was young. The themes are suggestive. They are fortunately treated. Would that the work ended here!

There appears a new theme, in the manner of a dance. And this is incongruous and inappropriate to what has preceded. It offers neither contrast or continuity of thought. It is unconvincing, as is the major part of the music which follows.

"Symphonic tableaux," these sections might be called, but they are symphonic, principally on account of the orchestral manner. They are organ in themselves, but they do not hang together or grow out of each other. There is excessive striving in the composition. There are trumpet calls as to battle, with a rythm of the bass drum, which are all too like the trumpet calls and the drums that usher in he battle scene in Strauss' "Heldenleen." The dissonance of this passage s dissonance for dissonance's sake. For uch there is no room, in all the vast emple of art. There is a reiterated rogression that reminds one pleasantly f the music of Debussy. There is a onorous apotheosis.

It should be said, that after the close f the performance, yesterday afteroon the composer was called to his et fully half a dozen times by the pplause which persisted for several inutes.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" is a remarkable piece.

Eastern philosophy, eastern music back of it the immensity of the desert and the sun which for thousands o years has tormented the dry sand and the burning blood of mankind This music should quickly be heard again. With certain shortcomings, i has a marvellous aroma.

All of the Oriental music of Rimsky Korsakoff lacks structure and continuity of development. But perhaps thi is an essential quality of such compo sition. Certainly no one imbued wit the spirit of Oriental monody woul like to see these sad and wonderfu songs bound and handcuffed with Ger man counterpoint.

There was moderate applause for th piece by the composer, Rimsky-Ko sakoff. There was also cordial applau for Mr. Warnke's playing of the 'cel solo in the Serenade of Volkmann.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 5, 1913

SYMPHONY MAN'S WIFE MAY RETURN

Mimart Expects Reconciliation and Withdrawal of Divorce

PAUL MIMART,
Clarinetist of Symphony Orchestra, whose wife may drop suit for divorce.

A reconciliation between Paul Mimart, clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Mrs. Emma C. Mimart, who filed suit for a divorce, may soon be affected, and the suit withdrawn before a hearing in court, according to the statement of the husband last night.

Since Mrs. Mimart left her home on Babcock street, Brookline, more than a week ago, negotiations have been pending, it is understood, between husband and wife, indirectly, and it is looked to be a matter of a very short time when the present marital misunderstanding of the two may be concluded.

NEGOTIATIONS UNDER WAY

"I look for a settlement of this misunderstanding in a very short time," said Mr. Mimart, last night to a Post reporter. "While I do not know exactly where my wife is at the present time, I have been given every assurance to expect that she will return soon to her former home. I do not expect that the case will be tried in court, for the matter will be settled before then; in fact, negotiations were already under way for a settlement before the publication of the case in the papers.

"The publicity has broken me up terribly. There is not much to it, and the matter may be settled now very shortly."

While Mrs. Mimart left no address when she left her home, nor since communicated with her former neighbors, friends believe that she is at present in New York city, with relatives on Madison avenue.

13

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
APR 1913
Da

Esta 1884

REPORT ON BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dates For Next Year Announced at Meeting of Women's Auxiliary Board.

The annual meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board of Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day in the art room, Academy of Music, at 11:15 o'clock. In the absence of Mrs. Camden C. Dike, the president, Mrs. George Notman, presided.

Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, the secretary, reported on the concerts of the season just past. She said the attendance has been larger than in any other year in the history of the concerts. Not a single seat remained unsold for any of the concerts and at three of them many paid admission to the available standing room. The receipts were $12,727.57, or equal to the capacity of the opera house. Only about 5 per cent. of those who had subscribed the previous year failed to renew their subscription, and a good many of the applicants for season tickets were unable to purchase them except they took seats in the upper boxes.

The report spoke of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the highest terms, mentioning especially the confidence which the orchestra feels in him as one reason for the great success of the concerts. His present contract is for five years, of which one has come to an end. Concerts next season will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20.

Attention was particularly called to the last date, and to the fact that, next season, Good Friday will fall upon April 12, or three weeks after the last concert. It was unavoidable this year that the concert should fall upon Good Friday. The soloists so far engaged for next season are two pianists and a violinist, Paderewski, Kreisler and Mme. Teresa Carreno.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

E 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Appearance of the Season by the Boston Orchestra.

After an interval of nearly two months the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again last night in Infantry Hall to give the final concert in the present season's series. Conductor Muck, after a long absence, was present to wield the leader's baton, and both he and his players received a hearty welcome. A programme of an entertaining variety was offered, in which the superb singing of Miss Julia Culp, soprano, formed one of the most attractive features. There was a large and cordially disposed audience, as indeed has been the case at every concert given by the orchestra this season. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony in C-major, "Jupiter".......Mozart
  I. Allegro vivace.
  II. Andante cantabile.
  III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
  IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Songs with orchestra....................Schubert
  "Raste, Krieger."
  "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd."
  "Ave Maria."
"A Siegfried Idyl"....................Wagner
Songs with orchestra:
"Traume"................................Wagner
"Freudvoll und Leidvoll"..............Beethoven
"Die Trommel geruhret"...............Beethoven
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"), Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)..........................Dukas

Mozart wrote a number of symphonies, of which practically only three, including the one played last night, have survived until the present day. The reason for their neglect may be found in the fact that modern taste prefers the richer—or at least the heavier—orchestration of the modern school. Yet the results which this gifted child of the muses managed to achieve with his thin orchestra are no less remarkable than they certainly are beautiful and inspiring. In this so-called "Jupiter" symphony Mozart employed but one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets and kettle-drums, in addition to the strings, yet there is no suggestion of poverty anywhere in the score. Of how many modern symphonies can as much be truly said? The playing of the "Jupiter" was performed with loving care and delicacy.

The "Siegfried Idyl," a familiar and always popular number, received an equally worthy rendition. In strong contrast to these pieces came, at the close of the programme, the orchestral scherzo by the French composer, Paul Dukas, entitled "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This is a highly imaginative

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date APR 6 - 1913

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is receiving at its Boston office renewals of subscriptions for the two series of concerts which it will give in New York next winter. Notices of renewal with renewal cards have been sent to all subscribers, and at the present rate of reply there will be comparatively few seats left untaken on June 1. The seats for which the subscription has not been renewed by that date will be allotted to new applicants, of whom there is a very large list. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons in November, December, January, February and March. The soloists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date APR 6 - 1913

Esta

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is receiving at its Boston office renewals of subscriptions for the two series of concerts which it will give in New York next winter. Notices of renewal with renewal cards have been sent to all subscribers and at the present rate of reply there will be comparatively few seats left untaken on June 1. The seats for which the subscription has not been renewed by that date will be allotted to new applicants, of whom there is a very large list. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoons in November, December, January, February and March. The soloists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski.

APRIL 9, 1913.
NEW BEDFORD EVENING STANDARD,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

LOUISA MAY HOPKINS, PIANIST, MAKES EXCELLENT IMPRESSION.

Brahms's Second Symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Chabrier's "Espana" Given Brilliant Renditions by the Orchestra.

Brahms the austere, the complex, the profound thinker; Liszt the cosmopolitan, represented by a waltz in which a wild and voluptuous diabolism predominates; Chabrier, in his gayest and most playful mood; and Scandinavian Sinding, brilliant, elegant, dramatic—such is the range of the program rendered at the New Bedford theatre last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An added interest to this, the last concert of the season of 1912-13, was lent by the appearance as soloist of Miss Louisa May Hopkins. A former resident of New Bedford, a one time pupil of the late Josiah Eaton, Miss Hopkins has won her way to an enviable position among piano soloists. Although it is many years since she has made her home here, she has many friends and admirers who still regard her as a New Bedford woman, and to whom her capable rendition of the Sinding concerto last evening was on that account doubly gratifying.

In presenting again the Brahms symphony in D major, Dr. Muck rendered a valuable service to the progress of musical art in New Bedford. In these days of ultra-modernistic tendencies in music, an occasional good sound dose of either Bach, Beethoven or Brahms acts as a corrective, and tones up our musical system, which is apt to become deranged by the highly flavored condiments that are too often served up to us. Like a good physician, Dr. Muck is looking after our musical health.

So much has been said and written about Brahms that it seems almost superfluous for the reviewer of a concert which contains a work of his to try to add to or detract from his reputation. That has been fixed almost beyond dispute. Yet there are still those who can never forget the saying of Wagner, which has gone the rounds of the musical world, that Brahms was afraid of an effect. It must be admitted that Wagner had some cause for saying what he did. It was a little difficult for Wagner to see the good in Brahms, especially when his ancient foe and pet aversion, Dr. Eduard Hanslick, was the leader of the "Brahmsiana" movement. In spite of the criticisms which have been levelled against Brahms from all sides, that he was prone sometimes to elaborate a theme to the extent that it became pure mathematical music with little or no inspiration, that his orchestrations are sometimes muddy and thick, it must be admitted that he was the legitimate successor of both Bach and Beethoven as Hans von Bulow claimed.

Bach was a writer of polyphony, and he brought the art of balancing many instrumental voices to perfection. Beethoven, imbued with many new ideas, had a tendency to go in the opposite direction, to bring into prominence one theme or melody,

Brahms, coming years after, combined in his symphonic works the polyphony of Bach and the monophonic ideas of Beethoven. He followed Beethoven in choosing themes which lent themselves readily to symphonic treatment, but in his treatment he exhibited all the skill of Bach, a master of counterpoint. While the principal themes stand out prominently in his compositions, the inner voices are never lost sight of, or sunk into significance, as was often the case with Beethoven. This one fact just mentioned has caused more trouble than anything else to the average concert atendant who wonders why he fails to appreciate Brahms, and that his works seem dry and uninteresting. It is their very complexity that puzzles. Yet it is so in many other of the arts. Many art works impress one at first glance, but further inspections shows that their beauty, after all, is only a surface beauty. The picture is striking, but it lacks depth. There are other works whose beauty does not lie upon the surface. Only patient research and diligent study reveals it. He who would enjoy the wealth of the Brahms scores must perforce dig deep. The Brahms symphonies have a beauty which it might be said is peculiarly their own. There the student will find melodic beauty. So will he find the same beauty in the works of many other composers. But nowhere will he find so great a beauty of contour as in the works of Brahms. His beauty is the beauty that characterized Greek art, the beauty of form, the chasteness of purpose, the perfection of proportion. It is not exotic beauty. It is beauty of design. Exquisite finish characterizes almost everything that Brahms did. But it is not by thoroughness alone that Brahms convinces. Beyond that is the dignity of his conceptions. As Tausig, said of Liszt, Brahms dwelt upon a solitary height. There he saw visions such as are not revealed to the ordinary man. He caught their meaning, and with inspired pen he put them into lasting form. Fortunate is he who can read and understand. The enthusiasm that Brahms engenders is not the enthusiasm of the superficial, but rather the enthusiasm of the student—the thinker. If you do not appreciate Brahms, look to yourself. The fault is not with him.

The performance of the symphony was up to the standard set by the Boston orchestra. Dr. Muck is of the "Brahmsiana," so far as his known catholicity of taste will permit. He is too broad-minded to restrict his admiration to any one school, but Brahms holds an enduring place in his affections. His Brahms readings create in the listener the keenest artistic and intellectual pleasure. His relation with Brahms is not merely that of adoration, but of intimate sympathy and understanding. In the process of filtration through his finely ordered imagination. Brahms's music loses none of its potency. Dr. Muck simply furnishes the right perspective. The view is not magnified nor distorted; it is only made clear.

Of Miss Hopkins' playing of the Sinding concerto much must be set down in praise. She has a facile technique, supple wrists and great digital dexterity. Her interpretative powers are of no mean order as was shown by her playing of the second movement of the concerto. Her passage work was cleanly executed throughout, and the long cadenza just before the coda of the first movement was played in true bravura style. In the performance of the concerto there was some uneasiness and uncertainty, due not only to the lack of familiarity of the conductor and soloist with each other, but to a lack of familiarity on the part of Dr. Muck and his men with the orchestral accompaniment. This was plainly evident in the uncertainty of attack on the part of the orchestra in the tuttis, and was emphasized by the ragged playing of several of the instrumental choirs. The orchestral accompaniment to the concerto is very tricky, and a finished performance cannot be gotten up at a moment's notice, even with so able a body of musicians as compose the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concerto as a whole gave much enjoyment, for it is a well-written and splendidly conceived work, in which Sinding made most effective use of the "idee fixe" first introduced into concerted music by Berlioz, and afterwards developed with so much skill by both Liszt and Wagner. It is ful of nobility, and the two themes which he selected are pregnant with musical thought, and lend themselves readily to a great variety of treatment.

Miss Hopkins has been associated as soloist with a number of orchestras, chief among them the Boston symphony and the Damrosch symphony. After having been a pupil here with Mr. Eaton, she studied for several years with Carl Baermann. Becoming interested in the use of weight in piano technic, she studied with Kate Chittenden in New York. Her interest in the weight idea led her to read R. M. Breithaupt's works on the "Natural Piano Technic," and "Weight playing," and eventually to her becoming a pupil of Breithaupt in Germany in the summers of 1909, 1910 and 1911.

The other two numbers, "The Mephisto Waltz," as it is familiarly known, of Liszt, and the brilliant rhapsody, "Espana" of Chabrier, were played with all the virtuosity for which the Boston orchestra is famous the world over. These two pieces are both program music of the most pronounced type. They do bring to the mind of the listener the scenes which they attempt to depict. By that token they become program music in the true sense of the word, music that fires the fancy, stimulates the imagination, and accurately reflects the atmosphere which it is intended they shall reflect. The "Mephisto Waltz" is diablerie set to music with all the skill of a master of orchestration. There is in it less of the empty pomposity which was a serious fault of Liszt's in many of his symphonic poems. It is closely knit and every

---

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 12, 1913

APPLAUSE FOR DR. MUCK'S MEN

Unusual Enthusiasm at Symphony Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The only piece that was novel, on the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns," after Kaulbach's picture, unless there are included two of the Schubert songs sung by Mme. Culp, the soloist, "Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd." The orchestral music was well known and ultra-respectable; Haydn's Surprise symphony; Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute"; the overture to Goethe's Egmont; and Mme. Culp had sung two of Beethoven's settings of lines from that work, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," "Die trommel geruhet."

But the performances were astonishing in their brilliancy and power. After the old "Surprise" symphony Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled. After the Liszt poem there was overwhelming enthusiasm, acknowledged repeatedly by leader and players. This reception was as warm as that accorded to the distinguished soloist, or even warmer, and no higher tribute to the sheer magnificence of the orchestra and its performances would be possible.

Some modern conductors, sympathetic though they may be to well understood traditions, forget one thing when they conduct Haydn; that he had good red blood in his veins. We do not here venture to discuss with "authorities" questions of tempo, dynamics, etc. Music and the interpretation of music is not to be measured by a yardstick. The fact was, that Dr. Muck, who may have "touched up" places in the symphony, giving them a warmth of color, a swiftness of pace, a strenuousness of style not intended in such a degree, perhaps by the composer, certainly imparted to a present-day audience the spirit of old Haydn, with his vigor, his wit, his indomitable optimism, his remarkable feeling for form, his lovely melodic and harmonic beauty in the slow movement. The audience enjoyed it tremendously.

The Mozart overture was a similar experience. The opening has not been in years so impressive. It is romantic music from the classic era. It is stirring, dramatic music as well, and it stood revealed in a new and magnificent light. Turning from this 18th century music, Dr. Muck brought salvos from his audience with his reading of the Liszt symphony poem. A pity that, in the case of Liszt, the virtuoso made impossible the highest success for the composer. There is scarcely an orchestral score of Liszt which does not contain a startling idea of genius. In the work heard yesterday the opening is singularly suggestive of ghostly conflict, of hosts rising from the earth and battling in the air. There is no escape from it. The flaming imagination of the composer has been fired by the sight of a canvass and he has instantaneously created a musical image of his imaginings. The intoning of the Crux fidelis, after the approved Lisztian manner, is also impressive, and in the middle section there is some development of material already stated which is musically the solidest portion of the work. There is the imposing entrance of the organ, and the jubilant conclusion. If only Liszt could abjure the suggestion of piano figures and of empty unsymphonic passages of reiteration. But the work, with its amazing splendor, stirred an audience yesterday to frantic applause.

Mme. Culp's voice has inherently the capacity for emotional expression. Also, it is an educated voice, a voice which is in the first place the voice of a woman of distinction and of the most acute sensibilities.

Memorable was Mme. Culp's performance of Wagner's "sketch" apropos of "Tristan," "Traume." The air could hardly be imagined, now, other than it was sung yesterday by her. Sensuousness, glooming passion, and yet, withal, the high poetry, the pulse-beat of the universe, that underlies each page of the world's greatest music drama. Infinite yearning, and ravishing nuance, and a wonderful orchestral accompaniment. Justly, indeed, was Mme. Culp applauded. Justly were Dr. Muck and his men recalled and recalled.

JOURNAL APRIL 12.

Mme. Culp Soloist at the Symphony Concert

This week's Symphony program is one of the choicest of the season, and yesterday's performance was also one of the best Dr. Muck has ever conducted here. The program will be repeated tonight. It begins with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony—and yesterday that big thump of the drum in the andante caused more than one unprepared listener to jump—and then follow the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," a group of Schubert songs, sung by Julia Culp; Liszt's tone poem, "The Battle of the Huns;" three more songs by Mme. Culp, and finally, "Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was a truly brilliant performance yesterday from start to finish. Mme. Culp, Dr. Muck and the orchestra were all enthusiastically applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 12

NOTABLE CONCERT.

Miss Culp Ideal Singer of Lieder.

Dr Muck and Orchestra Surpass Themselves.

The 21st Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. Miss Julia Culp was the soloist.

Haydn..................."Surprise" Symphony
Mozart........Overture to "The Magic Flute"
Schubert. Songs with orchestra. a, Raste, Krieger; b, Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd; c, Ave Maria.
Liszt.................The Battle of the Huns
Songs with orchestra, Wagner, Traeume; Beethoven, Freudvoll und Leidvoll, Die Trommel geruehret.
Beethoven..................Overture to Egmont

It was a concert by three virtuosi of distinction—Dr Muck, Miss Culp and the orchestra. It was the first time that this combination of artistic principles had taken place, and it proved how blessed it is to dwell in this region where all things work together for good.

Miss Culp was well disposed and had chosen her songs wisely. Some singers about to be heard with the orchestra for the first time might have felt it incumbent upon them to have selected an aria. It is not improbable that Miss Culp might have found an aria which she could have sung well. But she made her place here as a singer of lieder, and she came yesterday to her first appearance here at these concerts, with no assumption of the airs of a prima donna.

Each of the six songs was well suited to her. Indeed it is difficult to name another who could recreate them with more of the beauty of a rare vocal art, or with the sincerity of sweet womanhood. Wagner's "Traeume," as Miss Culp sang it and the orchestra played it, was a benediction and a vision into the things that are not, which comes rarely to mortals. Fortunate are those who will hear it tonight.

Dr Muck's art, his range of imagination, his variety of touch, has not been so clearly summed up in any one concert this season. There was the chastened, clarified, luminous music of Haydn and Mozart. There was the epic of Beethoven, dramatist and tragic poet. There were the sympathetically subordinated accompaniments, yet ever with individuality, and there was Liszt's spectacular, earsmiting picture of the battle in the clouds between the spirits of slain Goths and Christians; music not without allegorical relation to another more realistic battle waged upon the earth by the Philistines and the Romanticists of more than 60 years ago.

Here are divergent thoughts and feelings, all springing from the human heart and mind, but in different epochs of time, in different stages of development of artistic sensibility and expression. They each had their due manner and character yesterday—Haydn's cheery gayety, pretty sentiment, his gallantry and his humor; Mozart's clarity as the crystal brook, with an expanding emotional range; Beethoven, uttering grave and profoundly beautiful thoughts; Liszt, unchaining the brass and sending his imagination upon rhetorical flights.

In each of them there was an individuality, an identity. It surrounded the conductor as an invisible presence. It appeared to emanate from him and envelop the orchestra, yet to the audience his profile remained the same. His physical manifestations have little of variation. There is the same repose, the same cool mastery of detail, the same flaming and imperious but instant summons to a sharp contrast, the same insistence upon subtle and eloquent accentuation and the same musing aloofness which approaches actual scorn of the display and acrobatic industry common to others. And here is the striking and curious part of it all.

To the analyst, Dr Muck's interpretations, for example, of the Haydn symphony may appear inferior, introspective and colculated, even as the sculptor has chiseled his figure out of marble; it may appear carefully considered, balanced and dovetailed, until to minute perfection organic symmetry has been added and there is the proportion of a noble piece of architecture. There is enveloping all of this the guise of a persuasive and enkindling spontaneity.

This or that effect might have been born of the moment. It would never have been born by accident notwithstanding. It is as though this man who might be a high priest of the mystic arts stood before his players and as they proceeded denoted by some secret code not visible to those who see the eloquence of his back, but not of his face, the intellectual cast or particular emotional flavor which he at that moment had fancied, had seen in his mind's eye and had reproduced. There is a type of so-called spontaneity that shuts its eyes and trusts alone to feeling. Not so with Dr Muck.

The "Surprise" symphony yesterday was a delightful study of music as written for the entertainment and diversion of men, sparkling, exuberant, refreshing, and playful in the stealthy hush that preceded the alarming drum beat and crashing chord. Haydn was said to have denied his intention to awaken those who napped at his concerts. Strange that later composers in far greater need of the device never thought to use it.

Next week Mahler's 5th Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" will be played.

[200]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date .... APR 6 - 1913

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is receiving at its Boston office renewals of subscriptions for the two series of concerts which it will give in New York next winter. Notices of renewal with renewal cards have been sent to all subscribers, and at the present rate of reply there will be comparatively few seats left untaken on June 1. The seats for which the subscription has not been renewed by that date will be allotted to new applicants, of whom there is a very large list. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons in November, December, January, February and March. The soloists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date ....

Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is receiving at its Boston office renewals of subscriptions for the two series of concerts which it will give in New York next winter- Notices of renewal with renewal cards have been sent to all subscribers and at the present rate of reply there will be comparatively few seats left untaken on June 1. The seats for which the subscription has not been renewed by that date will be allotted to new applicants, of whom there is a very large list. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoons in November, December, January, February and March. The soloists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski.

APRIL 9, 1913.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING STANDARD,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

LOUISA MAY HOPKINS, PIANIST, MAKES EXCELLENT IMPRESSION.

Brahms's Second Symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Chabrier's "Espana" Given Brilliant Renditions by the Orchestra.

Brahms the austere, the complex, the profound thinker; Liszt the cosmopolitan, represented by a waltz in which a wild and voluptuous diabolism predominates; Chabrier, in his gayest and most playful mood; and Scandinavian Sinding, brilliant, elegant, dramatic—such is the range of the program rendered at the New Bedford theatre last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An added interest to this, the last concert of the season of 1912-13, was lent by the appearance as soloist of Miss Louisa May Hopkins. A former resident of New Bedford, a one time pupil of the late Josiah Eaton, Miss Hopkins has won her way to an enviable position among piano soloists. Although it is many years since she has made her home here, she has many friends and admirers who still regard her as a New Bedford woman, and to whom her capable rendition of the Sinding concerto last evening was on that account doubly gratifying.

In presenting again the Brahms symphony in D major, Dr. Muck rendered a valuable service to the progress of musical art in New Bedford. In these days of ultra-modernistic tendencies in music, an occasional good sound dose of either Bach, Beethoven or Brahms acts as a corrective, and tones up our musical system, which is apt to become deranged by the highly flavored condiments that are too often served up to us. Like a good physician, Dr. Muck is looking after our musical health.

So much has been said and written about Brahms that it seems almost superfluous for the reviewer of a concert which contains a work of his to try to add to or detract from his reputation. That has been fixed almost beyond dispute. Yet there are still those who can never forget the saying of Wagner, which has gone the rounds of the musical world, that Brahms was afraid of an effect. It must be admitted that Wagner had some cause for saying what he did. It was a little difficult for Wagner to see the good in Brahms, especially when his ancient foe and pet aversion, Dr. Eduard Hanslick, was the leader of the "Brahmsiana" movement. In spite of the criticisms which have been levelled against Brahms from all sides, that he was prone sometimes to elaborate a theme to the extent that it became pure mathematical music with little or no inspiration, that his orchestrations are sometimes muddy and thick, it must be admitted that he was the legitimate successor of both Bach and Beethoven as Hans von Bulow claimed.

Bach was a writer of polyphony, and he brought the art of balancing many instrumental voices to perfection. Beethoven, imbued with many new ideas, had a tendency to go in the opposite direction, to bring into prominence one theme or melody, and to elaborate that at th

Brahms, coming years after, combined in his symphonic works the polyphony of Bach and the monophonic ideas of Beethoven. He followed Beethoven in choosing themes which lent themselves readily to symphonic treatment, but in his treatment he exhibited all the skill of Bach, a master of counterpoint. While the principal themes stand out prominently in his compositions, the inner voices are never lost sight of, or sunk into significance, as was often the case with Beethoven. This one fact just mentioned has caused more trouble than anything else to the average concert atendant who wonders why he fails to appreciate Brahms, and that his works seem dry and uninteresting. It is their very complexity that puzzles. Yet it is so in many other of the arts. Many art works impress one at first glance, but further inspections shows that their beauty, after all, is only a surface beauty. The picture is striking, but it lacks depth. There are other works whose beauty does not lie upon the surface. Only patient research and diligent study reveals it. He who would enjoy the wealth of the Brahms scores must perforce dig deep. The Brahms symphonies have a beauty which it might be said is peculiarly their own. There the student will find melodic beauty. So will he find the same beauty in the works of many other composers. But nowhere will he find so great a beauty of contour as in the works of Brahms. His beauty is the beauty that characterized Greek art, the beauty of form, the chasteness of purpose, the perfection of proportion. It is not exotic beauty. It is beauty of design. Exquisite finish characterizes almost everything that Brahms did. But it is not by thoroughness alone that Brahms convinces. Beyond that is the dignity of his conceptions. As Tausig, said of Liszt, Brahms dwelt upon a solitary height. There he saw visions such as are not revealed to the ordinary man. He caught their meaning, and with inspired pen he put them into lasting form. Fortunate is he who can read and understand. The enthusiasm that Brahms engenders is not the enthusiasm of the superficial, but rather the enthusiasm of the student—the thinker. If you do not appreciate Brahms, look to yourself. The fault is not with him.

The performance of the symphony was up to the standard set by the Boston orchestra. Dr. Muck is of the "Brahmsiana," so far as his known catholicity of taste will permit. He is too broad-minded to restrict his admiration to any one school, but Brahms holds an enduring place in his affections. His Brahms readings create in the listener the keenest artistic and intellectual pleasure. His relation with Brahms is not merely that of adoration, but of intimate sympathy and understanding. In the process of filtration through his finely ordered imagination. Brahms's music loses none of its potency. Dr. Muck simply furnishes the right perspective. The view is not magnified nor distorted; it is only made clear.

Of Miss Hopkins' playing of the Sinding concerto much must be set down in praise. She has a facile technique, supple wrists and great digital dexterity. Her interpretative powers are of no mean order as was shown by her playing of the second movement of the concerto. Her passage work was cleanly executed throughout, and the long cadenza just before the coda of the first movement was played in true bravura style. In the performance of the concerto there was some uneasiness and uncertainty, due not only to the lack of familiarity of the conductor and soloist with each other, but to a lack of familiarity on the part of Dr. Muck and his men with the orchestral accompaniment. This was plainly evident in the uncertainty of attack on the part of the orchestra in the tuttis, and was emphasized by the ragged playing of several of the instrumental choirs. The orchestral accompaniment to the concerto is very tricky, and a finished performance cannot be gotten up at a moment's notice, even with so able a body of musicians as compose the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concerto as a whole gave much enjoyment, for it is a well-written and splendidly conceived work, in which Sinding made most effective use of the "idee fixe" first introduced into concerted music by Berlioz, and afterwards developed with so much skill by both Liszt and Wagner. It is ful of nobility ,and the two themes which he selected are pregnant with musical thought, and lend themselves readily to a great variety of treatment.

Miss Hopkins has been associated as soloist with a number of orchestras, chief among them the Boston symphony and the Damrosch symphony. After having been a pupil here with Mr. Eaton, she studied for several years with Carl Baermann. Becoming interested in the use of weight in piano technic, she studied with Kate Chittenden in New York. Her interest in the weight idea led her to read R. M. Breithaupt's works on the "Natural Piano Technic," and "Weight playing," and eventually to her becoming a pupil of Breithaupt in Germany in the summers of 1909, 1910 and 1911.

The other two numbers, "The Mephisto Waltz," as it is familiarly known, of Liszt, and the brilliant rhapsody, "Espana" of Chabrier, were played with all the virtuosity for which the Boston orchestra is famous the world over. These two pieces are both program music of the most pronounced type. They do bring to the mind of the listener the scenes which they attempt to depict. By that token they become program music in the true sense of the word, music that fires the fancy, stimulates the imagination, and accurately reflects the atmosphere which it is intended they shall reflect. The "Mephisto Waltz" is diablerie set to music with all the skill of a master of orchestration. There is in it less of the empty pomposity which was a serious fault of Liszt's in many of his symphonic poems. It is closely knit and every

---

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 12, 1913

APPLAUSE FOR DR. MUCK'S MEN

Unusual Enthusiasm at Symphony Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The only piece that was novel, on the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns," after Kaulbach's picture, unless there are included two of the Schubert songs sung by Mme. Culp, the soloist, "Raste Krieger," "Jager, ruhe von der Jagd." The orchestral music was well known and ultra-respectable; Haydn's Surprise symphony; Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute"; the overture to Goethe's Egmont; and Mme. Culp had sung two of Beethoven's settings of lines from that work, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," "Die trommel geruhet."

But the performances were astonishing in their brilliancy and power. After the old "Surprise" symphony Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled. After the Liszt poem there was overwhelming enthusiasm, acknowledged repeatedly by leader and players. This reception was as warm as that accorded to the distinguished soloist, or even warmer, and no higher tribute to the sheer magnificence of the orchestra and its performances would be possible.

Some modern conductors, sympathetic though they may be to well understood traditions, forget one thing when they conduct Haydn; that he had good red blood in his veins. We do not here venture to discuss with "authorities" questions of tempo, dynamics, etc. Music and the interpretation of music is not to be measured by a yardstick. The fact was, that Dr. Muck, who may have "touched up" places in the symphony, giving them a warmth of color, a swiftness of pace, a strenuousness of style not intended in such a degree, perhaps by the composer,, certainly imparted to a present-day audience the spirit of old Haydn, with his vigor, his wit, his indomitable optimism, his remarkable feeling for form, his lovely melodic and harmonic beauty in the slow movement. The audience enjoyed it tremendously.

The Mozart overture was a similar experience. The opening has not been in years so impressive. It is romantic music from the classic era. It is stirring, dramatic music as well, and it stood revealed in a new and magnificent light. Turning from this 18th century music, Dr. Muck brought salvos from his audience with his reading of the Liszt symphony poem. A pity that, in the case of Liszt, the virtuoso made impossible the highest success for the composer. There is scarcely an orchestral score of Liszt which does not contain a startling idea of genius. In the work heard yesterday the opening is singularly suggestive of ghostly conflict, of hosts rising from the earth, and battling in the air. There is no escape from it. The flaming imagination of the composer has been fired by the sight of a canvass and he has instantaneously created a musical image of his imaginings. The intoning of the Crux fidelis, after the approved Lisztian manner, is also impressive, and in the middle section there is some development of material already stated which is musically the solidest portion of the work. There is the imposing entrance of the organ, and the jubliant conclusion. If only Liszt could abjure the suggestion of piano figures and of empty unsymphonic passages of reiteration. But the work, with its amazing splendor, stirred an audience yesterday to frantic applause.

Mme. Culp's voice has inherently the capacity for emotional expression. Also, it is an educated voice, a voice which is in the first place the voice of a woman of distinction and of the most acute sensibilities.

Memorable was Mme. Culp's performance of Wagner's "sketch" apropos of "Tristan," "Traume." The air could hardly be imagined, now, other than it was sung yesterday by her. Sensuousness, glooming passion, and yet, withal, the high poetry, the pulse-beat of the universe, that underlies each page of the world's greatest music drama. Infinite yearning, and ravishing nuance, and a wonderful orchestral accompaniment. Justly, indeed, was Mme. Culp applauded. Justly were Dr. Muck and his men recalled and recalled.

JOURNAL APRIL 12.

Mme. Culp Soloist at the Symphony Concert

This week's Symphony program is one of the choicest of the season, and yesterday's performance was also one of the best Dr. Muck has ever conducted here. The program will be repeated tonight. It begins with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony—and yesterday that big thump of the drum in the andante caused more than one unprepared listener to jump—and then follow the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," a group of Schubert songs, sung by Julia Culp; Liszt's tone poem, "The Battle of the Huns;" three more songs by Mme. Culp, and finally, "Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was a truly brilliant performance yesterday from start to finish. Mme. Culp, Dr. Muck and the orchestra were all enthusiastically applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 12.

NOTABLE CONCERT.

Miss Culp Ideal Singer of Lieder.

Dr Muck and Orchestra Surpass Themselves.

The 21st Symphony rehearsal. Dr Muck conducted. Miss Julia Culp was the soloist.

Haydn......................"Surprise" Symphony
Mozart........Overture to "The Magic Flute"
Schubert. Songs with orchestra. a, Raste, Krieger; b, Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd; c, Ave Maria.
Liszt..................The Battle of the Huns
Songs with orchestra, Wagner, Traeume; Beethoven, Freudvoll und Leidvoll, Die Trommel geruehret.
Beethoven.................Overture to Egmont

It was a concert by three virtuosi of distinction—Dr Muck, Miss Culp and the orchestra. It was the first time that this combination of artistic principles had taken place, and it proved how blessed it is to dwell in this region when all things work together for good.

Miss Culp was well disposed and had chosen her songs wisely. Some singers about to be heard with the orchestra for the first time might have felt it incumbent upon them to have selected an aria. It is not improbable that Miss Culp might have found an aria which she could have sung well. But she made her place here as a singer of lieder, and she came yesterday to her first appearance here at these concerts, with no assumption of the airs of a prima donna.

Each of the six songs was well suited to her. Indeed it is difficult to name another who could recreate them with more of the beauty of a rare vocal art, or with the sincerity of sweet womanhood. Wagner's "Traeume," as Miss Culp sang it and the orchestra played it, was a benediction and a vision into the things that are not, which comes rarely to mortals. Fortunate are those who will hear it tonight.

Dr Muck's art, his range of imagination, his variety of touch, has not been so clearly summed up in any one concert this season. There was the chastened, clarified, luminous music of Haydn and Mozart. There was the epic of Beethoven, dramatist and tragic poet. There were the sympathetically subordinated accompaniments, yet ever with individuality, and there was Liszt's spectacular, earsmiting picture of the battle in the clouds between the spirits of slain Goths and Christians; music not without allegorical relation to another more realistic battle waged upon the earth by the Philistines and the Romanticists of more than 60 years ago.

Here are divergent thoughts and feelings, all springing from the human heart and mind, but in different epochs of time, in different stages of development of artistic sensibility and expression. They each had their due manner and character yesterday—Haydn's cheery gayety, pretty sentiment, his gallantry and his humor; Mozart's clarity as the crystal brook, with an expanding emotional range; Beethoven, uttering grave and profoundly beautiful thoughts; Liszt, unchaining the brass and sending his imagination upon rhetorical flights.

In each of them there was an individuality, an identity. It surrounded the conductor as an invisible presence. It appeared to emanate from him and envelop the orchestra, yet to the audience his profile remained the same. His physical manifestations have little of variation. There is the same repose, the same cool mastery of detail, the same flaming and imperious but instant summons to a sharp contrast, the same insistence upon subtle and eloquent accentuation and the same musing aloofness which approaches actual scorn of the display and acrobatic industry common to others. And here is the striking and curious part of it all.

To the analyst, Dr Muck's interpretations, for example, of the Haydn symphony may appear inferior, introspective and colculated, even as the sculptor has chiseled his figure out of marble; it may appear carefully considered, balanced and dovetailed, until to minute perfection organic symmetry has been added and there is the proportion of a noble piece of architecture. There is enveloping all of this the guise of a persuasive and enkindling spontaneity.

This or that effect might have been born of the moment. It would never have been born by accident notwithstanding. It is as though this man who might be a high priest of the mystic arts stood before his players and as they proceeded denoted by some secret code not visible to those who see the eloquence of his back, but not of his face, the intellectual cast or particular emotional flavor which he at that moment had fancied, had seen in his mind's eye and had reproduced. There is a type of so-called spontaneity that shuts its eyes and trusts alone to feeling. Not so with Dr Muck.

The "Surprise" symphony yesterday was a delightful study of music as written for the entertainment and diversion of men, sparkling, exuberant, refreshing, and playful in the stealthy hush that preceded the alarming drum beat and crashing chord. Haydn was said to have denied his intention to awaken those who napped at his concerts. Strange that later composers in far greater need of the device never thought to use it.

Next week Mahler's 5th Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" will be played.

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 12, 1913

MME. CULP SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

WINS MANY RECALLS BY EXCELLENT WORK

Orchestral Parts of This Week's Programme Are "Solid Musical Food."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise."
Mozart—"Magic Flute Overture."
Schubert—Three Songs with Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Julia Culp.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem. "The Battle of the Huns."
Wagner—Song. "Traeume."
Beethoven—Two songs from "Egmont."
Mme. Julia Culp.
Beethoven—"Egmont Overture."

Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, with a little of Liszt as a more highly spiced dish of the concert. But it was all good, solid musical food, without any traces of modern Carnival Ptomaine in it. We have often said that (apart from the latter's last three symphonies) we prefer Haydn to Mozart in symphonic work. He is more naive, simple, and does not aim at dramatic effects which would seem but thin and affected in the atmosphere of the 20th century. And Dr. Muck reads his work in an unaffected and honest fashion that fits well to the Wordsworth of Music.

But in the "Surprise Symphony" our Wordsworth attempts a little simple practical joking. He lulls the audience to almost comatose tranquillity with a soothing Andante, and then suddenly wakes them up with a fortissimo stroke on the kettledrum. How our kettledrummer gave that stroke may be imagined, but we have much stronger cataclysms in music nowadays, and we no longer get startled by any explosions whatever.

We scarcely become enthusiastic over the final rondo of this symphony, but it served to remind us that once upon a time it was customary to end every symphony with at least a semblance of jollity. The Minuet with its Trio also seemed rather formal, so that the sonata-allegro of the first and the variations of the second movement seemed the best parts of the symphony. Nevertheless the audience grew very enthusiastic over the work, and even the orchestra was forced to rise in acknowledgment—which their good work deserved. But Mozart in the "Magic Flute" overture goes far beyond Haydn. What a chattering brightness he manages to give to the strict fugal exposition of the beginning of the overture—after the introduction Bach had used practically the same fugue subject (same length, same key, etc.) in his seventh fugue in the second volume of the "Well-tempered Clavichord," but he changes the subject into stately canons, wholly different from the spicy treatment accorded it by Mozart.

I am ever out of sympathy with the way in which all the great conductors whip up the speed of this fugue. It is always taken so fast that one gets only the merest outline of its workmanship. I very much doubt, even in the teeth of the famous modern authorities, whether Mozart would have rushed this chief theme in any such helter-skelter fashion. We can at once add that our great string orchestra played it clearly in spite of the pace, but that does not prove that it was necessary. The whole overture seemed too rapid, but Dr. Muck has plenty of authority for this "presto" reading.

Mme. Julia Culp has thoroughly captured America. Seldom have we heard such a poetic Lied-singer. She does not distort or exaggerate, and she never sentimentalizes. We were a little doubtful when we saw the old sugar-plum of an "Ave Maria" upon the programme, but even in this she did not yield to the temptation to grow mawkish. In this number her legato work was remarkably pure and even. Her "missa da voce" (swell of the voice) is perfection. And if "Ave Maria" is a somewhat oversung selection, she made amends by having the two other Schubert numbers far less familiar. We cannot remember to have heard "Raste Krieger" and Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd," before in a Boston concert. The last-named song has a fine accompaniment of hunting-calls (they were excellently played) which seem put in on the "Lucus a non lucendo" principle for they sound continuously at the words, "Here no bugles sound," but this and the "Ave Maria" were superb performances all the same.

It was also in good taste to precede the "Egmont" overture with two of Claerchen's songs from the same work. Beethoven gives the simple tenderness and the courage of Goethe's heroine with admirable touches, but even in these striking numbers we do not find the master really singable composer.

Nevertheless, when passing over Mme Culp's larynx almost every number becomes vocal and attractive, and these an Wagner's over-rated "Dreams" were greatly applauded. As we felt that Mme Culp's last numbers were rather sel abnegatory we were the more delighted find her win five recalls at the end them.

Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" depends great deal upon the conductor for its fect. Given a Dr. Muck to lead it and becomes a thrilling and most exciti work. Give it to a lesser man and it see something artificial. It is interesting note that this was probably the first sical work inspired by a painting. S then Boecklin's paintings have been tu into tones by Weingartner, Rachmani and Huber; Appleton Brown's picture Paine, and Aphrodite's beautiful bus wick.

The idea of having two themes struggle together is not new in music. Beethoven used the effect in his fifth symphony, Mendelssohn in his "Reformation Symphony," and Tschaikowsky used this touch frequently, especially in his "1812" overture. Perhaps the "reductio ad absurdam" of this kind of fight is found in Strauss' "Heldenleben" where the pugilism of several different themes becomes decidedly rough and tumble.

But in this picture of the battle of the ghosts of warriors the two themes are finely contrasted and the old church mode which finally triumphs is grandly wrought up on the organ, the most fitting instrument for its climax. In praising the work of the organ we must not slight the muscular efforts of kettle-drummer and cymbalist. If ever these two artists earned their salary it was on this occasion. The loftiness of the "Crux Fidelis," however, made a worthy climax to a very powerful tone-poem, and, as intimated, the work had a performance that was memorable. Again Dr. Muck had tumultuous recalls and again the orchestra was forced to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

And now, having given us combat and victory a la Liszt, Dr. Muck ended with precisely the same subjects treated by Beethoven. And it was an object lesson to see how much more vivid the triumph was in the simpler score of the "Egmont" overture than in the vast tone-coloring of Liszt. Just a rising crescendo of violins in the high positions, just a few runs on the piccolo, and the coda of the "Egmont" overture becomes the frenzy of victorious Liberty, in a manner that none of the great tone-colorists can ever hope to surpass.

It shows the advance of orchestral technique when we remember that the rising passage for the violins, in the coda, which Beethoven's musicians declared to be "impossible," was played easily and flawlessly by our first violins. In spite of the great success deservedly won by the "Hunnenschlacht," we enjoyed the shorter and more direct "Egmont" overture in a higher degree. The former was the Abbe Liszt delineating the conquering power of his chosen church; the latter was Beethoven giving voice to his great love of Liberty and voicing the triumph of human Freedom. The concert was a fine crescendo, from the peaceful prattle of Haydn at the beginning to the clashes of war by Liszt and Beethoven at the end.

HERALD.

APRIL 12, 1913.

21ST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Liszt's Symphonic Poem "The Battle of the Huns" Stirs Enthusiasm.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Julia Culp sang for the first time with this orchestra in Boston. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise" ....Haydn
Overture to "The Magic Flute" ....Mozart
Songs with orchestra, "Raste, Krieger," "Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd," "Ave Maria" ....Schubert
Symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns" ....Liszt
Songs with orchestra, "Traeunme". Wagner
"Freudvoll und Leidvole" and "Die Trommel geruehret". Beethoven
Overture to "Egmont" ....Beethoven

Liszt's symphonic poem was stormily applauded. Not within our recollection has any one of Liszt's compositions been so favorably received by an audience in Boston. Was the applause due to the brilliance of the performance? The orchestra played brilliantly throughout the concert. Or was the applause due to the sonority of the last pages, with the roar of the organ, the choir of brass, the beating and clashing of pulsatile instruments?. Surely the battle scene is not exciting. It is lamb-like music in comparison with the section in Strauss's "Heldenleben," or the introduction to Massenet's "La Navarraise." The one salient feature in this scene is the figure which by theme and rhythm brings to mind the chief motive of the "Walkuerenritt."

Wagner sketched the "Walkeuere" in 1854, but the last act was not finished until April 1856, and then Wagner was eager to learn how it would affect Liszt. The latter worked on "The Battle of The Huns" early in 1857. Wagner often helped himself to Liszt's music with both hands. It is not safe to say in this instance that he borrowed from him.

When "The Battle of the Huns" was performed in Vienna in 1875 the critic Hanslick was sorely vexed. He could not understand Liszt's direction to conductors: "The whole coloring should at first be continuously sombre, and all the instruments should sound in a spectral manner." Hanslick objected to the word "coloring" as applied to music. He argued that this coloring would be light or dark, according to the instrumentation; that no conductor could produce a spectral effect unless it were already in the music itself. Thus he, not Liszt, showed a lack of imagination. A matter-of-fact consideration can easily reduce a highly fantastical work to a series of commonplaces.

And Hanslick complained of drumsticks with sponge tips, cymbals struck with wooden drumsticks, the contrast of the choral for the organ with the "battle motive." Operatic effects, unworthy the dignity of a concert hall! Fortunately for his peace of mind, Hanslick died before he was obliged to know ultra-modern systems of harmony, the strange use of familiar instruments endeavored to put Kaulbach's picture into music disconcerted him.

Yet the Viennese critic was right when he insisted that the orchestral dress did not conceal poverty in invention, for although a spirited performance may give temporary worth to the Battle scene, and impressive ecclesiastical pomp to the treatment of the hymn "Crux fidelis," the symphonic poem as a whole is not broadly or nobly conceived. The picture of Kaulbach is a mural painting. Liszt's composition is as a garish fresco. The final section, however, when played as it was yesterday, cannot fail to excite an audience. The hearer might well shout with the frantic worshippers of Cybele: "I have eaten of the drum and drank of the cymbals."

Dr. Muck is as fortunate in his reading of Haydn and Mozart as in his interpretation of romantic contemporaries. Mozart said of music that "it should always sound." The symphony and the overture not only "sounded" yesterday; they were played with exquisite clarity; melodies were sung; the rhythm was irresistible; there was no attempt to give undue importance to formulas of the period or to unessential passages; there was no distressing attempt to reestablish an "archaic" spirit. And so there was no endeavor to make something new out of the "Egmont" overture; there was no impertinent "originality" in the reading. We remember Franz Wuellner leading this overture in Berlin many years ago, when to "make an effect" he broke the continuity of the first allegro for the sake of giving dramatic significance to the heavy recurring chords that are supposed by persons restless in their minds to portray the Duke of Alva.

Mme. Culp sang three songs from Schubert's "Lady of the Lake" series. With the exception of the "Ave Maria," this group was interesting chiefly by reason of the singer's admirable art. Schubert said that the first hearers were astonished at the devotion he had thrown into the "Hymn to the Blessed Virgin," and added that he never forced himself into devotion. Mme. Culp might say this of her devotion to art. The orchestration of the accompaniment of "Jaeger, Ruhe," is not beneficial to the melody.

Mme. Culp had already sung the songs from "Egmont" at a recital in Boston. Yesterday Beethoven's orchestral accompaniments, especially that of "Die Trommel geruehret," added greatly to the effect.

The singer's voice showed somewhat the strain of the season, for the upper tones were not quite so fresh as when she first sang here, but with the exception of certain tones that were hard in quality, the voice was a most sympathetic instrument, one to enchant the hearer by its richness and warmth. As before, her amazing management of breath, the beauty and significance of her phrasing, the aesthetic intelligence and taste, the womanly fervor, all worked their spell.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and three pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 19, 1913

FUTURE OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Tells of Aims and Endowment Plans

The third and last session of the third annual conference of the National Federation of Music Societies took place last evening under the auspices of the South End Music School in Pembroke street.

Major Henry L. Higginson was the principal speaker, and his speech was a delightful and informal tale of the inception and the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The subject developed from Mr. Higginson's complimenting the South End Music School orchestra and its director, Arthur Sheperd, on their excellent efforts. Mr. Higginson also referred warmly to the services of Mr. Clement Lenom as a member of the Symphony Orchestra and as the conductor of excellent performances by the chorus of the South End Music School.

SCHOOL ORCHESTRA PLAYS

There were also addresses by Robert A. Woods, D. Edward Burlingame Hill, David B. Manners, Mrs. Howard Mansfield, president of the National Federation of Music School Societies. The school orchestra played Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Prelude to Bizet's First "L'Arlessienne" suite, the waltz from Tschaikowsky's ballet, Dornroschen, which later, at the request of Mr. Higginson, was repeated, and Nicolai's Festival Overture. The chorus sang Mendelssohn's "O Wert Thou in the Cauld, Cauld Blast," an excerpt from Massenet's [illegible] Magdaleine," Arthur Foote introduced Mr. Higginson, following a performance by the orchestra, saying: "There's one person in this room who knows more about orchestras than anyone else in the world, and he will say a few words to us on the subject."

Major Higginson described his early ambition to found a symphony orchestra for the good of the community. He said that the man who lived for himself and his individual interests only was a poor specimen of a citizen and a patriot, and that he had felt that Boston and America needed the pleasure and uplift which could be provided by a symphony orchestra of high rank. It was first necessary, after the financial vacuum that followed the Civil war, to make the large sum of money necessary for even the beginning of such an enterprise. The sum was finally accumulated. George Henschel, then at the height of his activities as a singer and musician, was engaged as conductor. There were three principal agreements that the men had to stand by, punctuality, presence at every rehearsal desired, no matter what number of rehearsals might prove to be necessary, and absolute obedience. "I happen to know," said Major Higginson later, "that Dr. Muck recently called 13 rehearsals for a single symphony."

At first 20 concerts were given each season. Then, at the request of Harvard University, six concerts were given each winter in Cambridge.

Ultimatum to Players

After three years the men of the orchestra resisted the demand that they give up playing outside engagements and devote themselves solely to the Boston Symphony performances. After a rehearsal one Friday afternoon Major Higginson went back of the stage, and said: "Gentlemen, I have made my proposal and you have refused it. I now withdraw that proposal." For the next three days a stream of players haunted the offices at State street, seeking re-engagement. They were re-engaged under the new condition—all save one foreign musician, who had been brought over at considerable expense, and given considerable headway. He was discharged.

After three years Henschel resigned.

